

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

COURT RULES.

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Amendment to Rule 27.*

Add at the end of Rule 27:

When testimony is admitted, not as substantive evidence, but in corroboration or contradiction, and that fact is stated by the court when it is admitted, it will not be ground for exception that the judge fails in his charge to again instruct the jury specially upon the nature of such evidence, unless his attention is called to the matter by a prayer for instruction; nor will it be ground of exception that evidence competent for some purposes, but not for all, is admitted generally, unless the appellant asks, at the time of admission, that its purpose shall be restricted.

Adopted March 16, 1904.

Amendments to Rules 28, 52, and 53.†

28. Printing Records—What to be Printed— Pauper Appeals.

Fifteen copies of the entire transcript sent up in each action shall be printed, except in pauper appeals, and in these latter the court desires the counsel for the appellant to furnish a sufficient number of printed or typewritten briefs for the use of the court, giving a succinct statement of the facts applicable to the exceptions, and the authorities relied on. Should the appellant gain the appeal the cost of the same shall be taxed against the appellee.

The printed transcript shall be in the order required by rule 19 (1), and shall contain the marginal references and index required by rule 19 (2) and 19 (3), though, for economy, the marginal references in the manuscript may be printed as subheads in the body of the record and not on the margin. The transcript shall be printed immediately after docketing the same unless it is sent up ready printed.

52. Petition to Rehear—When Filed.

A petition to rehear may be filed at the same term, or during the vacation succeeding the term of the court at which the judgment was rendered, or within twenty days after the commencement of the succeeding term. If such petition is ordered to be docketed by the justices to whom it is submitted under rule 53, such justices may, upon such terms as they see fit, make an order restraining the issuing of an execution or the collection and payment of the same until the next term of said court, or until the petition to rehear shall have been determined.

53. Petition to Rehear—What to Contain.

The petition must assign the alleged error of law complained of, or the matter overlooked, or the newly discovered evidence, and allege that the judgment complained of has been performed or secured. Such petition shall be accompanied with the certificate of at least two members of the bar of this court who have no interest in the subject-matter and have never been of counsel for either party to the suit, and each of whom shall have been at least five years a member of the bar of this court, that they have carefully examined the case and the law bearing thereon and the authorities cited in the opinion, and they shall summarize succinctly in such certificate the points in which they deem the opinion erroneous.

The petitioner shall endorse upon the petition the names of two justices, neither of whom dissented from the opinion, to whom the petition shall be sent by the clerk, and it shall not be docketed for rehearing unless both of said justices endorse thereon that it is a proper case to be reheard: Provided, however, that when there have been two dissenting justices it shall be sufficient for the petitioner to designate only one justice, and his approval in such case shall be sufficient to order the petition docketed. The clerk shall endorse on the petition the date on which it was received, and it shall be delivered by him to one of the justices designated by the petitioner. There will be no oral argument before the justice or justices thus designated, before it is acted on by them, and if they order the petition docketed there shall be no oral argument thereon before the court (unless the court of its own motion shall direct an oral argument), but it shall be submitted upon the record at the former hearing, the printed petition to rehear and a brief to be filed by the petitioner within ten days after the petition is ordered to be docketed and a brief to be filed by the respondent within twenty days after such order to docket. Such briefs shall not be the briefs on the first hearing, but shall be new briefs, directed to the errors assigned in the petition, and shall be printed. If not printed and filed in the prescribed time by the petitioner, the petition will be dismissed, and for default in either particular by the respondent the cause will be disposed of without such brief.

The petition may be ordered docketed for a rehearing as to all the points recited by the two certifying counsel (who cannot certify to errors not alleged in the petition), or it may be restricted to one or more of the points thus certified, as may be directed by the justices who grant the application. When a petition to rehear is ordered to be docketed notice shall at once be given to counsel on both sides by the clerk of this court.

Adopted October 28, 1903.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS OF WEST VIRGINIA.

It is ordered that Rule XII of this Court be and it is amended and re-adopted so as to read as follows:

No petition for a re-hearing will be entertained unless presented within the term at which the decision is announced, nor, in any case, later than thirty days after the date of the decision of the case in which it is presented, (unless as otherwise authorized by law,) and no re-hearing will be allowed, unless one of the judges who concurred in the decision shall be dissatisfied with the conclusion reached; and no petition for a rehearing will be entertained by the Court in any case, unless the reasons therefor are printed and filed with the petition; but if the decision complained of is announced within fifteen days of the close of the term, the printing may be dispensed with.

(133 N. C. 769)

STATE v. CASTLE et al.

1903.)

MURDER — EVIDENCE — SELF-DEFENSE — IN-STRUCTIONS—NECESSITY OF RETREAT.

1. Where, on a prosecution for murder, it appeared that accused, who was foreman of a lumber camp, had shot two of the hands during a difficulty commenced by the latter, evidence that the foreman had not sent them sufficient dinner on the day of the killing—it being his duty to have dinner sent to them, and with which they were charged on the employer's books—was erroneously admitted, and calculated to prejudice the jury against accused.

2. On a prosecution for murder, evidence that defendant drank liquor was inadmissible, as defendant's character could not be proved by particular facts or conduct.

3. Two laborers employed in a lumber camp having been creating a disturbance, the foreman, accompanied by another, went to their room, and, on entering, said, "Here is your time," whereupon one of the laborers rose with a pistol, cursing. The foreman's associate grabbed the pistol, and the other laborer rose with a knife. The laborer with the pistol was trying to shoot, and the foreman's associate held the pistol, when the foreman pulled his revolver. The laborer with the knife made a cut at the foreman's associate, whereupon the foreman shot the other laborer twice. Turning, he found the laborer with the knife facing him with drawn knife, and he shot him twice. On a prosecution for murder, the court was requested to charge that if, when the foreman approached the deceased and handed one of them his time, they drew deadly weapons and used threatening language, or attempted an assault, the foreman was justified in meeting force with force in order to protect himself and his companion from harm, and that; if the foreman was where he had a right to be, he was not required to retreat to the wall, though, if he stepped back when the knife was drawn within reach of him, and was impeded so that he could not get out of range of the knife he did retreat to the wall. Held, that the instruction was correct, under the testimony.

4. Where, on a prosecution for murder, the court charged that defendant was justified in meeting force with force, it was error to add, "But you are to judge of the force necessary, and not the prisoner," since the jury should merely find whether he did more than a reasonable man should have done.

5. Two laborers employed in a lumber camp having been creating a disturbance, the foreman, accompanied by another, went to their room, and, on entering, said, "Here is your time," whereupon one of the laborers rose with a pistol, cursing. The foreman's associate grabbed the pistol, and the other laborer rose with a knife. The former laborer was trying to shoot, and the foreman's associate held the pistol when the foreman pulled his revolver. The laborer with the knife made a cut at the foreman's associate, whereupon the foreman shot the other laborer twice. Turning, he found the laborer with the knife facing him with drawn knife, and he shot him twice. Held that, on a prosecution for murder, it was error to charge that it was incumbent on defendant to first use gentle and mild means, and that if he used more force than was necessary, and the deceased could have been ejected without it, he would be guilty of murder in the second degree, since the instruction made the right of self-defense turn on the necessity for the force used, without reference to whether it reasonably appeared necessary.

6. The instruction was erroneous because, in view of the evidence, there was no way in which defendant could have resorted to mild and gentle means.

7. It was error to charge that, if the provocation were great, the crime would be but manslaughter, but if slight, and the killing done out of proportion to the provocation, it would be murder in the second degree; there being no slight provocation in evidence.

8. It was error to charge that if defendants went to the room of deceased to discharge them, and they entered into a sudden quarrel and killed the deceased men, they would be guilty of manslaughter; there being no evidence of a sudden quarrel.

9. Where, on a prosecution for murder, the defense is self-defense, and the court instructs that the burden is on defendants to prove the existence of facts necessary to mitigate or excuse the homicide, he should also instruct that defendants were not called upon to introduce other testimony, but could rely on the state's evidence, for mitigation of the homicide or for an acquittal.

10. On a prosecution for homicide, where the defense was self-defense, an instruction that it was incumbent on defendant to satisfy the jury that "these circumstances and facts have been shown to your satisfaction" was erroneous, as calculated to leave the impression that defendants were required to introduce independent evidence to mitigate or excuse the homicide, instead of being entitled to rely on the state's evidence.

11. Two laborers employed in a lumber camp having been creating a disturbance, the foreman, accompanied by another, went to their room, and, on entering, said, "Here is your time," whereupon one of the laborers rose with a pistol, cursing. The foreman's associate held the pistol when the foreman pulled his revolver. The laborer with the knife made a cut at the foreman's associate, whereupon the foreman shot the other laborer twice. Turning, he found the laborer with the knife facing him with drawn knife, and he shot him twice. Held, that the jury would have been warranted in finding that the foreman was endeavoring to discharge his duty, and that the conduct of the laborers was such as to create in his mind a reasonable apprehension that they would execute their threats, and that he was justified in using such means as were necessary to get rid of the troublesome servants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Burke County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

John E. Castle and others were convicted of murder in the second degree, and they appeal. Reversed.

A. C. Avery, S. J. Ervin, and Edmund Jones, for appellants. The Attorney General, for the State.

CONNOR, J. The defendants were convicted of murder in the second degree, and from a judgment upon the verdict appealed to this court.

The testimony tended to show that the defendant Castle was in charge as local manager of a lumber camp constructed and operated by the William Ritter Lumber Company at the terminus of its railway at Camp Creek, in Burke county; that he had charge of the railway and all of the incidental work, including a boarding house where the hands ate and slept, and in which the homicide occurred. At the time of the homicide there were more than 60 or 70 men in the camp. Forty or 50 of them slept in the main building. They took their supper and breakfast in a hall called the "dining room." There was another room, called the "lobby," which was used by the hands as a public sitting room. The board of the hands was furnished by the lumber company under the supervision and direction of the defendant Castle. The deceased men, Dockery and Fortner, were employed by the lumber company.

John Roberts, a witness for the state, testified: That they quit work in the evening at 6 o'clock. That Dockery stopped at 12, and went into camp. Supper was served about 7 o'clock. The camp was in charge of the defendant Castle. Two colored men did the cooking. The sleeping apartments were upstairs. The lower part of the main building was used as a dining room, and a part of it as a lobby. There was a hall upstairs, and bedrooms on either side. The defendant Castle discharged hands for disorder. Each "boss" was held responsible for his hands, and had the power to discharge them. The witness had some talk with Castle about not having dinner that day. He asked who was drinking at the camp, and the witness told him the Fortner boys and Dockery were drinking some. There was a rule that no drinking should be allowed in camp. The witness, under objection, was permitted to say that Castle drank himself, to which the defendant excepted. It was further in evidence that dinner was sent to the hands in the woods, being prepared by the cooks, and that the hands were charged by Castle, for the company, a stipulated price per meal for their dinner sent them, which was "docked out" of the daily wages of the men. The state proposed to show by John Roberts that sufficient dinner was not sent to his hands on the day of the homicide. The defendant objected, the objection was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

C. H. Buchanan testified that the deceased were drinking before and after supper; that he heard no hollering by them out on the porch, but could hear them cursing all over the lobby, and heard shooting once or twice upstairs. A day or two afterwards he saw where one ball went through the floor of Dockery and Fortner's room into the lobby; heard them cursing about the time they came into supper, using profane and indecent language. They were making a noise, and Castle asked them several times to stop. Castle got the time of the deceased men from Roberts; said he did not see why the boys wanted to do that way; that they could get their money without doing that way; that, when Garland came, he asked Castle where the boys were, and Castle said, "Upstairs." Castle asked Garland what were Mortimer's orders. Garland said Mortimer's orders were to write out discharges and tell them to go away; said, "Send them away quietly;" to deputize all of the men he wanted. Castle asked Garland who would be good men, and he named several. Garland was in the employment of the lumber company. The defendants went to the room of the deceased. Castle had a lantern in his left hand, and an envelope in his right hand. All went upstairs; went into Dockery and Fortner's room. Castle, Garland, and Lunsford walked in. Castle walked in first, on the right side. Then Garland walked in on the left side. Castle handed Dockery an envelope, and said, "Here, boys, is your time." Dockery said something. Never understood what he said. All stood up. "Fortner was sitting on the left of the bed, as we went in." Dockery had a knife in his hand—hawkbill. Fortner had a pistol in his right hand, sitting on the bed, with his feet hanging down, holding the pistol with the muzzle towards the door; and, as Garland stepped in, Fortner turned his pistol up, by turning over his hand. Garland grabbed at the pistol, and said, "What are you going to do with that pistol?" Fortner arose and grabbed the pistol with both hands, and they entered into a scuffle with the pistol. As Garland took hold of the pistol, he raised up. Dockery raised up with his knife and struck at Garland two strokes. Fortner and Garland were struggling over the pistol. The witness thought he cut Garland.

Stokes Pendland testified: That he was commissary clerk, and was at the camp on the night of the homicide. That Dockery came in about 3 o'clock, and said he quit be cause they gave or sent out no dinner. The witness asked him if he wanted him to go up to the lobby and have some dinner cooked, and he said he did not want any dinner at that time. He and Riddle went out and took a drink of liquor. Dockery came back and asked the witness to show him a knife. The witness went and got out knives, and he bought one. He said he had not had any dinner, and, if Castle charged him with three meals, he would kill him at supper. He repeatedly made those threats. In the evening, up to supper time, he was drinking considerably, and said he had two kinds of liquor. He bought a hawkbill knife, and said that was the kind he wanted; that he had used a knife like that before. That evening about 5 o'clock the witness went to Riddle, and asked him to talk to Dockery and try to get him quiet. He said that Dockery said all he wanted was his money. The witness told him if that was it, he would phone Mortimer, and see that he got his money. After this conversation, Castle came where the witness was. The witness told Castle that he was going to have some trouble, and related the threats—that Dockery had said he would kill him if he charged him for three meals. The witness went to supper, and warned Castle as to the threats. The gong rang, and they started into supper. He saw Fortner. He and Dockery were cursing and using some tough language. "We sat down to the table. There were between fifty and sixty of us. Castle asked the boys to keep quiet. After he called the roll, he went back into his office. Dockery kept on using the language until all had gone out except a few of us. His language was very vulgar." The witness went back to the commissary. "Met Fortner and Dockery in the hall. They were taking a drink of whiskey. One of them said, 'We have got the whole damned thing bluffed.' Think it was Dockery." The witness said, "Boys, if you have got the thing bluffed, I would go up and go to bed." That was the last the witness saw of them. They were shooting and making all sorts of noise upstairs, like knocking over things. The conduct of the deceased men was such as to make the hands leave, and they said if it was such as to be overlooked they would leave.

J. W. Staney testified that he was at supper, and heard the deceased use the language stated by other witnesses. He left because of the language they used. He heard a noise upstairs. They came downstairs. Their language was very vulgar.

Zeb Huskins testified that he saw the deceased in the hallway, going towards their room. "Dockery had a knife, and Fortner had a pistol. Fortner said, 'I thought you were that — John Castle.' Dockery caught me by the shoulder and pulled me into the room, and asked me if I had seen anything of that — Castle. He said, if he could see the — that night, this would do the work for him. He then jumped off the bed and shot down through the floor. Dockery said, if he could see the —, he would cut him to death. He said that he had cut one to death, and they penned him for that. He said he was going to cut another — if he could see John Castle that night, and, if they penned him for that, he was going to quit."

There was much other testimony of the same character. The testimony in regard to the homicide, as gathered from the several witnesses, is substantially as follows: The defendants, together with several others, went to the room of the deceased for the purpose of giving them their time and discharging them. Fortner, with a pistol in his right hand, started to raise up off the bed, and cursed them. Garland grabbed the pistol with his left hand. Fortner raised up straight. So did Dockery, with a knife in his hand; Fortner trying to shoot. Garland was holding the pistol. Castle pulled out his revolver. Dockery made a cut at Garland with his knife, and, as he did so, Castle shot Fortner. He shot him twice. As he turned, Dockery had his knife drawn, facing Castle—his arm drawn in a cutting position. Castle shot him twice.

The first exception relates to the testimony of John Roberts that sufficient dinner was not sent to his hands on the day of the homicide. This testimony was clearly irrelevant, and was calculated to prejudice the defendant Castle; it being his duty to have dinner sent to the hands, for which, under his direction, they were to be charged on the books of the company, to be deducted from their wages. To charge that he did not send proper dinner, or a sufficient quantity of dinner, was calculated to prejudice the jury against him, and should not have been admitted.

The second exception is directed to the testimony that Castle drank liquor. It is not suggested that he was drunk on the night of the homicide. If the purpose of the testimony was to attack his character—and we do not see how it could have been admitted for any other purpose—it was incompetent. He did not put his character in evidence, and certainly the state could not introduce evidence for that purpose upon the question of his guilt. When he went upon the stand he put his general character in issue as a witness, and the state might have proved that such character was not good. It could not, however, introduce evidence of particular facts or conduct on his part. It is well settled that, for the purpose of attacking general character, the party seeking to do so can only prove common report or reputation. State v. Laxton, 76 N. C. 216; State v. Boswell, 13 N. C. 209; State v. Bullard, 100 N. C. 486, 6 S. E. 191; State v. Hawn, 107 N. C. 810, 12 S. E. 455.

"The defendants asked the court to charge the jury that if, when Castle approached the deceased, and handed one of them his time, and gave notice of discharge, they immediately drew deadly weapons and used threatening language, or attempted to make a deadly assault on Castle or Garland, who accompanied him, Castle was justified in meeting force with force necessary to protect himself and companion from bodily harm; that, if Castle was where he had a right to be or it was his duty to be, he was not required by the law to retreat to the wall from a deadly assault, though if he stepped back when Dockery had drawn a knife within reach of him, and was impeded, so he could not get out of Dockery's reach, by John Lunsford, he did retreat to the wall." The court gave these instructions, adding to each of them the words, "But you are to judge of the force necessary, and not the prisoner," to which the defendants excepted. We think that the prayers as asked were correct propositions of law, in the light of the testimony, and that the court below should not have added the words complained of. While it is undoubtedly true that the jury are the judges of the force which reasonably appeared necessary to be used to repel the assault, or, to put it more accurately, they are to put themselves in the place of the prisoners, and say whether or not, from the testimony, the force used was such as a reasonable man, under like circumstances, would have used, yet it is not correct to leave the guilt or innocence of the defendants to depend upon the absolute necessity of the force used. "Where one is drawn into a combat of this nature by the very instinct and constitution of his being, he is obliged to estimate the danger in which he has been placed, and the kind and degree of resistance necessary to his defense. To do this, he must consider not only the size and strength of his foe, how he is armed, and his threats, but also his character as a violent and dangerous man. It is sound sense, and we think sound law, that, before a jury shall be required to say whether the defendant did anything more than a reasonable man should have done under the circumstances, it should, as far as can be, be placed in the defendant's situation, surrounded with the same appearances of danger, with the same degree of knowledge of the deceased's probable purpose which the defendant possessed. * * * The jury must ascertain the true character of the combat, for if, from the nature of the attack, there was reasonable ground to believe there was a design to destroy his life or commit a felony upon his person, the killing the assailant would be excusable homicide." State v. Turpin, 77 N. C. 477, 24 Am. Rep. 455.

The court charged the jury: "Yet it was incumbent upon him to use first gentle and mild means, and if he and those with him used more force than was necessary, or unreasonable or violent force, such as deadly weapons, and you find they could have been ejected without such violent force, the defendants would be guilty of murder in the second degree." To this instruction the defendants excepted. The defect in this instruction consists in the fact that the judge makes the right of self-defense to turn upon the necessity for the force used, without reference to the question whether it reasonably appeared to be necessary to use such force as the defendants resorted to. The right of self-defense depends upon the use of such force as is necessary, or reasonably appears to be necessary, whereas his honor directed the jury to consider only the question of necessity. We think there is also error in this instruction because, taking all of the testimony to be true, the doctrine of mollior manus does not apply. The defendant Castle had a right to go into the room for the purpose of giving them their time and notifying them of their discharge. All of the testimony shows that as he entered the room these men were armed with deadly weapons, and immediately upon his entering the room the difficulty began. There is no phase of the testimony which tended to show that the defendants could have resorted to gentle and mild means in performing their mission.

His honor further instructed the jury: "If the provocation be great, it will be but manslaughter; but if the provocation be but slight, and the killing be done out of all proportion to the provocation, it will be murder in the second degree." The error in this instruction consists in assuming that the jury could find that there was slight provocation. If the jury found that there was any provocation, it consisted in a deadly assault by the deceased upon the defendants; and it would be difficult to conceive how the jury, in the light of all the evidence, could find that the means used by the defendants was "out of all proportion to the provocation."

He again charged the jury: "If the defendants went to the room of the deceased for the purpose of discharging them, and not for the purpose of conflict or fight, and they entered into a sudden quarrel and fight, and killed Dockery and Fortner, they would be guilty of manslaughter." There is no evidence in this case that the defendants entered into a sudden quarrel with the deceased. Assuming that the jury did find that the defendants went to the room of the deceased for the purpose of discharging them, which was entirely lawful, and not for the purpose of having a conflict or fight, there was no word used from which the jury could infer a sudden quarrel. The testimony tended to show that one of the deceased had a pistol, and the other a hawkbill knife; that, when Garland undertook to disarm Fortner of his pistol, Dockery attempted to use his knife upon Garland or Castle while Garland was struggling with Fortner. With these conditions surrounding them, we can see no theory upon which the defendants can be guilty of manslaughter. If the jury found that they went there for a lawful purpose, and in the prosecution of such purpose they were suddenly assaulted in the manner testified to by the witnesses, and they used such force as was or reasonably appeared to them to be necessary, the jury taking into consideration the character of the deceased, the frame of mind in which they had been and were at the time, the threats of one of them, and all the other testimony, we think the defendants were entitled to an instruction that it was excusable homicide. Of course, if the jury should find that the defendants Castle and Garland went there for the purpose of provoking a difficulty, and not for the bona fide purpose of discharging their duty, and in the prosecution of such purpose they killed the deceased, they would be guilty of manslaughter, at least; and, if the jury should further find that the deceased made no assault upon them, they would be guilty of murder, at least in the second degree.

The defendants further except to his honor's charge for that he repeatedly said to the jury that the burden was upon them to prove to their satisfaction the existence of the facts necessary to reduce the grade of the offense, or to mitigate or excuse the homicide. Undoubtedly the general rule as stated by his honor is correct, but we think that he should have gone further, and said to the jury that, if the facts and circumstances accompanying the homicide were given in evidence by the state's witnesses, the defendants were not called upon to introduce other testimony, but could rely upon the state's evidence for mitigation of the grade of the homicide or for an acquittal. See State v. Willis, 63 N. C. 26.

His honor said to the jury in conclusion: "But it is incumbent upon the defendants to satisfy you that these circumstances and state of facts have been shown to your satisfaction." We think that this was calculated to leave the impression upon the minds of the jury that the defendants were required to introduce independent evidence to mitigate or excuse the homicide. As we have seen, if there was any evidence in the state's testimony which tended to establish the defense, it was the duty of the jury to consider it, as tending to sustain the plea of self-defense.

The testimony in this case shows a course of conduct on the part of the deceased which placed the defendant Castle, with the responsibilities resting upon him, and his duties not only to his employer but to the large number of men under his charge, in an exceedingly embarrassing position. He was in charge of a lumber camp of some 50 or 60 men. It was absolutely necessary to a discharge of his duty both to his employer and the men that such conduct as is testified to by the state's witnesses on the part of the deceased should be suppressed, and that persons conducting themselves as did the deceased should be discharged; and if the jury found (and we think they would have been fully justified in finding) that he was endeavoring to discharge his duty, and in doing so the conduct of the deceased was such as to create in his mind a reasonable apprehension that they would execute their threats and continue in their course of conduct, he was not only justified, but it was his duty, to use such means as were necessary to rid the camp of such persons. It certainly was his duty to discharge them, and, to do so promptly, he had a right to go to their room for that purpose; and in view of what had occurred, and the conduct of the deceased in the dining room and after they had gone to their room, it was but common prudence for him to carry a sufficient number of men to prevent or repress any further violence. His language upon entering the room, "Boys, here is your time," is entirely consistent with the lawful purpose on his part. In the deadly encounter which immediately followed, and in which the homicide was committed, we think that the defendants were entitled to the instructions asked by their counsel, and that the modification of them was calculated to prejudice them.

Upon the whole record, we think the defendants are entitled to a new trial.

STATE v. TAYLOR.

CRIMINAL LAW—FORMER CONVICTION—DISORDERLY CONDUCT—VIOLATION OF CITY ORDINANCE—ASSAULT—SUSTAINING PLEA OF FORMER CONVICTION—PRACTICE.

1. Where the court sustains a plea of former conviction after the jury has returned a verdict of guilty, the proper practice is to strike out the verdict and sustain the plea as upon a demurrer by the state; and to enter a judgment of not guilty on the verdict as rendered is improper.

2. A conviction of violating a city ordinance punishing the disturbance of the good order and quiet of the town by fighting, etc., is not a bar to a prosecution by the state for an assault.

3. Where the trial court sustains a plea of former conviction and enters a judgment of not guilty, without striking out the jury's verdict of guilty, it may, on reversal, proceed to enter judgment of conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Ferguson, Judge.

J. M. Taylor was prosecuted for an assault with a deadly weapon, and from the judgment of acquittal the state appeals. Reversed.

The Attorney General, for the State.

CONNOR, J. The defendant was indicted at the September term, 1903, of the superior court of Edgecombe county, for an assault with a deadly weapon. The record states that he pleaded "Not guilty." The case on appeal states that the defendant "admits the assault, but contends and introduces evidence tending to prove that no deadly weapon was used. * * * The defendant pleads former conviction, and offers in evidence the record of the mayor's court of the town of Tarboro, which shows that in August, 1902, a warrant was issued by the mayor against the defendant charging that he 'did unlawfully violate an ordinance of the town of Tarboro, to wit, Ordinance No. 10, section 1, by fighting and disturbing the peace, contrary to said ordinance, against the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state.' The defendant was arrested upon said warrant, and judgment rendered as follows: "After hearing the evidence, and it appearing to the court that the defendant pleads guilty, it is considered and adjudged that the defendant pay costs, $2.85."

Ordinance No. 10 is in the following words: "No person or persons shall be permitted to disturb the good order and quiet of the town by fighting, making loud noises, using profane, bolsterous and indecent language or in any other manner, under a penalty of twenty five dollars." The mayor testified, "I issued this warrant under Ordinance No. 10, and tried the defendant for disturbing the peace of the town by fighting, exactly as set out in the warrant. There was no evidence of any disturbance by making loud noises or using profane, bolsterous, or indecent language. The evidence disclosed no disturbance or noise except the act of striking the said Will Pope. * * * The warrant shows what I tried Taylor for." At the close of the evidence the defendant asks the court to charge the jury "that upon the record on evidence the defendant has been tried and convicted of a simple assault for the offense under investigation." The court declined to give the charge asked, but reserved its opinion. The jury returned a verdict of guilty of a simple assault. The solicitor prayed the judgment of the court. The court announced that, having reserved its opinion as to whether the plea of the defendant of former conviction is good upon the record of the mayor's court introduced in evidence, he adjudges said record is sufficient to sustain the plea of former conviction, and therefore directed the clerk to enter a judgment of "Not guilty," and directed that the defendant be discharged. The state appealed.

The record proper, which controls when conflicting with the case on appeal, states: "The jury upon their oath say that the said J. M. Taylor is not guilty, in manner and form as charged in the bill of indictment, of an assault with a deadly weapon, but is guilty of a simple assault, and thereupon it is ordered by the court that the said J. M. Taylor go without day" (the court holding the plea of former conviction as set out in the case on appeal to be good).

The record presents a singular condition of the case. There is a verdict of guilty of an offense of which, by reason of the form of the indictment, the court has jurisdiction. State v. Fesperman, 108 N. C. 770, 13 S. E.

14, and cases there cited. The verdict is left standing as rendered with a judgment of "Not guilty." His honor, having, upon consideration of the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the plea, decided against the state, should have stricken out the verdict and sustained the plea as upon a demurrer by the state, from which an appeal could be taken. The confusion in the record arises from the failure to observe the procedure pointed out by this court in several cases. Smith, C. J., in State v. Pollard, 83 N. C. 597, discusses the authorities, and says: "It is true, double pleading is allowed only in civil cases under the statute of Anne, as was said by Pearson, C. J., in State v. Potter, 61 N. C. 338, and the jury could not be impaneled to try at one time more than the issue of a single plea; but the difficulty is obviated by allowing the second plea, and a jury trial on it, after the verdict on a preceding plea, and the reasonableness of this practice commends itself to our approval." The court in State v. Respass, 85 N. C. 535, 45 Am. Rep. 700, approves the practice pointed out in Pollard's Case. State v. Washington, 89 N. C. 535, 45 Am. Rep. 700: "Regularly, the two pleas of former conviction and not guilty should be tried separately, since the plea of former conviction implies an admission of the criminal act and is inconsistent with an absolute denial. But the practice of trying them together has become not unusual, and is often convenient." State v. Winchester, 113 N. C. 641, 18 S. E. 657.

For the purpose of disposing of this appeal we assume that the solicitor demurred to the evidence offered to sustain the plea, and that the court overruled his demurrer. Thus viewing the case, we think that his honor was in error. It is well settled that a town ordinance cannot make criminal or prescribe a punishment for acts which are indictable at common law or by statute. State v. Austin, 114 N. C. 855, 19 S. E. 919, 25 L. R. A. 283, 41 Am. St. Rep. 817; State v. Stevens, 114 N. C. 873, 19 S. E. 861. It is equally well settled that they may pass ordinances prohibiting disorderly conduct, and impose a penalty for their violation, etc., and that Ordinance No. 10 of the town of Tarboro is valid. It is substantially like the one set out in State v. Cainan, 94 N. C. 880. Merrimon, J., says: "The ordinance mentioned in the warrant has reference to and forbids such acts and conduct of persons as are offensive and deleterious to society, particularly in dense populations, as in cities and towns, but do not per se constitute criminal offenses under the general law of the state. * * * The purpose of the ordinance is to promote good morals, the decencies and proprieties of society, and prevent nuisances and other criminal offenses which might result from the acts and conduct prohibited." In State v. McNinch, 87 N. C. 567, Ashe, J., says: "His honor seems to have had in his mind the crime of nuisance at common law, but the ordinance of the city was evidently intended to create different offenses from that. It was a police regulation, adopted not merely to secure the citizens of the city against annoyance, but to prevent the evil example of such immoral conduct."

By section 3820 of the Code the violation of a town ordinance is made a misdemeanor, jurisdiction whereof is vested in a justice of the peace. Section 3818 confers upon the mayor the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace "In all criminal matters arising under the laws of the state or under the ordinances of said city or town." The warrant issued by the mayor was sufficiently definite. State v. Merritt, 83 N. C. 677. "A justice of the peace, and as well the mayor, has jurisdiction of a violation of a town ordinance because it is a misdemeanor, and the punishment thereof cannot exceed a fine of $50 or imprisonment for thirty days." State v. Calnan, supra.

The offense for which the defendant is indicted in the superior court is a violation of the law of the state—an assault with a deadly weapon. This brings us to the question whether the two prosecutions were for the same offense. Ruffin, J., in State v. Nash, 86 N. C. 651, 41 Am. Rep. 472, thus states the law: "To support a plea of former acquittal, it is not sufficient that the two prosecutions should grow out of the same transaction, but they must be for the same offense—the same both in law and in fact." "A single act may be an offense against two statutes, and, if each requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not, an acquittal or conviction under either statute does not exempt the defendant from prosecution and punishment under the other." State v. Stevens, supra; State v. Robinson, 116 N. C. 1046, 21 S. E. 701. Disorderly conduct, of which it is the duty and province of municipal authorities to take cognizance, may not, and often does not, involve an assault. When it does so, the ordinance is directed against the disorderly conduct, and the law of the state is directed against the breach of the peace. Bleckley, C. J., in McRae v. The Mayor, etc., 59 Ga. 168, 27 Am. Rep. 390, says: "Many transactions which are made penal by the general law of the state may at the same time afford material for a proper police ordinance. The state may deal only with the central element of the transaction, which is fringed all around with adjuncts that ought to be prohibited by ordinances, as highly mischievous to the quiet of municipal society. In the country such adjuncts might not need repression, for there they might be comparatively harmless. In a city we think a man may fight in a way to violate an ordinance without being guilty of an assault and battery."

The defendant was tried before the mayor for a misdemeanor in violating the ordinance. It may be that he was not guilty upon the evidence. However this may be, the offense of which he was convicted was different from an assault, for which he is indicted. Robbins v. People, 95 Ill. 175. The demurrer of the solicitor should have been sustained.

As the verdict upon the plea of not guilty has not been set aside, we see no reason why the court may not proceed to judgment. State v. Battle, 130 N. C. 655, 41 S. E. 66.

Error.

GRIFFIN v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—COMPLAINT—INCONSISTENT CAUSES OF ACTION—SUBMISSION TO JURY—ISSUES.

1. Plaintiff alleged that he was a passenger on defendant's train, and that he was injured by the premature starting of the train while he was attempting to alight. In an amendment to his complaint, he charged, in addition, that the injury resulted from the negligence of the porter of the train in commanding plaintiff to alight before the train had stopped, etc. Held, that such causes of action were inconsistent, and necessarily could not both be true, and hence it was error for the court to submit the case on the single issue as to whether plaintiff was injured by defendant's negligence as alleged in the complaint, without requiring a finding as to which version of the accident alleged was true.

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Moore, Judge.

Action by Hiram Griffin against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thos. N. Hill, Day & Bell, and Geo. B. Elliott, for appellant. Walter E. Daniel, E. L. Travis, and Claude Kitchin, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. This action was prosecuted by the plaintiff for the recovery of damages alleged to have been sustained while in the act of alighting from the defendant's train. The plaintiff, at the appearance term, filed his complaint, alleging that on the day therein named he purchased a ticket of defendant's agent at Kelford to Palmyra—both stations being on defendant's road—and boarded the train, delivering his ticket to the conductor; that, when the train stopped at Palmyra, plaintiff proceeded to get off, and, while in the act of stepping off, without notice or warning to him, the engineer carelessly, negligently, and wantonly moved the train suddenly, giving a jerk to the cars, by which the plaintiff was thrown to the ground, breaking his wrist and otherwise injuring him; that the defendant's agent in charge of the train negligently and carelessly failed to give him a reasonable time in which to get off the train; and that by reason of his injuries he sustained damage. The defendant denied the material allegations of the complaint, and, for a further defense, said that when the train was approaching the station at Palmyra, and before it had stopped, the plaintiff negligently jumped and alighted from the train, and in doing so fell and was injured, while the train was still in motion, and before it stopped, and that he thereby assumed the risk of being injured, and his negligence was the proximate cause of his injury. The defendant also set up contributory negligence. At November term, 1902, the plaintiff, by leave of the court, amended his complaint, and alleged that when the train got near Palmyra the porter called said station, and, as the train drew near thereto and slowed down, the plaintiff got up from his seat, and went to the door of the car, to be ready to get off when it stopped; that when the train got to the station, and was moving very slowly, having nearly stopped—the plaintiff believing it had stopped—the porter, who had also come to the door, and was standing on the platform, told the plaintiff to get off, and that, in obedience to the direction of the porter, and believing by reason thereof that it was the time and place to do so, he stepped off the train, and was violently thrown to the ground, sustaining the injuries set forth. The defendant denied the material allegations of the amended complaint.

Without objection, his honor submitted the following issues: Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant as alleged in the complaint? Did the plaintiff contribute to his injury? And an inquiry as to damages.

As said by Mr. Justice Douglas in Tucker v. Satterthwaite, 120 N. C. 1, 118, 27 S. E. 45: "We are not inadvertent to the long line of decisions laying down the rule that the refusal of the court to submit an issue tendered by either party cannot be reviewed by this court unless exception is taken in apt time, nor do we wish to be understood as reversing or modifying it. * * * What we now say is that section 395 of the Code is mandatory—binding equally upon the court and upon counsel; that it is the duty of the judge, either of his own motion or at the suggestion of counsel, to submit such issues as are necessary to settle the material controversies arising in the pleadings; and that in the absence of such issues, or admissions of record equivalent thereto, sufficient to reasonably justify, directly or by clear implication, the judgment rendered therein, this court will remand the case for a new trial." In Pearce v. Fisher (at this term) 45 S. E. 638, two defendants were sued for injury alleged to have been sustained, one as landlord, and the other as a tenant, of a part of the hotel in which the plaintiff's goods were stored. The following issue was submitted: "Was the plaintiff injured by the defendants, or either of them, as alleged in the complaint?" The jury answered the issue: "Yes." Mr. Justice Walker says: "How can this court decide, from the verdict as thus rendered, whether the jury intended to say that the plaintiff was injured by both of the defendants, or only by one of them? To construe the verdict either way would be the merest conjecture. The answer of the jury to the issue would be just as appropriate if only one of the defendants had caused the injury as it would be if by joint action they had caused it. * * * Issues should not be submitted in such a way that when they are answered it will be left doubtful as to what the jury have found with respect to the liability of the parties." It is true, in the case cited the defendant excepted to the issue. In this case it will be seen that the allegations in the original complaint and the amended complaint are based upon entirely different, if not contradictory, statements of the plaintiff's cause of action. The first says that as he was proceeding to alight from the train the engineer gave a sudden jerk, which threw him violently to the ground, etc. If the jury found this to be true, he was clearly entitled to recover. The authorities in this court are uniform to that effect. The other cause of action consists of the allegation that as the train approached Palmyra he was told by the porter to alight; that the train had slowed down, and was moving slowly, having nearly stopped—he believing that it had stopped—and that the porter, standing on the platform, directed him to get off; that in obedience thereto he did step off, and, because of the fact that the train was moving more rapidly than he had supposed, he was thrown to the ground and injured. Now, certainly, both of these allegations cannot be true, nor is it so contended. In one view of the case, the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of the engineer, the porter taking no part in the transaction. In the other view, he was injured by the negligence of the porter, the engineer being entirely free from blame. We have held that the two causes of action may be joined in the complaint, and appropriate issues submitted to the jury presenting each phase of the controversy. Simpson v. Lumber Co. (at this term) 45 S. E. 469, and cases therein cited. The exception of the defendant to the amendment must therefore be overruled.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the exceptions to the charge, because, if the issues had presented each cause of action separately, many of the exceptions to the charge would not have arisen. Such error as may have crept into the charge is attributable to an effort to present the case to the jury in two contradictory aspects under one issue. The principles governing the rights and duties of passengers on railway trains have been so frequently and recently decided by this court that it would seem unnecessary to repeat them. If the jury found from the evidence that the facts alleged in the original complaint were true, and further found that there was no contributory negligence, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. The same may be said in respect to the second cause of action. But surely they could not answer both issues affirmatively.

The plaintiff testifies as follows: "I was sitting in the car, and the porter came through and called out, 'Palmyra Station.' I got up and walked to the door just as it got to the station. I stood in the door until it about hit the station, and it ran by the station, and temporarily stopped. As it ran by the station, the porter, who was standing on the platform of the car on the other side of me, came back and told me to get off. To the best of my belief, the train had stopped. As I was in the act of stepping off the second step from the bottom, it jerked and threw me out." This testimony, if true, entitles the plaintiff to recover. But it does not correspond with the allegation in the original complaint, in which no suggestion is made that he alighted from the train at the direction of the porter. The gravamen of that allegation is that the defendant's agent carelessly failed to give him a reasonable time in which to get off the train, and that almost immediately after stopping, before the plaintiff could possibly alight, he carelessly and negligently started the train. Nor does the testimony correspond with the allegation in the amended complaint, the gravamen of which is that the porter carelessly and negligently told him to get off the train, and that by reason thereof he believed that it was the time and place to get off, and that he could safely do so. He stepped off, and was violently thrown to the ground. The inference which we draw from this allegation is that, at the time the porter told him to alight, the train was moving too rapidly for him to do so safely, but that he relied upon the porter's judgment, and, believing that he could safely alight, was thrown from the train. While we recognize the well-settled principle that pleadings are to be construed liberally, with a view to substantial justice between the parties, it is equally well settled that the proof must conform substantially to the allegation. As was said by this court in Parsley v. Nicholson, 85 N. C. 209: "The rules of pleadings at common law have not been abrogated by the Code of Civil Procedure. The essential principles still remain, and have only been modified as to technicalities and matters of form. The object of pleading, both in the old and the new system, is to produce proper issues of law and fact, so that justice may be administered between the parties litigant with regularity and certainty." The cause of action stated in Simpson v. Lumber Co., supra, was the negligent conduct of the defendant in the discharge of its contractual duty to the plaintiff. It is allowable for the plaintiff to allege different acts of negligence, or that the negligence was committed in different ways. "It makes no difference, with respect to the plaintiff's right to recover, whether the burning was caused by a defective engine, or by setting on fire combustible material carelessly left by the defendant on its right of way." So in this case the same legal result would follow with respect to the plaintiff's right to recover, and the measure of damages, whether the injury was caused by the negligence of the engineer or of the porter. But as we have said, it could not be, in view of the allegations, the negligence of both. The issues should have been so submitted that the attention of the jury would have been directed to the testimony in both aspects of the case, so that, under proper instructions from the court, they would have answered the issues accordingly as they believed the evidence. If they had answered the first issue, in respect to the defendant's negligence, "Yes," and the second issue, in respect to contributory negligence, "No," that would have ended the controversy. If, however, they had answered the issues in respect to the first allegation in the negative, they would then have proceeded to consider the issues directed to the second allegation.

To the end that the cause may be submitted to a jury with issues drawn in accordance with this opinion, a new trial must be had. New trial.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). Concurring in the view of the court that "the same legal result would follow with respect to the plaintiff's right to recover and the measure of damages, whether the injury was caused by the negligence of the engineer or of the porter," it seems to me that it is immaterial which it was, and no detriment was caused by the jury not finding specifically which servant of the company was to blame. The defendant was to blame in either case, and that is all the plaintiff is called upon to prove. The jury have found the fact on which the plaintiff's right to recover depends, to wit, that he was injured by the negligence of the defendant in alighting from its cars at Palmyra at the time mentioned, and being thrown to the ground. The plaintiff could state the circumstances in his complaint in the different phases to meet the proof that might be offered. Simpson v. Lumber Co. (at this term) 45 S. E. 469. But that does not require an issue as to each, but the one issue "whether the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of the defendant as alleged in the complaint" should be sufficient, especially since the defendant did not ask for another issue, nor except to those submitted. Had the party been killed, and his personal representative had alleged, from uncertainty of evidence, the different phases besides the two in this complaint that he got off on the right-hand side of the car, and on the left-hand side, off the front end of the car, and off the rear end, and several other variant circumstances, must there be an issue on each? It seems there is but one issuable fact—the injury, by the negligence of the defendant, at the time and place—and the difference in statement of the attendant circumstances is merely evidential matter. I think there was no error committed by the judge below.

LAMBERTSON et al. v. VANN.

WILLS — CONSTRUCTION — EXECUTORS — POWERS — OPERATION OF REAL ESTATE — CREDITS — COMMISSIONS — REFERENCE — FINDINGS OF REFEREE — APPEAL — CONCLUSIVENESS.

1. Where testator directed the horses and mules on his plantation to be kept on the farm and used in the same manner and for the same purposes as if he were living, and provided that they should not be sold unless in the discretion of the executor it should be deemed best for the children, and directed the executor to rent the children's portion of the land from year to year, and manage the same for their best interest, so long as he was engaged in carrying out the provisions of the will, etc., the executor was empowered to carry on farming operations on the land during his administration of the estate.

2. Where the final accounting of an executor was referred, and the referee's findings of fact, objected to, were adopted by the court, such findings are conclusive on the Supreme Court on appeal.

3. Where an executor was authorized to conduct certain farming operations on testator's land pending settlement of the estate, and by reason of a failure of crops for a particular year the tenants threatened to abandon the same, and the executor found it necessary to take charge of them, and for this purpose bought the tenants' interest therein, he was properly credited with the amounts paid out for the purchase of such interest.

4. Where an executor expended a certain sum for building barns, stables, and other houses which were permanent improvements on land belonging to testator's children, and necessary for the proper cultivation of the land which the executor was required to cultivate during settlement of the estate, he was entitled to commissions on such expenditure.

5. Where during the settlement of an estate it became necessary to sell certain personal property, and the executor bid in the same for the benefit of testator's children, to be used in the cultivation of their land which he was required by the will to cultivate, and thereafter the property not consumed was delivered to a receiver and sold by him, the executor was entitled to credit on his account for the amount paid for the property, and not for the amount for which it was sold by the receiver.

Appeal from Superior Court, Northampton County; Winston, Judge.

Action by Lucy B. Lambertson and others against Albert Vann, executor of the estate of W. A. Lambertson, deceased. From a judgment settling the account, the executor and Lucy B. Lambertson and others appeal. Affirmed.

Peebles & Harris, for plaintiffs. T. W. Mason and Gay & Midyette, for defendant.

CONNOR, J. This action is prosecuted by the widow and children of W. A. Lambertson, deceased, against the defendant, as executor, for the purpose of having a construction of the will and for other relief.

Lambertson died in March, 1888, leaving a last will and testament in which he appointed the defendant, Vann, as his executor. The material parts of the will are as follows: In item 2 the testator directs that all the cotton now on the home farm and Clark place, and such other personal property as is not specially exempted from sale by the will, be sold, and the proceeds applied in the due course of administration to the payment of the debts, and distribution afterwards as provided in said will. The testator directs that the horses and mules now on the home place where he lived should be kept on said farm and used in the same manner and for the same purposes as if he were living, said horses and mules not to be sold unless, in the discretion of the executor, it was deemed best for the children. He directs his executor to rent out the children's portion of the land from year to year, and manage the same for the best interests of the children, so long as he is engaged in carrying out the provisions of the will. He gives to his wife, for and during the term of her life, the house and all the outbuildings connected therewith on the home place, together with land enough to constitute one-third in value of his land, to be allotted as dower, and after her death he gives the said land to his children now born, or to be thereafter born, in fee. He gives to his children, Brownie A. and Willie V., all the remainder of the home tract and Clark place not assigned as dower to his wife; and to his afflicted sister, for life, all the interest that he owns in the home place of his father, and after her death to his children in fee. The residue of the property he gives to his wife and children in equal portions. The defendant duly qualified as executor and entered upon the discharge of his duties.

The cause was referred to Walter Daniel, Esq., and he filed his report at fall term, 1897, of the superior court of Northampton county. Among other facts found by him are the following: That the defendant continued to act as executor until 1893, when a receiver was appointed, and the defendant turned over to him the management of the estate and such personal property as was then on hand, for which he took the receipt of the receiver; that the defendant, upon assuming the duties as executor, made an agreement with the widow of the testator to carry on the farming operations upon the land belonging to the estate in the same manner that they had been carried on during the life of the testator, dividing the proceeds upon the basis of one-third to the widow and two-thirds for the benefit of the children; that the farm was operated under said agreement from 1888 to 1892, inclusive, at which time the widow and the executor put an end to the said arrangement, and the executor, during the year 1893, conducted the farming operations on the land belonging to the children in excess of the dower; and that between September 10, 1892, and February 25, 1893, the executor built on the land belonging to the children certain farm buildings and outhouses for which he paid $496.04. The referee finds that this was a necessary expenditure and a permanent improvement, and allows him credit for the same, but allows no commissions thereon.

On December 28, 1892, the executor sold certain personal property, and bid in, for and on account of the children, certain articles to the amount of $690.74. The referee declined to allow him this amount, but does allow him the amount for which said property was afterwards sold by the receiver, to wit, $454.88. The executor filed his annual account of the said estate, and also of his farming operations, and the referee from said account states an account which is incorporated in his report. In his account the referee allows no commissions on certain items fully set forth in the report, nor does he allow interest on certain amounts or commission on amounts paid overseer, nor amount paid for board of overseer, nor on interest thereon.

Upon the facts found, the referee finds the following conclusions of law: That the executor was empowered under the will to conduct and carry on the farming operations; that the widow was entitled to one-third of the net profits of the said farming operations, and certain payments made to her in excess of said profits are charged against her distributive share of said estate, which is ascertained to be one-fourth thereof; that the amount which she owes the executor is not a lien on the estate in his hands belonging to the children; that the children are entitled to two-thirds of the net profits up to 1893, and to the whole of the profits for that year (1893), and to three-fourths of the estate in the hands of the executor. He thereupon proceeds to state an account of the dealings of the executor with the estate and of his farming operations, separating the receipts and disbursements from the two sources. He finds a balance due the estate October 25, 1897, of $1,963.72. Of this amount Mrs. Lambertson is entitled to $490, leaving due the children $1,472.79. Of the latter amount he has paid $1,253.61, leaving a balance due the children October 25, 1897, $219.18. From the operation of the farms he finds that there was a balance on hand of $1,429.86. Of this amount Mrs. Lambertson is entitled to one-third, $426.62, leaving due the children $953.24. This amount, with interest, and sales of the crop for 1893, aggregate $2,040, from which he deducts disbursements and commissions amounting to $677.37, leaving a balance due the children of $1,312.83, of which amount he has paid to the receivers $783.13, leaving $527.70 due the children October 25, 1897. The two accounts aggregate an indebtedness to the children of $746.88. To the report the plaintiffs filed a very large number of exceptions, the second, eleventh, and fifteenth of which were abandoned before his honor, who proceeds to overrule the others, from the first to seventy-first, inclusive. It is difficult to distinguish between those exceptions which point to conclusions of fact and those which point to conclusions of law. His honor states that a large number of the exceptions are pointed to items based upon the contention that the executor was not authorized to cultivate the farms. His honor adopted the conclusion of law as found by the referee, that under the provisions of the will the executor was authorized to carry on the farming operations, and we concur with his honor's ruling in that respect. We think it clear from the terms of the will that the testator intended that his executor should carry on the farming operations and manage the same to the best interest of the children in the same manner and for the same purposes as if he were living. This is shown by the direction that the horses and mules on his farm were not to be sold unless in the discretion of the executor it was deemed best for the children. The exceptions to the referee's findings of fact, which are adopted by his honor, are conclusive upon this court. We have carefully examined the accounts stated by the referee in the light of the testimony before him, and we see no reason for disturbing his manner of stating the accounts. It is done with great care and intelligence.

The plaintiffs insist that the executor should not be credited with amounts paid out for the purchase of the tenants' interest in the crops. The referee makes no specific finding in respect to this matter; but it appears from his accounts that he has found as a fact that his dealings in that respect were correct. It is impossible for us to say from the accounts and testimony whether the purchase made by the executor of the tenants' interest in the crops operated as a loss to the estate. It would seem that the estate suffered no loss by reason of this course pursued by the executor. It appears that during the year 1889 the tenants threatened to abandon the crops, and the executor found it necessary to take charge of them, and for that purpose bought the interest of the tenants. It is in evidence that the year 1889 was a bad crop year. One witness says, "Never knew a worse." And we cannot fail to take note of the fact, as a part of the history of the state, that the year 1889 was one of the most disastrous known among our farmers. It would hardly have been possible to have operated the farm without some loss, and it would have been impossible to have anticipated such disasters as came to the farming operations of the defendant and all other persons in Eastern North Carolina. It is difficult, looking backward, to adjust these accounts without danger of doing injustice to the parties. We see no reason for disturbing the conclusions to which the very intelligent referee has come in dealing with this matter. His honor approved his findings of law and fact in that respect.

The referee found that the expenditure of $496.04 for building on the children's land two barns, nine stables, and a two-story frame house for the overseer, a hen house, and a tobacco house were necessary, and were a permanent improvement to the property. He allows the executor for these items, but declines to allow him commissions for this disbursement. The defendant excepted to this ruling, and his honor sustained the exception, allowing defendant commissions on the disbursement. We concur with his honor's ruling in that respect.

The referee charged the defendant with the total amount of sales of personal property made December 23, 1892, $694.74. This property was delivered to the receiver and sold by him in January, 1894, for $454.88. The referee credited the defendant with the amount for which the receiver sold the property, and to this the defendant excepted. His honor sustained the exception, and credited him with the amount at which he bought in the property. It seems that in January, 1892, when the widow and executor put an end to the arrangement by which the lands were cultivated jointly, for the purpose of ascertaining the value of the widow's interest in the personal property, a sale thereof was made, and the defendant bought it in for the children at $694.74, this property consisting of horses and mules, farming implements, forage, etc., necessary for the cultivation of the farms. The same property was delivered to the receiver, except that part which had been consumed in the use. We concur with his honor's ruling in that respect. We can see no reason why the executor should suffer loss for the depreciation. We therefore adopt his honor's ruling.

His honor also sustained certain exceptions to the report of the referee in regard to commissions upon some small amounts, and we see no reason for disturbing his ruling in that respect.

The other exceptions of the defendant were overruled. A large number of the exceptions filed by the plaintiffs are to conclusions of fact, and, having been overruled by his honor, are conclusive upon us.

This litigation began in 1893. It would seem that it is to the interest of all the parties that it come to an end. We have a record on the plaintiffs' appeal of 165 pages, and on the defendant's appeal of 120 pages, a large part of which is repetition. We have 86 exceptions addressed to items ranging from 30 cents to $500. We have the assignments of error on the part of the plaintiffs, making no distinction between exceptions to matters of law and matters of fact. We have endeavored, with a great deal of labor, to carefully examine the questions in controversy. We see no reason for disturbing the conclusions to which his honor came. His honor states that "by consent of both plaintiffs and defendant the court took the papers in this case to consider the same, and this judgment is rendered out of term by consent of all of the parties." It is evident that his honor gave it a careful consideration, and we see no reason for disturbing his conclusions. We think that upon the plaintiffs' appeal the judgment should be affirmed.

Affirmed.

Defendant's Appeal.

The defendant in this case filed a number of exceptions, his honor sustaining a portion of them and overruling the balance. We have carefully examined the record, and we find no error in the action of the court in respect to the defendant's exceptions. The judgment upon the defendant's appeal must be affirmed.

We cannot refrain from saying that a volume of much smaller size and more clearness of statement would have enabled us to give the case a much more satisfactory investigation with much less cost to the parties.

Affirmed.

MORROW v. ATLANTA & C. AIR LINE RY. CO.

CARRIERS—PERSONS BOARDING TRAIN TO ASSIST PASSENGER TO BOARD IT—RIGHTS—DUTIES OF CARRIER—NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. A person going on a train for the purpose of assisting a passenger to board it, when such assistance was needed and was not furnished by the company, was not a trespasser.

2. In the absence of any rule prohibiting a person from going on a train to assist a passenger to board it, a conductor having notice of a person going on the train for such purpose must detain it a reasonable length of time to enable the person to render the necessary assistance and to leave it in safety.

3. Whether a conductor in charge of a train had notice that a person who entered it at a station did so merely for the purpose of assisting a passenger to board it, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

4. Whether one who stood near the steps of a coach as a person entered it merely for the purpose of assisting a passenger to board the coach was the conductor in charge of the train, or some other employé charged with the duty of providing for such person's safety while exercising the right of assisting a passenger, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

5. Whether a person who entered a train for the purpose of assisting a passenger to board it was given reasonable time to leave the train before it started, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

6. A person who, after boarding a train at a station to assist a passenger to board it, alights from the train while traveling at the rate of three to four miles an hour and with its speed steadily increasing, is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, precluding a recovery for the injuries sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gaston County; Neal, Judge.

Action by Chas. R. Morrow, by next friend, against the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. G. Mangum, for appellant. Geo. F. Basson and F. H. Busbee & Son, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligence.

On the night of the 27th of August, 1902, the plaintiff, his wife, Thomas Carson, and two other persons, went to the defendant's depot at Gastonia, with the plaintiff's sister, Mrs. York, and her six children, the oldest of whom was 15 years of age and the youngest 4 years of age, for the purpose of assisting them in boarding the train, which they intended to take that night for a distant point. When the train arrived, about 11 o'clock p. m., and after the passengers for that station had alighted, the plaintiff and Thomas Carson immediately assisted Mrs. York and her children to get on the train, but before they could find a vacant seat for them the train started, and Carson ran to the door and then to the platform, and jumped off the train without injury. When the plaintiff, who followed him, was alighting from the steps of the platform with his hand on the railing, or, to use his own words, when he let his feet down from the steps, there was a sudden jerk of the car upon which he had been standing, which broke his hold; his foot struck a pile of mail sacks which had been left on the ground near the crossing, and about 150 feet from the usual place where passengers alighted, and plaintiff was thereby thrown under the cars and severely injured. As he and Carson and Mrs. York and her children boarded the car, an employé of the defendant, who had on a uniform and held a lighted lantern in his hand, was standing near by and could see them as they got on the train. The plaintiff's wife bid Mrs. York and her children good-by, and remained outside and said nothing to the plaintiff, her husband, or to Carson, her brother-in-law. The latter was wearing his "everyday clothes." None of defendant's employés offered to help Mrs. York to get on the train. It was usual and customary to give signals before starting the train at that place by ringing the bell or by proclamation of the conductor, namely, "All aboard," but neither the plaintiff nor Carson heard a signal of any kind that night, though the usual signals might have been given without being heard, as there were eight or nine cars in the train. The train moved off before any of the passengers who got on at Gastonia could be seated. Plaintiff did not see the conductor, or he would have told him that he intended to board the train in order to help his sister, but he expected that the usual signals would be given and that he would have time to leave the train with safety. When the plaintiff fell from the train, it was running at the rate of "not more than 3 or 4 miles an hour." It had been customary for persons to be assisted in boarding the train at Gastonia by their friends or escorts, and it had frequently been done. One of the plaintiff's witnesses testified as follows: "I was the hotel porter and went to the depot that night to meet the train, and saw a railroad man with a lantern standing near the steps when the passengers were alighting. I don't know whether or not it was the conductor, or who it was. He had a lantern. All the employés have lanterns. I thought he was the conductor, but cannot swear to it." This is a sufficient recital of the leading or material facts necessary to an understanding of the case. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant moved to dismiss the action, or for judgment as in case of nonsuit, under the statute. The motion was allowed, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

The first question presented is whether there was any sufficient evidence of defendant's negligence which should have been submitted to the jury, for when a plaintiff's action is dismissed or he is nonsuited, under the provisions of the statute, the truth of the evidence is thereby admitted, and the plaintiff is entitled to have it considered in the strongest and most favorable light for him, and to have the benefit of every reasonable inference or deduction that can be drawn therefrom for the purpose of sustaining his cause of action. If the evidence tends to establish any state of facts entitling plaintiff to recover, no matter how the combination of those facts may be made, the plaintiff has a right to have the case submitted to the jury, for they might find just that state of facts. This principle is so well settled that it does not now require the citation of any authority to support it. In some respects this case is like that of Whitley v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 987, 29 S. E. 783. It was there held that a person who goes upon the train of a railroad company for the purpose of accompanying and assisting one of its passengers is not a trespasser, and is entitled to the protection of the company if the company's conductor in charge of the train has notice of his presence. The plaintiff's counsel in that case contended that such a person was a licensee, and, under the circumstances, entitled to "the consideration, care, and protection of the defendant," and the defendant's counsel, as the court then understood his position, did not seem to deny this contention of the plaintiff's counsel, but insisted that he had no right to receive from the company that same degree of attention and protection that would be due to a passenger. The court declined to discuss this contention of the defendant, but simply held that, whatever his precise status was, he was in any view entitled to protection and some degree of consideration for his safety. It is certainly not unlawful for one person to assist another to board a train for the purpose of taking passage thereon, when the situation of the passenger and the circumstances make it necessary, and especially so when no such assistance as is required by the passenger is offerred by any employé of the company. We need not decide whether it is the duty of carriers of passengers on railways, or their servants, to inform themselves of the presence of such persons on their trains, and to provide rules and regulations for that purpose, for that question is not necessarily involved in this case. It is sufficient at least to fix the company with liability that the conductor of its train, or other person in charge of it, has actual notice of the fact that a person who is not a passenger has gone upon its train for the purpose of rendering assistance to one of its passengers. If a person could ever be justified in giving such assistance, we think the plaintiff was in this case—assuming the truth of the evidence, as we must do—for Mrs. York had with her six children, all of them comparatively young, and was incumbered with several pieces of hand baggage and with some packages. She needed assistance, and the company did not furnish it. The plaintiff, therefore, was rightfully on the train. What, then, was the defendant's duty, if any, towards him? If its conductor had notice of his intention to go upon the train for the purpose of assisting Mrs. York, the plaintiff was entitled to reasonable time to render the necessary assistance to her and to leave the train in safety. It may be that railroad companies are authorized by law to provide by rules and regulations for such cases, but, in the absence of any such provision, the law does not prohibit a person from getting on a car, as the plaintiff did on this occasion. The only question, then, for decision is, was there any sufficient evidence to show that the defendant did know that plaintiff had gone upon the train to assist Mrs. York? We think there was. Whether it is sufficient to satisfy the jury and induce them to find the fact, is for them, and not for us, to decide. At the time the plaintiff and Mrs. York boarded the train, an employé of the company was standing near by in full view of them, so that he could see what was done and hear what was said. He must have seen that Mrs. Carson had so conducted herself towards the other parties as to indicate that Mrs. York and her children were the passengers, and that plaintiff and Carson were only assisting them. "Mrs. Carson bid Mrs. York and her children good-by," but said nothing to the plaintiff and Carson. This may have been slight evidence when considered by itself, but it was at least some evidence, and, when taken in connection with the other facts and circumstances testified to by the witnesses, was sufficient for the consideration of the jury. Whether the person who stood near the steps of the coach, as the plaintiff entered it, was the conductor, or some other employé of the defendant charged in law or in fact with the duty of providing for plaintiff's safety while exercising the lawful right of assisting one of the company's passengers, is a proper subject of inquiry for the jury, who, in passing upon it, will be guided by the facts as they may find them from the evidence, and the instructions of the court upon the law. There being some evidence of notice to the company, if the jury should find from that evidence that the company did in fact have notice that plaintiff had gone upon the train to assist Mrs. York, we do not think that it could be successfully contended that there was no evidence that plaintiff did not have reasonably sufficient time to assist Mrs. York and then leave the train before it started. Indeed, it appears that without any delay, and certainly without any unnecessary delay, he and Carson assisted Mrs. York and the children to get upon the train, and that before they could find a vacant seat for them the train left the station. This fact, as to whether the plaintiff had sufficient time to render the assistance and then leave the train with safety, was one for the jury to pass upon, but we are constrained to say that there was some evidence which tended to establish it.

But even if there was evidence of the defendant's negligence in this case, we do not think there was any error in the ruling of the court below, because the plaintiff, upon his own showing, was guilty of contributory negligence which was the proximate cause of his injury. When he found that the train was in motion and its speed steadily increasing, he should have notified the conductor of his situation, so that the train could be stopped, or he should have waited until it reached the next station before he attempted to get off. His failure to do so, and his attempt to alight from the train, which was then running at the rate of three or four miles an hour, was such negligence on his part as defeats his right of recovery. The plaintiff in this respect is certainly not entitled to any greater consideration than a passenger.

In the case of Burgin v. Railroad, 115 N. C. 673, 20 S. E. 473, Shepherd, C. J., for the court, says: "We think there can be no question as to the correctness of the ruling sustaining the demurrer. The general rule is that passengers who are injured while attempting to get on or off a moving train cannot recover for the injury. If the intestate, without any direction from the conductor, voluntarily incurred danger by jumping off the train while in motion, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. In addition to the authorities cited by the court, there are a great number to be found in other jurisdictions which abundantly sustain the proposition that it is contributory negligence to attempt to alight from a moving vehicle, although, in consequence of the refusal of the carrier to stop, the passenger will be taken beyond his destination, unless he is invited to alight by some employé of the carrier, whose duty it is to see to the safe egress of the passengers from the conveyance. The mere fact that the train fails to stop, as was its duty, or as the conductor promised to do, does not justify a passenger in leaping off, unless invited to do so by the carrier's agent, and the attempt was not obviously dangerous."

In Johnson v. Railroad, 130 N. C. 488, 41 S. E. 794, Clark, J., speaking for the court, and approving the charge of the court below, says: "The general rule is that a person who gets off a train while it is in motion is guilty of contributory negligence. It is the duty of the passenger, when he sees the train in motion, to ask for it to be stopped, and, if it is not done, he ought not to get off. To this general rule there are some exceptions, one of which is that if a passenger is commanded or invited by the conductor to get off while the train is in motion, and the train is going so slow that the danger of stepping or jumping off is not apparent to a reasonable man, and he does so and is injured, it would not be contributory negligence." The court, in Johnson v. Railroad, held that the evidence did not show conclusively that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence so as to bring the case within the principle announced in Neal v. Railroad, 126 N. C. 634, 36 S. E. 117, 49 L. R. A. 684, as there was some evidence from which the jury might infer that the plaintiff had been led by the action of the conductor to believe that it would be safe for him to alight from the train; and, if the jury so found, the case would come within the exception to the rule that it is negligence to alight from a moving train.

The principle of the cases cited is affirmed in Hinshaw v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1047, 24 S. E. 426. Indeed, all of the cases are based upon what was said by this court in Lambeth v. Railroad, 66 N. C. 494, 8 Am. Rep. 508, which has been conceded for many years to be a leading and controlling authority upon this question. See, also, Denny v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 840, 43 S. E. 847, and Gordon v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 565, 44 S. E. 25. Hutchinson, in his work on Carriers, § 641, states the doctrine to be that when a person attempts to get upon a railway train while in motion, without the necessity for doing so, induced by the conduct of the employees of the railroad company, and without an invitation to do so by its agent acting in the line of his duty, he is guilty of negligence per se, and precluded from the right to recover for the injury which may be thereby occasioned; and, even if the company had adopted the practice of receiving its passengers on its trains while in motion, it would be reckless conduct on the part of the company, or of those in charge of its trains, which, though, would not justify or excuse the equally reckless imprudence of the injured party.

We cannot see how the case of a passenger boarding a train while in motion can be distinguished in principle from the case of a passenger or other person, lawfully on the train, alighting from the train while it is moving. If one is negligent to the extent of barring his right of recovery, the other must necessarily be negligent to the same extent: Burgin v. Railroad, supra. In this case the plaintiff attempted to alight from a moving train, and was in the very act of alighting, when there was a sudden jerk of the train, which might have been expected under the circumstances, and he was thrown under the cars and injured. The train at the time was running with increasing speed, and the act of alighting from it at such a time was little, if anything, short of recklessness. It is unfortunate, indeed, that the plaintiff was thus injured, but it was due at least to his own misfortune, and not to any fault which can be imputed to the defendant as a direct cause of it. The plaintiff's act, according to his own version of the facts, was the proximate cause of the injury. This seems to us to be well settled as the law of such a case. By his evidence the plaintiff shows affirmatively, and beyond any dispute or controversy, if his evidence is to be taken as true—and it must be so regarded upon a demurrer to it—that his own negligence was, in law, the cause of the injury he sustained, and the rule laid down in Neal v. Railroad, supra, and Bessent v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 974, 44 S. E. 648, applies.

Although our decision that the plaintiff's own negligence was the proximate cause of the injury is in itself sufficient to sustain the ruling of the court below, we have discussed the question of the defendant's negligence, as that of the plaintiff's negligence could not have arisen unless there was negligence on the part of the defendant. It was necessary, therefore, to determine first whether the defendant had been negligent in causing the injury to the plaintiff. Gordon v. Railroad, supra.

The ruling of the court below upon the motion to dismiss was right. No error.

FEATHERSTON et al. v. CARR et al.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—ACTION FOR RECOVERY OF PREMISES—INJUNCTION RESTRAINING EXECUTION—PROPRIETY.

1. A married woman leased certain premises for two years, with privilege of renewal for three years more, her husband joining in the lease, but failing to acknowledge it. She sued an assignee of the lease for defaulted rent, alleging an agreement by him to pay an increased rental, which he controverted. She secured judgment, from which the assignee appealed, giving, under Code, § 1772, a bond to secure one year's rental, etc., and afterwards a sufficient additional bond. The landlady then began monthly suits for each installment of rent as it fell due, recovering judgments and issuing executions, until this litigation was enjoined as vexatious, the injunction being affirmed by the Supreme Court. When the two-year term expired, she began suit to recover the premises, relying on Code, § 1834, which provides that a married woman's lease for more than three years shall not be valid unless executed by her and her husband, and proved and acknowledged by them, as required with deeds. Held, that an order restraining execution on the landlady's judgment in this latter action was not within the rule authorizing the former injunction, and was erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by Clara M. Featherston and another against Patrick Carr and others. From an order permitting the prosecution of, but enjoining execution in, another action, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Locke Craig, for appellants. Merrick & Barnard, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The feme plaintiff leased to Carr & Ward the premises on South Main street, in the city of Asheville, which are described in the contract, for two years, with the privilege of renewing the lease, upon the same terms and conditions as are contained in the original agreement, for three additional years, should they so desire at the termination of the lease, provided that Carr & Ward should give to the lessor "sixty days' notice of their intention, prior to the expiration of the lease, should they decide not to take, and retain the said property for the additional period of three years." The lessees agreed to pay $900 per annum, in equal monthly installments, as rent, the installments to be paid in advance on the first day of each and every month. There are other conditions and stipulations in the lease, and it was specially provided therein that, if the lessees failed to pay any installment of rent when it should be due, or should fail to perform any of the conditions or stipulations of the contract for a period of five days after the lessor had given them notice of their omission or neglect, the lessor should have the right to re-enter and take possession of the premises, notice to them and all other formalities being waived in case of any default. The feme plaintiff's husband joined with her in the lease, but the execution of the same was not acknowledged by him, though her acknowledgment and privy examination were taken. The defendants, Carr & McIntyre, are occupying the premises under an assignment of the said lease to them by the receiver of the assets of Carr & Ward, and a further agreement between them and the feme plaintiff made in the latter part of July, 1901, to the effect that they should continue to hold the premises under the lease to Carr & Ward, and in accordance with its terms and conditions, upon the payment of an increased rent of $100 per month. This is the plaintiffs' allegation, the defendants alleging that they were to pay only $900 per annum, as provided by the lease to Carr & Ward, and that they did not contract to pay the increased rent. In August, 1901, or about that time, the feme plaintiff instituted summary proceedings before a justice of the peace, under the statute, for the possession of the premises and the recovery of the rent then due, alleging that the defendants had failed to pay the rent. The justice gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed to the superior court, and executed a bond in the sum of $1,350, to secure one year's rent and the damages, as required by the statute (Code, § 1772), in order to stay the execution, and this bond was afterwards increased by the superior court by $1,200. The two bonds for $2,550 are apparently sufficient in amount to secure the rent, at the increased rate, and the damages for two years from the beginning of the lease, and the costs. On the first or second day of each succeeding month after the first suit was brought the plaintiff instituted suits before a justice of the peace for the recovery of the installments of the rent which had matured, obtained judgments, and issued execution thereon, and further threatened to continue the institution of similar suits at the beginning of each month thereafter during the continuance of the lease. Thereupon the defendants, their first appeal having been duly docketed, moved in the superior court, upon affidavit in that case, to restrain the plaintiff from proceeding under the executions issued upon the judgments already rendered, and from instituting any further proceedings for the recovery of rent alleged to be due under the lease; and the plaintiff, at the hearing of the said motion, was by the order of the court enjoined "from instituting or prosecuting any other or further suits against the defendants for or on account of the rents sued for in the action, and from issuing or having issued any execution or executions on the judgments heretofore rendered in the cause now pending on appeal." The plaintiff appealed from said order, and this court affirmed the decision of the lower court at the last term upon the grounds stated in the opinion. Featherstone v. Carr, 132 N. C. 800, 44 S. E. 592. After the expiration of the two years, the plaintiff instituted summary proceedings before a justice of the peace against the defendants for the possession of the premises. Upon motion of the defendants in the original case, which was pending in the superior court, Judge Moore ordered that the plaintiff be permitted to prosecute her new action to judgment, but enjoined her, until the hearing of the cause then pending in the superior court, from issuing any execution upon her judgment for the possession of the premises. The plaintiff excepted to this order, and appealed.

The question presented by her appeal, therefore, is whether Judge Moore should have granted the injunction, and upon this question we are with the plaintiffs. The first order of injunction, the one which we affirmed (132 N. C. 800, 44 S. E. 592), was issued to protect the defendants from a multiplicity of suits and to prevent vexatious litigation, and our decision was put upon the ground that all of the matters in controversy between the parties arose out of the lease, and that the question which was involved in the first suit was the same in principle as the one presented in the next and all subsequent suits, though the latter were brought to recover different installments of rent. The particular allegation in these suits was that the lease had been forfeited, and the right of the lessor to re-enter had accrued by reason of the failure of the defendants to pay the rent, and therefore the only matters in controversy were the right to the possession of the premises, and the right to recover the different installments of rent as they successively became due and payable. All of these matters, it was held, could be settled in one suit, and, in order to carry out the spirit and purpose of our present system of procedure, it was decided that, as the plaintiff's rights were fully secured by the bond of the defendants, she should be required to desist from proceeding under the judgments and executions already obtained and from bringing new suits, as such action on her part tended to harass the defendants, without any real benefit to the plaintiff which upon any principle of equity she was entitled to enjoy, as the rights of the parties could easily be determined in the one action, and that she was in no danger of loss or damage. We adhere to this view of the case, as it was then presented to us, but we do not think that the present appeal involves any such question as we then decided, but one that is quite different in fact and in law. The last suit brought by the plaintiff was for the possession of the premises, and was founded, not upon the fact that there had been a default in the payment of the rent, but upon the allegation that the lease itself had expired by its own limitation, it being a lease for two years only, under the provisions of the statute that no lease or agreement for a lease by a married woman of her lands and tenements to run for more than three years shall be valid, unless the same be executed by her and her husband, and proved and acknowledged by them, and her privy examination taken, as required by law in the case of probate of deeds of married women. Code, § 1834. We deem it unnecessary to decide the question raised by the plaintiff as to whether the lease had expired, for we are of the opinion that in any view of the case the last suit does not come within the range of the principle upon which the first injunction was granted and sustained by us. It is based upon an entirely new cause of action, which, in any possible development of it, could not subject the defendants to a multiplicity of suits or to vexatious litigation. If it is decided in that suit that the lease has expired, the plaintiff surely should be entitled to immediate possession of the premises. The plaintiff by no possibility can recover more than the possession of the premises, and the damages accrued since the expiration of the lease. It is an ordinary action to assert and enforce a right which has accrued since the first suits were brought, and does not involve any element such as in those suits entitled the defendants to be protected by the restraining power of the court.

It appears in the record that the plaintiffs have recovered judgment in the last suit for the possession of the leased premises, and, so far as appears, no appeal has been taken by the defendants. There was some dispute between counsel in this court as to the correctness of the record in this respect, and as to whether the paper containing the recital of facts was properly a part of the record in the case, and for this reason we would not conclude the defendants by any decision upon those facts, as we think it can be avoided. We will say, though, that, if it is true that there has been no appeal from that judgment, that fact furnishes an additional reason why the injunction should not be continued and the plaintiffs restrained from issuing an execution for the purpose of being put into possession of the property. If the defendants have not appealed, and that judgment stands unreversed, it would seem that the fact of the expiration of the lease has been adjudicated, and that the defendants are estopped from longer asserting that it still subsists.

If the appeal of the plaintiff from the order of the court, affirming the ruling of the clerk upon the plaintiff's motion to modify the injunction of Judge Moore and to permit her to issue execution upon her judgment for the possession of the premises, is properly before us—and we think that it is not—we discover no error in the decision of the lower court upon that question. The clerk had no jurisdiction or power to amend or modify Judge Moore's order. The permission to issue execution in that order was manifestly intended to be granted only by the judge of the court, and not by the clerk. The latter is not "the court," in the sense of those words as used in the order.

There was error in the ruling of the judge by which the plaintiff was enjoined from issuing execution upon the judgment she obtained before F. N. Waddell, justice of the peace, for the possession of the premises in dispute, which judgment is described in the order. It will be so certified to the end that the injunction may be dissolved, and that such other and further proceedings may be had as are in accordance with the law.

Error.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 18, 1903.)

MASTER-INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE — FALL OF TRUCK — OBVIOUS DANGER — KNOWLEDGE OF SERVANT—"LIABILITY" OF TRUCK TO FALL.

1. Plaintiff was employed to load trucks with lumber, placing it in a kiln, and to move the trucks from the kiln to the factory when the lumber was dry. Plaintiff was directed to go behind or in the rear of the loaded trucks in removing them from the kiln, which was a safe way, but, instead of doing so, at the time he was injured, he went under the truck and applied the force or pressure from beneath, and by reason thereof the truck fell, causing the injury. Held, that the plaintiff's own negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

2. Where a servant chooses to do the work, which it is his duty to do, by a method known to him to be dangerous, contrary to the directions of the master, the master is not liable for an injury caused thereby, whether the danger be obvious or not.

3. Where a servant was injured by the fall of a truck which it was his duty to move, and which fell by reason of his effort to move it, the master's responsibility does not depend on the "liability" of the truck to fall, since he is only required to provide against what he could reasonably have foreseen would result from any defect in the appliance.

Appeal from Superior Court, McDowell County; Long, Judge.

Action by Alney Whitson against T. F. Wrenn. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Avery & Ervin, for appellant. E. J. Justice, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The plaintiff was an employé of the defendant in his furniture factory, and while engaged in his work received injuries which he alleges were caused by the defendant's negligence. At the time he was injured he was loading trucks with lumber, and placing the same in the kiln for drying, and in moving them from the kiln, when the lumber was dried, to the factory. The evidence tended to show that each of the trucks was made of two pieces of lumber 6 to 10 feet long, 14 inches wide, and 2 inches thick, which were nailed together with 4-inch blocks between them at each end and at the middle, and near each end there were wheels. The trucks were about 6 feet long by 10 inches high, and were 8 inches wide, and when placed on the rails they would not stand without being held or supported, until they were partly loaded with lumber placed across them. There was no axle or connecting rod between these separate trucks. The trucks held about 4,000 feet of lumber, and when they were loaded the kiln was full from side to side and to within 18 inches of its top. The plaintiff was directed by the foreman or superintendent, in removing the loaded trucks from the kiln, to go behind or in the rear of them, and instead of doing so on this occasion he went under the truck, which he was attempting to remove, and applied the force or pressure from beneath, and by reason thereof the trucks fell and he was injured. It is not necessary to state any more of the testimony in order to present the points upon which the case is decided.

The defendant requested the court to give the following instruction: "If the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff was directed in removing the lumber from the kiln to go behind or in the rear of the trucks and apply pressure from behind or in the rear of the trucks in order to remove the same from the kiln, and you further find that this was a safe way, and that if it had been done the plaintiff would not have been injured, and you further find that the plaintiff, instead of adopting this method, went under the truck which was to be removed from the kiln and applied force from under and below the truck, and was injured in consequence of so doing, then the plaintiff's own negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, and you should answer the first issue 'No.'" The court refused to give this instruction as it was asked to be given by the defendant's counsel, but gave it with this modification, that, in order to answer the first issue "No," under the instruction prayed for, the jury must, in addition to the facts stated therein, further find that the method of applying the force to the loaded truck as used by the plaintiff, that is, by pushing the truck from beneath, "was obviously dangerous, and that plaintiff knew it, or could have known it by the exercise of due care." We do not think that the modification of the instruction by the court was correct. It can make no difference whether the method employed by the plaintiff for moving the truck was obviously dangerous or not. This is not the case of a servant who is ordered or commanded by his master, or by some one having authority over him, to perform a certain duty, when obedience to the order will be attended with obvious danger. It is the duty of the servant, it is true, to obey the orders given to him, unless obedience to them will be obviously dangerous, in which case he has the right, and it is his duty to himself, to disobey them. The law requires that he should do so, or suffer the consequences of his recklessness. Our case is the very converse of the one stated. Here the servant was ordered to do his work in a safe way, and he preferred to do it in another and what proved to be a dangerous way. Why should the master be liable if a servant acted in disobedience to his orders and was thereby hurt? It must be admitted that he was the author of his own injury. If it was necessary that the method adopted by him should have been not only in disobedience of his orders, but in itself dangerous, in order to visit upon him the consequences of his refusal to observe his master's directions, it surely is not required that it should have been obviously dangerous. It is quite sufficient to bar his recovery if he knew that his method was a dangerous one and chose to do his work in that way rather than in the manner pointed out by his master. Why should the danger be obvious if he had knowledge of it? If it had appeared that obedience to his master's orders as to the manner of moving the truck was obviously dangerous, he had a right to refuse to do the work, but even then he could not select another and dangerous way to do it and charge his master with the consequence thereof, and especially if the danger of the method which he adopted was known to him at the time.

It is true that in Lloyd v. Hanes, 126 N. C. 362, 35 S. E. 612, this court said: "It is only where a machine is so grossly or clearly defective that the employé must know of the extra risk that he can be deemed to have voluntarily and knowingly assumed the risk." It will be observed that the reference to the obviousness of the defect in the machine is used by the present Chief Justice, in speaking for the court in that case, for the purpose of showing that the servant must be in some way charged with knowledge of the defect. It is the knowledge of the defect and the consequent danger to himself that bars his recovery, if the servant chooses the dangerous method of doing the work, instead of a safe one or that pointed out by the master, and it makes no difference how that knowledge is acquired, or whether it is actual knowledge or such as must be implied from the obviousness of the defect and the fact that the danger is not only apparent but manifest. In Lloyd v. Hanes the court was referring to the case of a servant who was acting under instructions from the master to use a dangerous machine or to do a particular act which was in itself dangerous, but which was not obviously so, and not to a case like ours, where the servant departed from the instructions he received from his master and chose to act upon his own judgment. The question involved in the case of Lloyd v. Hanes related to the voluntary assumption of risk which was incident to the service, and the court distinguished between the mere knowledge of a defect in the machine, which made it dangerous, and the voluntary assumption of risk by the servant; while the case at bar, so far as this particular instruction of the court is concerned, does not involve the doctrine of the assumption of risk so much as it does the disobedience of orders, which was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff. The two cases depend upon entirely different principles.

The plaintiff in this case has simply done something which his master virtually told him not to do. He substituted his own will for that of his employer, and his case comes within the maxim, "Volenti non fit injuria." No man by his own voluntary and wrongful act can impose a liability on another, nor will he be permitted to take any advantage of his own wrong and willfulness. The doctrine that a servant is not negligent in undertaking the performance of a dangerous work for his master, unless there is obvious danger in it, is a correct principle, and is strikingly illustrated by several cases decided by this court. Thomas v. R. R., 129 N. C. 392, 40 S. E. 201; Allison v. R. R., 129 N. C. 336, 40 S. E. 91; Patton v. R. R., 96 N. C. 455, 1 S. E. 863. A passenger who has been injured by alighting from a moving train, under the direction of the conductor, may recover for the injuries received, unless the act itself was obviously so dangerous that in its careful performance the inherent probabilities of injury were greater than those of safety. Hinshaw v. R. R., 118 N. C. 1047, 24 S. E. 426. But this principle has no place in this case. Instead of the plaintiff having been commanded to do a dangerous act, it is assumed in the instruction, and there was evidence to show, that he was ordered to do the particular work assigned to him in a safe way, but elected to do it in his own way, which turned out to be a dangerous one, and which actually resulted in his injury. The law, under such circumstances, refers the injury to his own fault, and not to any wrong on the part of his employer.

The instruction contained in plaintiff's third prayer should not have been given, as it was apt to mislead the jury. The defendant's responsibility to the plaintiff for any injury received while in the performance of his duty did not and could not depend upon the "liability" of the trucks to fall. Such an instruction as that given by the court in response to plaintiff's third prayer has been disapproved by this court in Williams v. R. R., 119 N. C. 746, 26 S. E. 32. The employer is only required to provide against what he could reasonably have foreseen would result from any defect in the machine which he requires his servant to use, and not against the consequences of accidents that may or may not occur. It was therefore held, in Williams v. R. R., supra, that where a servant was injured by the falling of a piece of timber, which was being raised by a rope fastened to it, it was error to charge the jury that the defendant, the master, was negligent if the rope was so fastened to the timber as to be "liable" to slip off, so that the timber would fall and injure the servant, who was at the time assisting in the work of raising it. There was error in modifying the defendant's prayer and in giving the instruction in response to the plaintiff's third prayer, for which there must be another trial.

New trial.

CITY OF ASHEVILLE v. WEBB et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 18, 1903.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—BOND ISSUES—ELECTIONS—STATUTORY REQUIRE-MENTS—NOTICE.

1. Although a city has a right to refund its bonded debt without submitting the question to popular vote, if it chooses to submit the same to popular vote in accordance with a special act of the Legislature, passed for the purpose, it must follow the method of submission prescribed by such act.

2. Priv. Laws 1903, p. 14, c. 6, authorized a city to issue bonds on the vote of the majority of the qualified voters at an election held in the same manner as elections for mayor and aldermen, and further provided that the first election should be held whenever the board of aldermen might order the same, but, if the proposition was then rejected, subsequent elections could be held only "after 30 days' public notice." Priv. Laws 1895, p. 590, c. 352, revising the charter of said city, provided that elections of mayor and aldermen should be held under the rules prescribed for elections to the General Assembly. The general election law (Acts 1899, p. 658, c. 507) does not require any public notice of elections to the General Assembly. Held, that no public notice of the first election on the bond issue was required.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Submitted controversy by the city of Asheville against C. A. Webb & Co. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Davidson, Bourne & Parker, for appellant.

MONTGOMERY, J. This is a controversy submitted without action under section 567 of the Code upon an agreed statement of facts. The defendants contracted to buy from the plaintiffs $40,000 of bonds issued under the provisions of chapter 6, p. 14, of the Private Laws of 1903, and afterwards refused to receive and pay for the bonds on the ground that they were illegal, for the reason that the plaintiff had failed to give 30 days' public notice of the election which had been held upon the question as to whether the bond issue should be "approved" or "not approved." No notice of the election on the bond issue held on the 5th day of May, 1903, the regular election day of officers for the city of Asheville, and the time prescribed by law therefor, was published for 30 days prior to the said election. But a resolution was passed by the board of aldermen, a majority being present in regular session, in the following words: "Ordered by the unanimous vote of the board of aldermen present that an election be held at the time of the holding of the next regular election of officers of the city of Asheville in May, 1903, upon the question of issuing $781,500 of refunding bonds in accordance with terms, conditions, and provisions of the act of the Legislature of North Carolina duly adopted on January 24, 1903, and entitled 'An act to authorize the city of Asheville to issue bonds to refund its debt.'" A majority of the qualified electors of the city voted in approval of the bond issue, and the result of the election was duly canvassed by the board of canvassers of the city of Asheville, and proclamation thereof made by the chief of police of said city within the time prescribed by law for the same.

Section 4 of the Acts of 1903 is in the following words: "Sec. 4. That said bonds shall not be issued nor said taxes levied until authorized by vote of a majority of the qualified voters of the said city at a public election to be held in the same manner as elections are or may hereafter be held in said city for the election of mayor and aldermen thereof, and at such election those who favor the issuing of said bonds and levying the taxes herein provided for shall vote ballots with the word 'Approved' written or printed thereon, and those opposed to issuing said bonds shall vote ballots with the words 'Not Approved' written or printed thereon; and if any such election majority of the qualified voters of said city shall vote ballots with the word 'Approved' written or printed thereon, then the said mayor and board of aldermen shall, as may be required under the terms of this act, issue said bonds, and after their sale or exchange, or the sale or exchange of any portion thereof, as hereinbefore provided, levy a tax sufficient to meet interest and principal thereof when due, as hereinbefore specified. The first election under this act shall be held whenever the board of aldermen may order same, not less than thirty days after the date of said order, and if at such election a majority of the qualified voters of said city shall not vote in favor of issuing said bonds, then the board of aldermen of said city shall at any time, and as often thereafter as they deem best, not oftener, however, than once in any one year, order an election to be held under the rules and regulations prescribed by law for the election of mayor and aldermen of said city, and after thirty days' public notice thereof, and at each of such elections, the ballots shall be as hereinbefore directed; and if at any such elections the majority of the qualified voters of said city shall cast ballots in favor of the issuing of said bonds as aforesaid, then the said bonds shall be issued as may be required under the terms of this act by said mayor and board of aldermen, to be applied to the purpose and upon the terms and conditions hereinbefore stated in this act." The plaintiff's contention is that the act authorizing the issue of the bonds does not require a public notice of 30 days of the first election be given under section 4 of the act, and that the election, as held, was legally held, and that the bonds are valid; while the defendants contend that the failure to give such notice was a fatal defect, and the bonds are invalid and void. His honor held that the act had not been complied with in respect to the notice of the election, and that the refunding bonds were invalid and void, and that the defendants were not required to take and pay for the same. Judgment was entered accordingly.

It will be seen upon the reading of the above-quoted section of the act that public notice of the holding of the first election is not required. A public notice of 30 days of subsequent elections on the same question in case the first should be adverse to the bond issue is made necessary by the act. The order of the board of aldermen seems to have been considered by the General Assembly as a sufficient notice of the first election to be held under the act. The plaintiff, without submitting the question to a vote of its registered voters, had the right to refund its bonded indebtedness; but, as it preferred to submit the question to a vote of the people under an act of the General Assembly passed for that purpose, the method prescribed by the act must be followed. Wadsworth v. City of Concord (at this term) 45 S. E. 948. And the only question, as we have seen, submitted to us in this case is whether the act of assembly above referred to requires a 30-days public notice of the first election held under section 4 of the act. His honor, as we have said, thought it was. We do not concur in that view. In section 4 of the act of 1903 the election was required to be held in the same manner as elections were or might be hereafter held in that city for the election of mayor and aldermen; and under section 10, c. 352, p. 590, of the Private Laws of 1896—an act to amend, revise, and consolidate the charter of the city of Asheville—elections for mayor and aldermen were required to be held under the same rules as were prescribed, or might be thereafter prescribed, for the election of members of the General Assembly (the powers and duties in such rules and regulations conferred upon and directed to be exercised by the sheriffs being conferred upon the marshal of the city, etc.). Under the general election law (chapter 507, p. 658, Acts 1899) we find no requirements of any public notice of an election for members of the General Assembly. It is required by section 14 of that act that the county board of elections shall make publication of the names of the persons elected as registrars of voters for townships, wards, or precincts at the courthouse door immediately after such appointment, and that is the only requirement of any public notice concerning the election for members of the General Assembly that we find in the act. We are therefore of the opinion that the act of 1903, under which the election was held, did not require any public notice of the election. It does not appear from the facts agreed that there was a publication at the courthouse door of the names of the persons who were selected as registrars of voters, and it may not be out of place to add here that, if notice of the appointment of the registrars of voters in the several wards of Asheville were not published at the courthouse door immediately after they were appointed, in conformity to section 14, c. 507, p. 663, of the Acts of 1899, and that omission is known to the defendants, the bonds might be invalid in their hands. Duke v. Brown, 96 N. C. 127, 1 S. E. 873; Claybrook v. Commissioners, 117 N. C. 456, 23 S. E. 360; Debnam v. Chitty, 131 N. C. 657, 43 S. E. 3.

MURDER — EVIDENCE — TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE — SUFFICIENCY — INSTRUCTIONS — JURY — SPECIAL VENIRE — DRAWING JURY — OBJECTIONS — WAIVER.

1. Code, § 913, provides that the Governor shall have power to appoint any judge to hold special terms of the superior court in any county, and section 914 provides that when it shall appear to the Governor, by certificate of a judge or board of county commissioners, that there is such an accumulation of criminal or civil actions as require a special term, he shall order one, etc. Held, that where the commission for a special term recited an accumulation of criminal business as a reason therefor, the court was not restricted to the trial of indictments found before that term.

2. Code, § 1739, provides that the names of veniremen drawn from the box, who are freeholders, shall constitute a special venire. Held, that a finding of the trial court as a fact that a certain number of persons whose names were drawn were not freeholders, and that the remainder were, was binding on the appellate court on appeal, and fatal to an exception to quash the venire on the ground that in determining who were freeholders the court consulted the tax lists of the county, officers of the court who were not sworn, and other sources.

3. The defendant was not entitled to except to the rejection of the veniremen.

4. Defendant could not complain of the court's action, he not having exhausted his peremptory challenges.

5. Though it is the better practice to swear officers and others giving opinion as to whether persons drawn are freeholders, the conduct of the judge was not prejudicial to a defendant.

6. The trial court's finding as a fact, in a criminal case, that certain jurors were indifferent, is not reviewable on appeal.

7. Sup. Ct. Rules 32, 34 (43 S. E. v), require an appellant to set forth in his brief the several grounds of exceptions and authorities relied on, etc. Held that, where on appeal in a criminal case certain exceptions are omitted from the briefs of appellant, they will be taken as abandoned.

8. Under Code, § 977, providing that a principal felon and an accessory before the fact may be indicted and tried together, where a principal was tried on a special venire, his accessory before the fact might be indicted and tried at the same time.

9. An objection that the accessory could not be tried on a special venire was of no avail on appeal where the jury had been passed on, and each juror accepted before objection made and without exhausting peremptory challenges.

10. On a prosecution for murder a witness testified that one of defendants told him and the other defendant that a colored man staying with S. had money, and that he wanted them to hold up the colored man and get the money. Held, that it was proper to admit the evidence of such witness before the examining magistrate to the effect that the first defendant had during the same conversation stated that a brother of S. had some money, and that it would be no trouble to get it, and that he could take some men and go there and get it, both statements being part of the same conversation.

11. Inasmuch as an intent to commit robbery was the purpose of the crime charged, the evidence was competent as evidence of a different offense of the same kind.

12. The evidence was admissible as a declaration of defendant in the nature of res gestae.

13. On a prosecution for murder, evidence of a conversation between defendant and a certain person the week after the murder, and which tended to show defendant's connection with the crime, and which was corroborative of the testimony of such other person, was properly admitted.

14. On a prosecution for murder there was testimony showing that one of defendants had procured the other to make a journey to the home of deceased and there murder him, and that the former defendant had given the other certain canned goods when the slayer started. A witness testified that the defendant who did the killing bought some canned goods of him the day before the killing. Held that, for the purpose of aiding the witness in fixing the date,

It was proper to allow him to state that it was on "Tuesday or Wednesday" that he heard of the defendant who did the killing being at the place where it was in evidence he had spent the night of the murder.

15. On a prosecution for murder it was not error to exclude an indictment against a witness for the state which would merely have shown, if admitted, that he had been charged with the murder, his whole testimony establishing his participation therein.

16. On a prosecution for murder the court charged that the jury must carefully consider the testimony of a certain witness as he stood before the jury as an accomplice, declined to charge that it was dangerous to act exclusively on the testimony of an accomplice, and that the jury should require confirmatory testimony, or to charge that the unsupported testimony of an accomplice must produce entire belief; but the court did charge on reasonable doubt, telling the jury that, while they might convict on the testimony of the accomplice, they should be cautious in so doing. Held, that the court's conduct was proper.

17. A conviction may be had on the unsupported testimony of an accomplice.

18. The appellate court cannot entertain a motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered testimony in a criminal case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Columbus County; Moore, Judge.

J. B. Register and another were convicted of murder in the first degree, and they appeal. Affirmed.

John D. Bellamy, C. M. Bernard, and Donald McRacken, for appellants. Lewis & Schulken and the Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, O. J. The prisoner Jabel B. Register is indicted and convicted of murder in the first degree, and H. B. Register, his father, is indicted in the same bill, and convicted of being an accessory before the fact. The evidence of the state, if believed, showed that on Saturday afternoon, March 28, 1903, Jabel met Cross Edmundson and told him his father (H. B. Register) wished to see him; that together they went up to the house of H. B. Register, who told them that Jim Staley, a colored man staying with Jesse Soles, had between $1,000 and $2,000, and he wanted them to "hold up Jim Staley and get his money, and kill him, if necessary"; that H. B. Register furnished them with two guns he had ready, and some canned goods in a tow sack, and under H. B. Register's direction they left, about 10:30 at night, to go down to commit the robbery; that the place where Jim Staley resided being some miles off, after traveling part of the way they lay down in the woods and slept till next morning, when they resumed their journey, and then spent the day near a stillhouse till about dusk, when they started to Jesse Soles' house, where Jabel Register went up to the window and fired both barrels through the window into the house, killing Jesse Soles and Jim Staley; he then entered the room, remained a while, came out, and left; the house was soon afterwards in a blaze, and Cross Edmundson, when three or four miles away on their return, asked Jabel what it meant, and after some hesitation he replied that "he reckoned his papa and Jesse Soles were having a settlement." The only direct evidence is that of Cross Edmundson, the accomplice, which is full, minute, and dramatic in its details. There were witnesses, and proof of sundry circumstances, which, if believed, strongly corroborated Edmundson at sundry points in his narrative. The prisoners were tried at a special term, the commission reciting in the ordinary form that there was such an accumulation of criminal business as rendered a special term necessary. Code, § 914. The prisoners moved for a continuance on the ground that, this bill being found at that special term, it was not part of the accumulation of criminal business specified in the commission as a reason for ordering such special term, and hence the judge had no power to try them; and the prisoners excepted.

The first exception is to the refusal of this motion, and is without merit. The power of the Governor to order special terms is not restricted to instances where there is accumulation of business, nor when such fact is recited as a reason in the commission is the power of the judge restricted to the trial of indictments found before that term. Code, § 913; State v. Lewis, 107 N. C. 967, 12 S. E. 457, 13 S. E. 247, 11 L. R. A. 105; State v. Turner, 119 N. C. 841, 25 S. E. 810.

The second exception is for the refusal of the motion to quash the venire on these facts: The judge ordered a special venire of 200, and the names were drawn from the box in open court as provided by section 1739 of the Code, which provides that "the names so drawn (being freeholders) shall constitute a special venire." The court undertook to ascertain whether those whose names were so drawn were freeholders or not, "and ascertained from the tax list of the county, the officers of the court, and other sources, that 37 (of 237 names so drawn) were not freeholders," and the names of these 37 were not placed on the venire, leaving 200. The case on appeal further says that the officers and others from whom such information was had were not sworn, but that it appeared that the names of none of the 37 were on the tax list of 1902 as owners of realty; that there was no suggestion or evidence that any one of them was a freeholder; that there was no objection or exception to this mode of proceeding, nor any request that the officers or other persons giving information be sworn; and the judge found at the time, as a fact, that none of the 37 was a freeholder, and that the 200 were freeholders. This finding of fact is binding on us, and is fatal to the exception. Besides, the prisoners made no exception at the time, nor can they except to the rejection of a juror; since their right is "to reject, not to select," and, moreover, they are in no position to complain, for they did not exhaust their peremptory challenges. The practice of drawing the venire from the box in open court was specially commended in State v. Brogden, 111 N. C. 656, 16 S. E. 170. Other cases are State v. Moore, 120 N. C. 570, 28 S. E. 697; State v. Dixon, 131 N. C. 808, 42 S. E. 944; State v. Utley, 132 N. C., at page 1032, 43 S. E. 820. In State v. Cody, 119 N. C. 908, 26 S. E. 252, 56 Am. St. Rep. 692, the court said, "It is not error in the trial judge, when ordering a special venire, to direct the sheriff to summon only freeholders," and in the present case the judge ascertained that fact himself, instead of leaving it to the sheriff to determine. There was, and could be, no prejudice to the prisoners in what was done, but it will always be better practice to swear the officers and others giving information on such occasions.

The able counsel of the prisoners who entered these two exceptions doubtless did so out of abundant caution, not relying upon them himself, but being uncertain "how they might strike the court."

The third exception is to the indifference of two jurors who the court, as the "trier of the facts," found as a fact were indifferent. Such finding is not reviewable. State v. De Graff, 113 N. C. 688, 18 S. E. 507; State v. Potts, 100 N. C. 457, 6 S. E. 657; State v. Greene, 95 N. C. 611; State v. Collins, 70 N. C. 241, 16 Am. Rep. 771.

The fourth, fifth, and sixth exceptions are omitted from the brief of the prisoner's counsel, and therefore we take it they are abandoned (Rules 32 and 34, 131 N. C. 831, 43 S. E. 7), but at any rate they are without merit. The fourth exception was to the trial of H. B. Register by the special venire, on the ground that a special venire can be drawn only in capital cases, but the Code (section 977) provides that the principal felon and an accessory before the fact may be indicted and tried together. Further, the jury had already been passed upon, and each juror accepted, before the objection was made, and without exhausting the peremptory challenges. It is a conclusive presumption in such case that the jury is unobjectionable. State v. Pritchett, 106 N. C. 667, 11 S. E. 357; State v. Potts, supra; State v. Freeman, 100 N. C. 429, 5 S. E. 921; State v. Jones, 97 N. C. 469, 1 S. E. 680. The fifth and sixth exceptions were to the proper rejection of incompetent hearsay evidence.

The seventh exception was to the evidence of Cross Edmundson, in his statement before the justice of the peace, that on the aforesaid March 28, 1903, H. B. Register had said that Bill Soles, brother of Jesse Soles, and who lived near him, had two or three thousand dollars, and it would be no trouble to get it; that he could take two or three men and go there in his absence and make his wife get it. This was competent, for the testimony showed that it was part of the conversation in which H. B. Register was giving instructions as to "holding up" and robbing "the negro staying with Jesse Soles, who had between one and two thousand dollars." Edmundson had detailed the other part of the conversation, and it was proper to admit this. Besides, the intent to commit robbery was involved in this trial, and, this being so, evidence of different offenses of the same kind would be competent. State v. Weaver, 104 N. C. 758, 10 S. E. 486; State v. Parish, 104 N. C. 679, 10 S. E. 457; State v. Walton, 114 N. C. 783, 18 S. E. 945; McLain, Crim. Law, §§ 415, 416. This declaration of H. B. Register was competent against him as a part of the res gestæ at the time he procured the witness to aid his son to commit murder for the sake of the robbery.

The eighth exception is omitted from the brief of prisoners' counsel, and is clearly without merit, being to the admission, against H. B. Register only, of a conversation between him and Edmundson a week after the murder. It strongly tended to show H. B. Register's connection with the crime, and was corroborative of Edmundson's testimony. State v. Staton, 114 N. C. 813, 19 S. E. 96.

One Richardson testified that Jabel Register bought some canned goods at his store between sunset and dark on Saturday, March 28, 1903, the day before the killing. Edmundson had testified that he and Jabel had similar canned goods, furnished by H. B. Register on starting out that night. For the purpose of aiding Richardson in fixing the date, and for that purpose alone, he was properly allowed to state that it was on Tuesday or Wednesday that he heard of Jabel Register and Edmundson being at Nelson Toon's, where it was in evidence they had spent the night of the murder. This was the ninth exception, but it is not urged as error in the brief.

The tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth exceptions are essentially one, as stated in the brief of prisoners, and are directed to the admission, as evidence against H. B. Register only, of a letter shown to be in his handwriting, tending to show an attempt to manufacture or suggest statements that a witness should make in his interest. The fourteenth exception is omitted from brief of prisoners, and, besides, requires no discussion; which last is also true of the fifteenth exception, which is to the exclusion of the bill of indictment against Cross Edmundson. It would have shown merely, if admitted and had been competent, that he had been charged by the grand jury with the murder, and his whole testimony went directly to establish his participation therein, being present, aiding and abetting. The court charged, as requested: "The jury must carefully consider the testimony of Cross Edmundson, and give it such weight as it may be entitled to. He stands before the jury as an accomplice"—but declined to further charge that "it is dangerous to act exclusively on the testimony of an accomplice, and the jury shall require confirmatory testimony before they convict," or to further charge that "the unsupported testimony of an accomplice must produce entire belief" in the minds of the jury before they can convict. This refusal is the basis of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-fourth, and twenty-fifth exceptions. In lieu thereof the court charged fully and carefully on "reasonable doubt," and told the jury that, while they could convict upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, "they should be cautious in convicting" upon such evidence, and left to them, under proper instructions, the evidence offered in corroboration, carefully calling to their attention the effect of evidence offered only as corroborative, and distinguishing its effect and application from substantive testimony. It has been often held that there may be a conviction upon the unsupported testimony of an accomplice, and the charge of the court that while the jury can convict upon such testimony, yet they should be "cautious" in so doing, is quoted from State v. Miller, 97 N. C. 484, 2 S. E. 363, and is in line with all our authorities. State v. Rowe, 98 N. C. 629, 4 S. E. 506; State v. Stroud, 95 N. C. 626; State v. Haney, 19 N. C. 390; State v. Wier, 12 N. C. 363. Here, indeed, there was much testimony tending to corroborate the testimony of Edmundson.

The eighteenth and nineteenth exceptions, in regard to the modification of the prayer as to the alibi attempted to be proved by Jabel Register, cannot be sustained. The prayer, as amended, is a correct statement of the law. The twenty-second exception is a "broadside" exception to the charge, and cannot be considered. Besides, the charge is in itself very full, careful, and impartial, and the prisoners have no cause to complain.

There is no twenty-third exception in the record or the briefs.

The prisoners also moved this court for a new trial for newly discovered testimony, but such motion can only be made in civil actions. Our precedents are uniform that this court has no jurisdiction to entertain such motion in criminal actions. State v. Jones, 69 N. C. 16; State v. Starnes, 94 N. C. 981; State v. Gooch, Id. 1006; State v. Starnes, 97 N. C. 423, 2 S. E. 447; State v. Rowe, 98 N. C. 630, 4 S. E. 506; State v. Edwards, 126 N. C. 1051, 35 S. E. 540; State v. Council, 129 N. C. 513, 39 S. E. 814.

After the fullest consideration, we find no error.

(134 N. C. 116)

BUNCH v. ELIZABETH CITY LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 18, 1903.)

CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION—SALES OF TIMBER—INTEREST OF PURCHASER—TERMINATION—TIME OF EXERCISE—REASONABLE TIME—OPTIONS—NEGLECT TO USE—LEASES—ESTATE OF LESSEE.

1. A bare lease vests no estate in the lessee, but gives him only a right of entry until he has actually entered and accepted the grant, when the estate is vested in him, and he becomes possessed of his term.

2. Under a contract conveying all the timber cut on certain land, and allowing the grantee five years within which to cut and remove the same, whether viewed as a lease or as a conveyance of the timber, and whether the title passes upon the execution of the conveyance, or not until the timber is cut and removed, the right of the grantee to cut and remove the timber terminates with the five-year period mentioned in the instrument, and he then has no further interest therein.

3. Where a contract conveying timber, and giving the grantee five years within which to cut and remove the same—"said term to commence from the time said party of the second part begins to manufacture said timber into wood or lumber"—specifies no particular time for the commencement of such manufacture, the law will imply a reasonable time.

4. Thirteen years is, as a matter of law, an unreasonable time for cutting and removing timber under a contract conveying such timber, and giving the grantee five years from the time he should begin to manufacture the same in which to cut it.

5. In trespass for cutting timber, the complaint was drawn on the theory that the contract for cutting the same had expired, and defendant's entry was therefore tortious. The complaint also asked that plaintiff be declared the owner of the timber cut and converted, and that the contract be declared of no effect, because of its expiration. There was an allegation that defendant's assertion of a right to the timber was a cloud on plaintiff's title, but there was no prayer of the complaint in accordance therewith. The only issue submitted to the jury related to plaintiff's damages and defendant's counterclaim, and the judgment of the court was for the damages assessed, and nothing else. Held, that the action was not an equitable one, and did not impose on plaintiff the necessity of offering to restore the consideration received for the contract as a condition of relief.

6. Money paid for an option to cut timber during a certain period cannot be recovered back by the purchaser of the option or his assignee merely because he fails to take advantage of the option.

On petition for rehearing. Dismissed.

For former opinion, see 42 S. E. 1040, 131 N. C. 830. See, also, Monds v. Lumber Co., 42 S. E. 334, 131 N. C. 20.

The contract discussed in the opinion was construed and passed upon in Gay Manufacturing Co. v. Hobbs, 38 S. E. 26, 128 N. C. 46, 83 Am. St. Rep. 661. In setting out its terms, the court there says: "The contract was entered into on the 26th of April, 1887, between Noah Hollowell and his wife and the plaintiff; and it was set forth therein that for the consideration of $200—one half to be paid on the execution and delivery, and the other half to be paid in twelve months—Hollowell and wife had sold and conveyed to the plaintiff 'all the timber then there, fourteen inches across the stump when cut, on fifty acres of Hollowell's land.' It was further stipulated in the contract that Hollowell was to pay all taxes, dues, assessments, etc., on the land and on the timber, and that there was allowed to the plaintiff 'the full term of five years within which to cut and remove the timber hereby conveyed; said term to commence from the time said party of the second part begins to manufacture said timber into lumber."

Pruden & Pruden and Shepherd & Shepherd, for petitioner. W. M. Bond, for respondent.

WALKER, J. This is a petition to rehear the above-entitled case, which was decided by a per curiam order at August term, 1902, and is reported in 131 N. C. 830, 42 S. E. 1040. This case and Monds v. Lumber Co., 131 N. C. 20, 42 S. E. 334, were argued at the same time, with the understanding, as the court then thought, that the former case should abide the decision in the latter; but counsel inform us now that the two cases were argued together only for the sake of convenience, as the facts and principles of law involved in each of them are substantially the same, and it was not intended that the plaintiff in this case should be concluded by the decision in the Monds Case, in which no petition to rehear is filed. We accept this statement of counsel as to the real understanding of the parties, and will proceed to consider the errors alleged in the petition.

The contention is that the petition should be heard as if an opinion had been filed in the case substantially like the one in the Monds Case, the necessary changes being made to suit the facts wherein they may differ from those in the latter case; and, this being done, the petitioner assigns as errors that in the Monds Case, which is based upon the authority of Mfg. Co. v. Hobbs, 128 N. C. 46, 38 S. E. 26, 83 Am. St. Rep. 661, and Rumbough v. Mfg. Co., 129 N. C. 9, 39 S. E. 581, the court construed the contract between the parties as a lease, and therefore void for uncertainty as to the time of its beginning, whereas, in fact and in law, there was a sale outright of the timber; the contract being executory as to the right to cut and remove it, which continued until abandoned in some way by the purchaser. It is also alleged that the court erred in deciding that the action was not of an equitable nature, and in its essence like a suit in equity to remove a cloud from the plaintiff's title, whereas the court should have held that the plaintiff had come into a court of equity for relief, and should be compelled to return the $200 paid to him at the time the contract was made by the Gay Manufacturing Company; the defendant having succeeded to all its rights and equities by virtue of the deed of the latter company to it.

It is a mistake to suppose that the court, in Manufacturing Co. v. Hobbs, supra, decided that the contract must be construed as a lease of the timber trees, or as a term for years. The court merely stated that it so far partook of the nature of a lease as to require the application of the same rule of law in determining its validity as would apply in the case of leases or terms for years, and that, as in such cases there must be a certain beginning and a certain end, the contract is void, as no definite time is fixed for the beginning of the term. 2 Blk. 143, 318. A bare lease does not vest an estate in the lessee, but only gives him a right of entry, which is called his interest in the term (interesse termini); but when he has actually entered, and thereby accepted the grant, the estate is then, and not before, vested in him, and he is possessed, not properly of the land, but of the term for years; possession or seisin of the land remaining still in him who has the freehold. 2 Blk. 144. While some of the cases in this and other states liken a contract of the kind we are construing to a lease, it may be true that it should not be technically so construed, but that it should be regarded as a conveyance of the timber, or an interest or estate in the timber, upon condition that, if it is not cut and removed within a given time, the interest or estate so conveyed shall revert in or revert to the grantor. While we are inclined to adopt this as the better interpretation, and the one more perhaps in consonance with the intention of the parties, as disclosed by the language employed by them, yet we think that, however the contract may be considered with reference to the interest or estate of the defendant's assignor, the result in this case must be the same; and even if the title in the trees vested the very moment the contract was delivered, and by virtue of it, as an executed contract of sale, that title has been lost by inaction or failure to comply with the condition upon which it was conveyed, or, more exactly speaking, by failure to cut the timber within the time limited by the contract. There appears to be some diversity of opinion to be found in the cases as to when the title to the timber passes—whether immediately upon the execution of the instrument of conveyance, or not until the timber is cut and removed—in a case like this, where the time limit extends not only to the cutting, but to the removal. This distinction, if well taken, can make no practical difference in the construction of the contract under consideration, as we hold that the time for cutting and removing the timber, as fixed by the contract, had expired before this suit was brought; and it is therefore immaterial whether we decide that the title never passed out of the plaintiff, as the timber was not cut within the time, or reverted to him at the end of the allotted time by reason of the failure to comply with said condition. In neither view of the matter can the defendant succeed in this action.

We are not inadvertent to the fact that some courts, whose decisions are entitled to the highest respect, have held that the title passes to vendee, if we may so call him, and remains in him notwithstanding the expiration of the time fixed for the cutting and removal of the timber, so that, if he enters upon the land to cut the timber, his vendor may sue him in an action in the nature of trespass quare clausum fregit, and recover damages for breaking the close, though he cannot recover in an action in the nature of trespass de bonis asportatis, or for the value of the timber so cut and removed, after the time has run out. We cannot adopt this principle as the one which should determine the rights of the parties in such cases, and especially are we unable to do so in this case, in view of the language of the contract under construction, which we think evinces most clearly a contrary intention. We must carry out the declared purpose of the parties, if it has been sufficiently disclosed by them in their agreement; and that, in our opinion, has been done in the case in hand.

We cannot conclude, after a careful examination of the terms of the contract, that the parties conveyed the timber with a proviso limiting the time within which it should be cut and removed, and intended thereby that after the expiration of that time the defendant's assignor should still have an interest or title in the timber, but without the right of exercising any control or dominion over it, unless by committing a trespass upon the land. Such a meaning would have to be very clearly expressed before we would feel at liberty to adopt it as the one contemplated by the parties. We prefer to rest our decision in this case upon that construction of the contract which is in our judgment more in accord with a reasonable view of the rights of the parties under it, rather than upon one which will go beyond what is necessary to effectuate the intention, and produce such an anomalous result.

If an estate in the timber was conveyed by the contract, treated for the purpose as a deed, it must be commensurate only with the purpose and object of the conveyance, namely, to enable the defendant's assignor to cut and remove the timber within the five years, and it should endure no longer. At the expiration of that time the estate in so much of the timber as has been cut and removed would revert to the vendor, or at least the timber would become his absolute property.

If it is merely an executory contract, whereby title to so much of the timber as should be cut within the time limited would pass to the defendant's assignor, then the title to so much as should not be cut and removed within that time would remain in the vendor. It can make little or no practical difference in this case, as we have virtually said, whether we adopt the former or the latter view of the relation of the parties, or of the interest which passes by such contracts. In any view that can be taken of the subject, the defendant's assignor had the right to enter upon the land and cut and remove therefrom the timber then standing, and to continue to do so within the five years; but at the expiration of that time his right to cut and remove the timber ceased —whether by reverting the estate in the remaining timber in the grantor, or by a mere cessation of his right or option to cut and remove the timber under and by virtue of the instrument treated as an executory contract, is of no importance, in view of the special facts of this case. It is more a difference in form than in substance. In no event should we give a construction to the instrument which will confer any greater right or estate than is commensurate with the object and purpose of the parties as expressed in the context. The spirit and letter of the contract exclude the idea that when the time fixed by it expired the defendant's assignor was to have any right, interest, or estate in the timber then standing on the land.

The majority of the cases in the other states which we have been able to examine seem to hold that the clause fixing the time within which the timber must be cut and removed was designed to limit the whole grant, and that the object of such a contract or conveyance is the sale of all the timber, which should be taken off by the end of the time fixed in the instrument. The contracts are thus held to be executory in their nature. McIntyre v. Barnard, 1 Sandf. Ch. 52; Gilmore v. Wilbur, 12 Pick. 120, 22 Am. Dec. 410; Strasson v. Montgomery, 32 Wis. 52; Reed v. Merryfield, 10 Metc. 155; Howard v. Lincoln, 13 Me. 122; Saltonstall v. Little, 90 Pa. 422, 35 Am. Rep. 683. And this is held to be the correct interpretation, even where the words of conveyance are in present, and do not refer merely to the time when the timber is cut. Pease v. Gibson, 6 Greenl. 81; Fletcher v. Livingstone, 153 Mass. 118, 26 N. E. 1001; Hicks v. Smith, 77 Wis. 146, 46 N. W. 133. In Strasson v. Montgomery, supra, the court says: "The conveyance is of all the trees and timber on the premises, with the proviso that the vendee should take the same off the land within four years. It is well settled, on principle and by authority, that the legal effect of the instrument is that the vendor thereby conveyed to the vendee all of the trees and timber on the premises, which the vendee should remove therefrom within the prescribed time, and that such as remained thereon after that time should belong to the vendor, or to his grantee of the premises." In Fletcher v. Livingstone, supra, it is said to be well settled that a contract like that relied on by the defendant in this case does not immediately pass the title to property, and is not a sale, or a contract for a sale, of an interest in land, but an executory agreement for a sale of chattels, to take effect when the wood and timber are severed from the land, with a license to enter and cut the trees and remove them. Many other cases could be cited in which the same doctrine is laid down. By some of the courts it is held that the title to all of the timber passes, but the title to so much as is not cut and removed within the prescribed time reverts to the vendor. Williams v. Flood, 63 Mich. 403, 30 N. W. 93. In that case the court says: "It is not very important to discuss the exact nature of the plaintiff's rights under the written contract. Whatever they were, they included an absolute sale of all the timber described, subject only to such qualifications of the right of removal as the contract mentions. At most, this condition would only operate by way of forfeiture. The timber had all been paid for, and all belonged to the plaintiff, unless lost by forfeiture for nonremoval." See, also, McCumber v. Railroad, 108 Mich. 491, 66 N. W. 376, 32 L. R. A. 102, 62 Am. St. Rep. 713, and cases therein cited. In Moring v. Ward, 50 N. C. 272, this court, by Pearson, C. J., said that by such a contract it is the intention to create an estate, so as to entitle the vendee to occupy the land and take the trees for the time prescribed in the contract, and that this estate is in its nature a lease for years, and that the contract is not merely personal in its nature. In this case we repeat that it is not so important to determine the exact nature of the right or estate created by the contract as it is to decide whether or not the defendant, after the expiration of the time fixed for entering upon the land and removing the timber, had any interest or estate in the timber. In our opinion, after a most careful examination of the authorities, it did not have any interest or estate therein.

The defendant insists that the five years did not commence, under the terms of the contract, until his assignor "began to manufacture the timber into wood or lumber." As no definite time is fixed for the Gay Manufacturing Company to begin the manufacture of the timber, the law will imply a reasonable time. We do not think that it can be successfully contended that thirteen years is not, as matter of law, an unreasonable time for cutting and removing the timber, under the terms of the contract. Manufacturing Co. v. Hobbs, supra. Neither the defendant nor his assignor had ever cut any of the timber until about two months before this suit was brought.

It was admitted that the Gay Manufacturing Company had paid to the plaintiff at the date of the contract, March 20, 1888, the sum of $200; that being the amount which the defendant alleges was paid to the plaintiff in advance on the purchase of the timber. The defendant now contends that it is entitled to have that amount paid to it, as the assignee of the Gay Manufacturing Company, because it would be inequitable to allow the plaintiff to keep the timber, or recover damages from the defendant for its conversion, without returning the sum so received by it. It is argued that the plaintiff seeks to have a cloud removed from his title, and that he who asks equity must first do equity. We cannot concur in the view thus taken by the defendant. The only issues submitted to the jury related to the plaintiff's damages for cutting the timber, and the defendant's counterclaim. It is true that the plaintiff does allege in the eighth paragraph of the complaint that the defendant's assertion of a right to the timber by virtue of the contract is a cloud upon his title, but this was an unnecessary allegation, and the prayer of the complaint does not correspond with it, nor include that relief. Besides, the judgment of the court was simply for the amount of damages assessed by the jury for the trespass committed by the defendant in cutting the timber, or, rather, to follow closely the language of the verdict, to which the judgment refers, for the value of the timber, and nothing else. This is not an equitable action. The plaintiff does not seek to rescind the contract, in which case the court would put the parties in statu quo, but merely alleges in his complaint the facts, and asks that he be declared the owner of the timber cut and converted to the defendant's use; that the contract be declared of no effect, because of the expiration of the time limited in it for cutting the timber; and that he recover of the defendant the damages sustained by reason of its trespass or conversion. The complaint is drawn upon the theory that the contract had expired by its own limitation, and that therefore the defendant, in entering upon the land and cutting the timber, committed a tortious act. The defendant's assignor paid the $200, practically, for the right or privilege of cutting the timber within five years, which right or privilege was never exercised, but the plaintiff was prevented during that time from selling to any one else. If money is paid for an option to cut timber during a certain period, and the party to whom the option is given does not see fit to avail himself of it, how can any equity arise in his favor to have the money paid back to him? It does not even present a case where money has been paid upon a consideration that has failed. He has simply refused to do what he had a right to do, and to compel the plaintiff to give him back his money would permit the defendant to take advantage of his own default. The plaintiff was certainly put to a disadvantage by the contract in being denied the right to the use of the land, or, as we have said, to dispose of it during the prescribed period, and this is a sufficient consideration to support his legal and equitable right to the money. In no possible view of the case, therefore, has the defendant any equity to have the money refunded.

There is no error in the former decision of this court. Petition dismissed.

BROCKENBROUGH et al. v. BOARD OF WATER COM'RS OF CITY OF CHARLOTTE.

CITIES — CONTRACTING DEBT — BONDS ISSUED BY BOARD OF WATER COMMISSIONERS — MORTGAGING WATERWORKS — IMPAIRING RIGHTS OF BONDHOLDERS.

1. The issue of bonds under Priv. Laws 1903, p. 440, c. 196, providing that they shall be paid from the income of the city waterworks, and that none of the city's funds raised by taxation shall be applied to their payment, is not the contracting of a debt by the city, or a pledging of its faith or a loan of its credit, which Const. art. 7, § 7, inhibits, except on vote of the citizens.

2. Waterworks of a city, transferred, pursuant to Priv. Laws 1899, p. 788, c. 271, to a board of commissioners created by the act, which provides that the board shall manage the works, and turn over the surplus income therefrom to the city treasurer, are held in trust by the board for the use of the city, and are not subject to be sold for any indebtedness of the city.

3. After a city had issued bonds for purchase of waterworks, Priv. Laws 1899, p. 788, c. 271, transferred the works to a board of water commissioners, and provided that the net income should be turned over to the city treasurer, and therefrom the bonds should be paid. Held, that no rights of the holders of such bonds were impaired by Priv. Laws 1903, p. 440, c. 196, which authorized the board to issue bonds for extension of the works, and to secure them by mortgage on the works, and provided that the net income should first be applied to the latter bonds.

4. Priv. Laws 1903, p. 440, c. 196, authorizing a board of water commissioners holding waterworks in trust for a city to issue bonds for extension of the works, and to secure them by mortgage on the works, is in the power of the Legislature.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Neal, Judge.

Action by George H. Brockenbrough and others against the board of water commissioners of the city of Charlotte. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Clarkson & Duls, for appellants. Burwell & Cansler, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. This action is prosecuted by the plaintiffs, citizens and taxpayers of the city of Charlotte, and members of the board of aldermen of said city, against the defendant, board of water commissioners, of said city, for the purpose of restraining and perpetually enjoining a proposed issue of bonds, and the execution of a mortgage on the property held and owned by said board, and pledging the rents and tolls derived from the operation thereof to secure the payment of the said bonds and the interest thereon. The facts material to the decision of this appeal, as set forth in the complaint and admitted by the demurrer, are:

On the 13th day of March, 1897, in pursuance of authority vested in it by chapter

40, p. 712, of the Private Laws of 1881, and by chapter 68 of the Public Laws of 1897, the board of aldermen purchased the plant, property, franchises, easements, privileges, and appurtenances of the Charlotte City Waterworks. Pursuant to authority vested in it by said acts of the General Assembly, and by virtue of the approval of a majority of the qualified voters of said city, ascertained at an election duly held for that purpose, it issued and sold $250,000 of the bonds of the city, and applied the funds received therefrom to the payment of the purchase money of said property, and in making extensions and improvements thereto. At the session of 1899 (chapter 271, p. 788, Priv. Laws) the General Assembly duly passed an act whereby E. T. Cansler, R. J. Brevard, W. O. Dowd, and R. H. Jordan were constituted a board of water commissioners for the city of Charlotte, of which the mayor of said city was made ex officio chairman. Provision was made for filling vacancies in said board. Said board was declared to be a corporation under the corporate name of the "board of Water Commissioners of the City of Charlotte," with power to sue and be sued, to hold real estate, and to enjoy the usual privileges of a corporation. That all acts and doings of said board within the scope of their duty or authority are declared to be obligatory upon, and be in law considered as if done by the board of aldermen of, the city of Charlotte. The said board was empowered, for and in the name of the board of aldermen of the city of Charlotte, to take and hold the land, real estate, rights, franchises, and property of every kind "now" owned by said board of aldermen, or that may "hereafter" be purchased, for the purpose of operating and maintaining a system of waterworks for the said city, and have power to acquire such additional property and make such additional improvements thereto as should be necessary to supply the city of Charlotte with a sufficient supply of good and wholesome water. Power was given to condemn land and water rights, if necessary, to extend said system of waterworks. The board was given power to regulate the distribution and use of water, and to fix a price for the use thereof, the time of payment, etc. The property held by said board was exempt from taxation. The board was given power to collect all rents, water rates, etc., and required to keep an account thereof; and after paying the expense of operating the plan or system of waterworks under their control, including cost of such improvements as was deemed necessary, the net balance they were required to pay over to the treasurer of said city. It was provided that said board of aldermen out of such net balance should first pay the interest upon such of the bonds of the city of Charlotte as were sold for the purpose of raising money to purchase said system of waterworks, and the balance remaining to constitute a sinking fund to meet the payments of said bonds at maturity. The members of said board organized under and pursuant to the provisions of said act of 1899, and the board of aldermen, pursuant thereto, turned over to the said board of water commissioners the said waterworks system, and plant, improvements, and extensions, for the purpose and in accordance with the terms and provisions of said act; and in accordance therewith the said board holds the real estate, rights, franchises, and property so turned over to them. Said board has since acquired additional property and made additional improvements, and is endeavoring to acquire still more property and make further improvements, all of which are necessary to furnish said city and its inhabitants with a sufficient supply of good, wholesome water. The population of said city was at the last census 19,000, and now exceeds 25,000, people. Said city has expended large sums in establishing and maintaining, and now maintains, a paid fire department for the protection of the property of the citizens of said city. It also maintains a system of sewerage, made necessary for the proper drainage of its streets and for the preservation of the public health. Said system of fire protection and sewerage require large quantities of water from said waterworks system for their use, operation, and efficient maintenance. The city has found it necessary to lay and has laid many miles of sewer and water pipes, and purchased the necessary implements, tools, etc., for the operation thereof, all of which are necessary for the protection of the property and health of said city and its inhabitants. That the present water supply is inadequate to meet the demands of public and private consumers, and an efficient operation of said plans. That one of the watersheds of said city, from which it derived a considerable portion of its water supply, has become thickly populated and occupied by manufacturing plants, making it advisable to discontinue the use of water from that source for public or domestic purposes. That neither the said city nor the board of water commissioners has any funds on hand which can be used to purchase necessary real estate, machinery, and other property to adequately equip its system of waterworks to supply the wants and needs of the city or its inhabitants. That it will require the expenditure of at least $150,000 for said purpose. That to enable the said board of water commissioners to properly equip and maintain said waterworks system, sufficient to supply the city with water necessary for municipal purposes at a moderate cost to said city, it is necessary that the board of water commissioners shall equip and maintain a water system of sufficient capacity to furnish all the inhabitants of said city desiring to use the same a sufficient quantity of pure, wholesome water for domestic purposes, and to charge therefor certain toll or rental, without which the said commissioners would be unable to maintain said water system for municipal purposes, except at an enormous and unreasonable expense to said city.

The General Assembly at its session of 1903 (Chapter 196, p. 440, Priv. Laws), at the instance and with the approval and pursuant to a resolution of the board of aldermen of said city, duly passed, in accordance with the provisions and requirements of article 2, § 14, of the Constitution, an act repealing sections 6-17, 18, of the act of 1899 (chapter 271, p. 788, Priv. Laws), and conferring upon the board of water commissioners power to acquire such additional property and make such additional improvements thereto as may be necessary to at all times furnish the city of Charlotte with a sufficient supply of good, wholesome water. And in order to procure necessary funds for that purpose, said board was given full power and authority to issue bonds, not to exceed in amount the sum of $200,000, in such form and of such denominations, and payable at such time or times and places, and to bear such rate of interest, payable semiannually, as said board shall determine. Said bonds to be signed by the mayor of the city as ex officio chairman of said board, sealed with the corporate seal of said city, attested by the ex officio clerk of said board, and the coupons on said bonds to bear the engraved or lithographed signature of said clerk. "All bonds so issued shall be equally and ratably secured by first mortgage or deed of trust upon all the real estate, rights, franchises and other property of every description owned and held by said board and which was purchased by the city of Charlotte from the Charlotte City Waterworks Company as well as all other property, rights and franchises which may hereafter be purchased or acquired by said board for the purpose of extending, maintaining and operating said system of waterworks for said city." Provision is made for the execution of a mortgage or deed of trust on said property for the purpose of securing the payment of said bonds. It was provided that "the said board of water commissioners out of the moneys derived from the collection of tolls or rents for water shall pay (1) the cost and expenses of operating said plant or system of waterworks under its control; including the cost of such incidental improvements as the board may deem necessary for that purpose. (2) The semiannual interest upon the bonds issued by virtue of section six (6) hereof as the same shall become due. (3) The cost and expense of such extensions and additions to the plant of said system as the board may from time to time deem advisable. (4) The semiannual interest upon the bonds heretofore issued by the city of Charlotte for the purchase of said waterworks as the same shall become due for a period of fifteen years from the date thereof. (5) After the expiration of which period all moneys so derived (less the cost and expenses of operating said plant, the interest on the bonds authorized to be issued hereunder and the cost and expenses of additions to the plant as aforesaid) shall be turned over to the treasurer of the city of Charlotte to be held by him and invested under the direction of the board of water commissioners for a sinking fund with which to pay off as they may mature first the bonds issued by virtue of section six hereof in full; second, the bonds heretofore issued by the city of Charlotte for the purpose of purchasing said waterworks system: provided, that none of the funds of the city of Charlotte raised by taxation shall ever be applied to the payment of either principal or interest of the bonds issued by virtue of section six (6) hereof."

Prior to the commencement of this action the board of water commissioners, October 8, 1903, at a regular meeting unanimously adopted a resolution reciting the several matters and things herein set forth, and further reciting that "whereas it has become necessary to relocate and establish new reservoirs, pumping stations, pipe lines, etc., upon and connected with streams drawing their supply from watersheds not so liable to contamination, and sufficient to furnish the necessary water supply for said city for both present and future compensation. First, that the board pursuant to the provisions of chapter 196 of the Private Laws of the General Assembly of North Carolina ratified the second day of March, 1903, hereby authorizes and directs the issuance of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars of its bonds or obligations payable to bearer thirty years after date of said bonds and bearing interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum payable semi-annually," etc. " * * * The said bonds to be of the denomination of one thousand dollars each and payable only out of the moneys to be derived by the board from the collection of tolls or rents for water as provided in the second subsection (17) of section one of the act hereinbefore referred to, the terms and provisions of which act are to be considered as if incorporated herein: * * * provided that neither the bonds authorized to be issued hereunder, the coupons attached thereto, nor the deed of trust securing the same, shall be deemed or held as creating any debt of the city of Charlotte, or as pledging the faith or lending the credit of said city for the payment of the indebtedness hereby authorized, and no action shall be maintained in any court against said city or any of its officers to enforce the payment of said indebtedness evidenced by said bonds, coupons or deed of trust except as to the funds and property herein expressly charged with the payment thereof." The form of the proposed bond is incorporated in said resolution, conforming to the provisions of said act of 1903 and said resolution. The second of said resolutions provides for the execution of a mortgage or deed of trust for securing the payment of said bonds conveying said plant, and all additions made thereto, with all franchises, etc., appurtenant thereto. The said resolutions in all respects conform to the provisions and requirement of the several acts herein referred to. The complaint alleges that the proposition to issue said bonds and mortgage has not been submitted to, or approved by a vote of a majority of, the qualified voters of said city, nor has said board any other authority therefor than is conferred by said act of 1903. The board of water commissioners threaten to, and, unless enjoined, will, issue and sell said bonds, and execute said mortgage or deed of trust.

The plaintiffs aver that they are advised (1) that the title to said waterworks and appurtenances is held by said board in trust for said city of Charlotte upon the terms set forth in said acts, and that said board is bound, in law, to hold and operate the same upon the trusts aforesaid as such acts provide; (2) that the threatened bond issue and mortgage of said property and pledge of said rents and tolls is violative of the rights of the city of Charlotte, and its citizens as secured to them by the law of the land and the several acts referred to, other than chapter 196, p. 440, Priv. Laws 1903, and particularly violative of article 7, § 7, of the Constitution of the state; (3) that chapter 196, p. 140, Priv. Laws 1903, in so far as it attempts to authorize said board of water commissioners to issue said bonds, and to pledge the water rents, tolls, and emoluments of said waterworks plant and system, and to mortgage the said property and franchises, is violative of section 7 of article 7 of the Constitution, and that therefore chapter 271, p. 788, of the Private Laws of 1899, directing the manner in which the rents, etc., arising from said system of waterworks, and the operation thereof shall be applied is still in force and effect; (4) that said board has no power to mortgage said property, or pledge the rents and tolls derived from the operation thereof, but that it is the duty of said board to hold the same upon the trusts attaching thereto; (5) that the issuance of said bonds and the execution of said mortgage will cast a cloud upon the title to said property.

The defendants demur to the complaint for that it does not allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because it appears therefrom that the act of 1903 expressly confers upon the said board the several threatened acts sought to be enjoined; that said acts of the General Assembly were passed at the instance and with the approval of the board of aldermen; that it is necessary to issue bonds for the purpose of securing funds sufficient to make the extension and improvements referred, and to enable said board to perform the duties and functions imposed upon it by said legislation; that said proposed bond issue is a necessary expense to be incurred in preserving and maintaining in a state of efficiency municipal property already acquired by the city, and held by said board in trust for necessary municipal purposes, and that therefore it is not necessary to be first authorized by a majority of the qualified voters of said city; that the act and the resolution of the board expressly provide for the payment of the principal and interest of said bonds from and out of the tolls and rents received from the operation of said waterworks, and further provide that neither said bonds, nor the coupons attached thereto, nor the deed of trust securing the payment thereof shall be deemed or held as creating any debt of the city of Charlotte, or as pledging the faith or lending the credit of said city for the payment of the indebtedness thereby authorized: that the issuing of said bonds and the pledge of said water rents, etc., will not be contracting any debt or pledging the faith or lending the credit of said city in the sense inhibited by section 7 of article 7 of the Constitution.

His honor sustained the demurrer, and plaintiffs appealed.

We have been very much aided in our investigation and disposition of this appeal by full and excellent briefs and oral arguments of the learned counsel for the parties to the record.

It will be convenient to dispose of the questions raised by the pleadings in an order somewhat different from that in which they are presented. If, as contended by the defendants, the bonds proposed to be issued are not debts or liabilities of the city, or if the making and issuance of them be not pledging the faith or lending the credit of the city within the meaning of section 7, art. 7, of the Constitution, several important and interesting questions discussed in the briefs will be eliminated. This question has not before been presented to or decided by this court. The language of the Constitution declares that no county, city, town, or other municipal corporation "shall contract any debt, pledge its faith, or loan its credit," etc. The plaintiffs insist that the issuing of the bonds in controversy comes within this inhibition. "Debt" is defined to be "that which is due from one person to another; that which one person is bound to pay or perform to another." Black's Law Dict. 337; Perrigo v. Milwaukee, 92 Wis. 236, 65 N. W. 1025. "An indebtedness within restrictions upon municipal indebtedness is an agreement of some kind by the municipality to pay money where no suitable provision has been made for the prompt discharge of the obligation imposed by the agreement." Sackett v. New Albany, 88 Ind. 473, 45 Am. Rep. 467. "A debt is a specified sum of money which is due from one person to another and denotes not only the obligation of the debtor to pay, but also the right of the creditor to receive and enforce payment." State v. Hawes, 112 Ind. 823, 14 N. E. 87. It would not be contended that upon the facts in this case the city lends its credit or pledges its faith in regard to the proposed bonds. It does not indorse or guaranty their payment, or assume any obligation in respect to them. Nor can its revenues be applied to the payment of them. The income accruing from the operation of the waterworks is not to be paid into the city treasury for disbursement, nor does the city assume any responsibility in regard to the disbursement of the money by the board of water commissioners. This board collects the rents, and applies them to the purposes designated in the act. After the payment of the interest and other objects mentioned in the law, the amount remaining on hand shall be turned over to the treasurer of the city of Charlotte, to be held by him and invested under the direction of the board of water commissioners for a sinking fund. The treasurer of the city is made ex officio treasurer of said board. His bond, of course, is liable for any default in the discharge of his trust, but the city assumes no responsibility in the matter. The statute is so carefully drawn and guarded that but little is left to construction. There can be no possible doubt as to the legal effect and operation of the language used in the statute and the bond, excluding any power to apply the revenues of the city to the payment of the interest on, or principal of, the bonds. We find that the courts of other jurisdictions have considered and decided the question arising upon the construction of restrictive provisions similar to ours. The Constitution of the state of Washington prohibits any town or city contracting any debt in excess of a certain percentage of the assessed value of its property. The city of Spokane undertook to borrow money to complete a system of waterworks, and, for securing the payment thereof, pledged a portion of its rents derived from said waterworks. In an action brought to restrain the city government from making the contract, the court (Hoyt, C. J.) said: "And it is claimed on the part of the respondent that the entering into said contract and the issuance of such obligations of the city is the incurring of an indebtedness, within the meaning of the Constitution, and to do so at the present time is not within the power of the city, for the reason that it is already indebted beyond the constitutional limit. * * * Said ordinance and contract, when construed together, provide that the obligations to be issued in pursuance thereof shall be payable only out of the special fund to be created out of the receipts of the waterworks, as above specified, and that the city shall not be in any manner liable to pay the same except out of moneys in said special fund. * * * This being so, we are of the opinion that neither the ordinance, the contract, nor the obligations to be issued by the city in pursuance thereof, do or will constitute a debt of the city, within the constitutional definition. The only obligation assumed on the part of the city is to pay out of the special fund, and it is in no manner otherwise liable to the beneficiaries under the contract. The general credit of the city is in no manner pledged except for the performance of its duty in the creation of the special fund."

Winston v. Spokane (Wash.) 41 Pac. 888. The court affirmed and followed this case in Faulkner v. Seattle (Wash.) 53 Pac. 365. The Supreme Court of Iowa, in Swanson v. Ottumwa, 91 N. W. 1043, 59 L. R. A. 620, thus states the view held in that state, which we think is correct: "The tax required to be levied is clearly authorized by the statute, and such tax, together with the income of the company derived from other sources, the ordinance expressly provides, shall pay all obligations assumed by the city. If it does not, neither the bondholders nor company have any claim on the city for the deficiency. The obligation of the city is to levy the tax, and see that the amount collected is applied to the specific purposes. If the special fund legally provided is not sufficient, then it may be well said the deficiency is not payable by the city, and it is difficult to conceive how there can be such a thing as a debt which is never to be paid. No burden is created thereby, and there cannot be such an indebtedness. In a constitutional sense, the prohibited indebtedness must be a burden, and payable from funds which could not be constitutionally appropriated for that purpose." Waterworks Co. v. City of Creston, 101 Iowa, 687, 70 N. W. 739. The Supreme Court of Illinois, in Springfield v. Edwards, 84 Ill. 633, thus states the proposition: "When the appropriation is made, and the warrant or order on the treasury for its payment is issued and accepted, the transaction is closed on the part of the corporation, leaving no further obligation, either absolute or contingent, upon it whereby its debt may be increased." It is also held in this case that, for a failure to collect and pay over the "special fund," the remedy must be against the officers, and not against the corporation; "otherwise a contingent debt would be incurred." The case of United States v. Ft. Scott, 99 U. S. 152, 25 L. Ed. 348, presents very clearly the distinction between the status of the city in respect to the bond issue therein and in our case. Mr. Justice Harlan says: "The general reference upon the margin of the bonds to the ordinance under which the improvement was projected should not, in view of the general powers of the council, as declared in the statute, be held as qualifying or lessening the unconditional promise of the city, set forth in the body of the bonds itself, to pay the bonds, with the prescribed interest, at maturity." Again he says: "But the unquestioned fact remains that the bonds, with some interest, held by the relator, were not paid at maturity, as the city agreed that they should be." As we have pointed out, the city of Charlotte makes no such promise. Any inference or suggestion to that effect is expressly negated by the act, the resolution, and the terms of the bonds.

It is said, however, if the rents and tolls accruing from the operation of the waterworks, as provided by the act of 1899, are diverted to the purposes of the act of 1903, the burden on the ordinary revenues will be increased, and thereby its debt indefinitely increased. We cannot see how this result can justly be called contracting a debt. The question raised by this suggestion will be discussed in another phase of the controversy. We conclude that the proposed bond issue will not constitute a debt against the city of Charlotte, in any legal or constitutional sense. It is immaterial, in this phase of the question, whether we regard the bonds as issued by the board of aldermen or the board of water commissioners. We deem it proper to say this that it may be seen that we have not overlooked the language of section 6 of the act of 1903: "And the contracts and engagements, acts and doings of said board within the scope of its duty and authority shall be obligatory upon and be in law considered as if done by the board of aldermen of the city of Charlotte." The conclusion which we have reached is not affected by the fact that the bonds are issued by the board of water commissioners, but is based upon the provision for raising the fund out of which they are to be paid, to the express exclusion of any other fund or revenue of the city.

Holding, as we do, that the proposed bond issue is not creating a debt against the city, or lending its credit, or pledging its faith, we do not deem it necessary to pass upon the question raised by the demurrer that the purpose for which the fund is to be raised is a "necessary expense," within the meaning of article 7, § 7, of the Constitution. There is much force in the position that, upon the admitted facts in the case, the bond issue could be sustained as a necessary expense. It is evident that the value and efficiency, if not the preservation, of the present system of waterworks as an essential agency in protecting the property and health of the city and its inhabitants, is involved in the proposed action by the board. While the policy indicated by the restrictive constitutional provision upon municipal indebtedness must be kept in view and upheld, we may not disregard the ordinary meaning of words, or give to them a strained and unusual construction. Surely no one could well contend that these words, if used in a power of attorney respecting the private business of the citizen, would be construed to prevent the agent from assuming for his principal such obligations as were necessary for the protection of his property, and the performance of the duties imposed upon him. The people of Charlotte have by their votes declared that a system of waterworks is essential to their corporate welfare and safety. They have empowered their municipal servants and agents to expend a large sum for securing such a system. Is it not clear that this involves the duty of protecting this property, and making it efficient for the very important—may we not say necessary—purpose for which it was originally acquired. If so, the power to contract such obligations as are necessary to discharge the duty must be found. "Narrow and technical reasoning is misplaced when it is brought to bear upon an instrument framed by the people themselves, and designed as a chart upon which every man, learned or unlearned, may be able to trace the leading principles of government." Cooley, Const. Lim. 59.

That waterworks are held by the city or such quasi municipal corporations as may be established by the Legislature for such purpose for public use and for public purposes is clearly shown by the Supreme Court of the United States in New Orleans v. Morris, 105 U. S. 65, 26 L. Ed. 1184.

The plaintiffs suggest that the property purchased by the city by the board of aldermen, and by the act of 1899 transferred to the board of water commissioners, is impressed with a trust for the city, and for the purposes set out in this act, "and that said board is bound, in law, to hold and operate the same upon the trusts aforesaid." It is clear that the Legislature may, in aid of municipal government, or for the purpose of discharging any municipal functions, or for any proper purpose, create municipal boards, and confer upon them such powers and duties as in its judgment may seem best. Section 4, art. 8, of the Constitution, ordains that "it shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities, towns and incorporated villages," etc. It is uniformly held that "municipal corporations are mere instrumentalities of the state for the more convenient administration of local government. Their powers are such as the Legislature may confer, and these may be enlarged, abridged, or entirely withdrawn, at its pleasure," etc. Lilly v. Taylor, 88 N. C. 489; Harris v. Wright, 121 N. C. 172, 28 S. E. 266; State v. Beacham, 125 N. C. 352, 34 S. E. 447. The Legislature has frequently exercised the power conferred by the Constitution, by establishing boards of health in towns and cities, school boards, and such others as may be deemed wise, as additional governmental agencies. We do not understand that this power is questioned, or that the title to the property purchased by the city from the Charlotte City Water Company did not pass to and vest in the board of water commissioners established by the act of 1899.

In Kennebeck Water District v. Waterville, 96 Me. 254, 52 Atl. 774, it is said: "The Kennebeck water district is a quasi municipal corporation. * * * The powers, the rights, and the property of the new corporation rest exclusively in it, and in no degree in the city of Waterville. That the Legislature has authority to create the water district cannot be successfully questioned."

"There is no prohibition which we have been able to discover, and we have been pointed to none, against the creation by the Legislature of every conceivable description of corporate authority and to endow them with all the faculties and attributes of other pre-existing corporate authority. Thus, for example, there is nothing in the Constitution of this state to prevent the Legislature from placing the police department of Chicago, or its fire department or its waterworks, under the control of an authority which may be constituted for such purpose. The Constitution nowhere commits corporate objects or purposes irrevocably to authorities now existing, nor does it prohibit the committal of them to such corporate authority whose appointment may be called into life by the same law which creates the subject, and commits it to their jurisdiction." People v. Solomon, 51 Ill. 87; Wilson v. Sanitary Dist., 133 Ill. 443, 27 N. E. 208; People v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 443. A very exhaustive discussion of the subject may be found in Davock v. Moore (Mich.) 63 N. W. 424, 28 L. R. A. 738.

Plaintiffs contend that, conceding the power of the Legislature to establish the board of water commissioners, and to transfer to the said board the property of the city, as was done by the act of 1899, the Legislature has not the power to repeal that act and attach other and different trusts to the property, or authorize the board to sell or mortgage it, and for this position they assign two reasons: First, because it is taking the property of the city without due process of law; and, second, because by the act of 1899 the net rents and tolls of the waterworks are directed to be applied to the payment of the interest accruing on said bonds, and to create a sinking fund for their payment.

Referring to the liability of waterworks to be sold for debts of the city, Judge Miller says: "The learned counsel, in the oral argument and in the brief, substantially concede that the waterworks themselves, in the hands of the city, were not liable to be sold for the debts of the city. And if no such concession were made, we think it quite clear that these works were of a character, which, like the wharves owned by the city, were of such public utility and necessity that they were held in trust for the use of the citizens." "The property owned by the city corporation is held by it as a public corporation, and is subject to the lawmaking power of the state vested in the Legislature." Darlington v. The Mayor, etc., 31 N. Y. 164, 38 Am. Dec. 248, in which the question is exhaustively discussed. Merrweather v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 473, 26 L. Ed. 197. In Huron Waterworks Co. v. Huron (S. D.) 62 N. W. 975, 30 L. R. A. 848, 58 Am. St. Rep. 817, we find a careful review of the authorities and decisions, the court saying: "Having, as we think, established the proposition that the waterworks of a city, when constructed and owned by the city, are to be regarded the same as other city property held for public use, and therefore charged and clothed with a public trust, it would seem to follow that such property cannot be sold and conveyed by the mayor and common council of the city, unless under special authority conferred upon them to sell and convey the same by the legislative power of the state." The Supreme Court of Connecticut, in West Hartford v. West Hartford Water Commissioners, 44 Conn. 360, said: "The introduction of a supply of water for the preservation of the health of its inhabitants by the city of Hartford is unquestionably now to be accepted as an undertaking for the public good, in the judicial sense of that term—not, indeed, as the discharge of one of the few governmental duties imposed upon it, but as ranking next in order. For this purpose the Legislature invested the city with a portion of its sovereignty. * * * The city of Hartford, that it might more economically discharge its duty in this behalf, intrusted this matter of the introduction of water to an agency named the 'Board of Water Commissioners,' and in the name of this agency these lands were purchased and are now held. But they are held merely as a trust. In substance, the land was bought and paid for, and is now clearly the property of the city."

These and many other cases we have examined establish the doctrine that the waterworks are held for the benefit of the public, and are therefore subject to legislative control. In this case it appears affirmatively that this act of 1903 was passed at the request and with the approval of the board of aldermen of Charlotte. That the Legislature may empower the city, by its appointed agencies, to dispose of property held upon trusts for the public, is settled. Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 575. Judge Dillon, after noticing a case holding that the power to take, hold, sell, and dispose of property so held confers the power to mortgage, says that he cannot concur with that view, and proceeds to say: "Under charter authority to make all contracts which they may deem necessary for the welfare of the city, a mayor and councilman were considered to have the power to mortgage the city waterworks for the payment of bonds lawfully issued for the construction of the same." Without adopting this view of the law, we have no difficulty in holding that, by express permission of the Legislature, the board may execute a valid mortgage conveying the waterworks, etc., for the purpose of securing the bonds. The plaintiffs suggest that, as the act of 1899 applied the rents and tolls of the waterworks, the act of 1903 cannot divert them. Certainly the holders of the bonds of 1897 had no lien upon or contract right to these rents. The bonds were issued two years before the act was passed. Therefore the purchasers could not look to any other claim upon the city than its general revenues.

In Adams v. Mayor, etc., of Rome, 59 Ga. 765, Bleckley, C. J., says: "With the proceeds of the bonds the waterworks were paid for. The holders of the bonds received them without other express security than those offered by the special act. These provisions were, in substance, that all the property within the city, real and personal, should be subject to taxation pro rata for the payment of the interest and the redemption of the bonds.

* * * It is argued in behalf of the city that the means of liquidation thus provided for by law are exclusive, and that for that reason the mayor and council could not devote the waterworks or any other property to the payment of the interest or to the discharge of the principal of the bonds. We think otherwise. The special act was not intended, as it seems to us, to narrow or cut down the charter in respect to the power of disposing of the corporate property, or of applying the same to the corporate indebtedness by any contract deemed by the mayor and council necessary for the welfare of the city."

The Supreme Court of the United States, speaking of the cases which hold that corporate property pledged to the payment of bonds may not be diverted from that purpose, says: "They simply hold that an act of the Legislature passed after a contract is made which withdraws property then liable to be seized and sold in enforcement of that contract from the power of the courts to seize and sell it impairs the obligation of the contract. But it has never been held, so far as we are advised, that a statute dealing with property not subject to sale for the enforcement of the contract cannot, in providing for a change in the mode of the title by which the debtor holds it, continue the exemption from forced sale of that which it represents in the hands of the same owner the property so exempt."

We have not overlooked the case of Vaughan v. Commissioners, 118 N. C. 636, 24 S. E. 425, in which it is held that the commissioners of a county may not mortgage the courthouse to secure bonds issued for the purpose of building it. There was no legislative authority conferred to do so. There is no suggestion in the opinion of the court that such power could not be conferred.

The only case to which our attention has been called which militates against the view which we have taken is City of Joliet v. Alexander (Ill.) 62 N. E. 861. Without extending this opinion with a discussion of the facts therein, and the conclusion reached by the court, we do not regard it as controlling us in the disposition of this case. The power to execute a mortgage does not appear to have been conferred by the statute, the terms of which are not set out.

In Southport v. Stanley, 125 N. C. 464, 34 S. E. 641, this court, construing section 3824 of the Code, says: "The reasonable construction of the statute must be that the town or city authorities can sell any personal property, or sell or lease any real estate which belongs to the town or city, as the surplus of the original acreage ceded for the town or city site, or such land as may have been subsequently acquired or purchased. But in no case can the power be extended to the sale or lease of any real estate which * * * is to be held in trust for the use of the town, or any real estate * * * which is devoted to the purpose of government, including town or city hall, market houses, houses used for fire departments, or for water supply, or for public squares or parks. To enable the town to sell such real estate as is mentioned just above, there must be a special act of the General Assembly authorizing such sale or lease."

It is stated that, to enable the commissioners to furnish water for municipal purposes at a reasonable expense, it is necessary that it be furnished to citizens at a fair and reasonable rental. The power of the city to do this was brought into question in Slocumb v. Fayetteville, 125 N. C. 362, 34 S. E. 436. Furches, J., said: "We see no objection to the town furnishing electric lights and power to its citizens at uniform rates, as this is a means of local assessment according to the special benefits received by such parties over that of the general public, and these assessments may be used for the support of the concern and the general benefit of the whole." We think this language meets the objection to the power of the board, with legislative sanction, to pledge the tolls, rents, etc., of the public waterworks to the purposes prescribed by the act. Such assessments are no part of the revenue of the city derived from taxation. The distinction between the taxing power and the power to levy assessments for special benefits is clearly pointed out by this court in Shuford v. Commissioners, 86 N. C. 552, and other cases in which the question is discussed and decided. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc., p. 1168. We can see no reason why the Legislature may not, under its general power to provide for the government of cities and towns, and legislate in regard to them, authorize the board of water commissioners to apply the rents and tolls as they accrue to the purposes set out in the act, and to pledge such application. The contract thus made will be enforceable by appropriate remedies. We therefore hold that the bonds authorized by the act of 1903 to be issued do not constitute a debt against the city of Charlotte; that the waterworks now owned by the board of water commissioners, or hereafter to be purchased, with all rights and franchises appurtenant thereto, are held by the said board in trust for the use of the city, and are not subject to be sold for any indebtedness of the city; that the act of 1903 does not impair any rights of the holders of the bonds issued pursuant to the provisions of the acts of 1881 and 1897; that the Legislature has the power to authorize the issuing of the bonds and execution of the mortgage proposed to be issued and executed pursuant to the act of 1903; that, pursuant to the provisions of said act, the board of water commissioners has the power to pledge the rents and tolls accruing from the operation of said waterworks to the purposes specified in said act.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed. Affirmed.

SEVERANCE et al. v. MURPHY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1902.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS — DISPENSARY ACT — LOCATION OF DISPENSARY — POWERS OF COUNTY BOARD — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Cr. Code, § 563 (Dispensary Act, § 7; 22 St. at Large, p. 128, § 7), which provides that the county board shall designate a locality for a dispensary, and that on petition of a majority of the voters such location may be prevented, is not in violation of Const. art. 3, § 34, subd. 11, as special legislation, in that it provides for the location of dispensaries in certain named counties.

2. Under Cr. Code, § 563 (22 St. at Large, p. 128, § 7), providing that, where the county board of control designates a locality for a dispensary on 20 days' public notice, a majority of the voters of the township can prevent its location by signing a petition to the county board requesting that no dispensary be established in such township, a designation is sufficient without stating the exact location as to street or number of the building in which the dispensary is to be situated.

3. Where a county board is authorized to establish a dispensary in a county, the fact that elections have been had in the county resulting adversely to the location of the dispensary is no ground to enjoin such location on an allegation that such act by the county board is unreasonable and unjust.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Williamsburg County; Dantzler, Judge.

Action by P. E. Severance and E. J. Wilkes against R. A. Murphy and others, members of the board of control of Williamsburg county. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

So much of the circuit decree as relates to the constitutionality of the act in question is as follows:

"Plaintiffs contend that section 7 of the act of 1896 (22 St. at Large, p. 128) is unconstitutional, 'in that the same contravenes section 5 of article 1 of the Constitution, in that the citizens of Williamsburg county and the citizens of Lake City and other incorporated towns in the county of Williamsburg are denied the equal protection of the laws accorded by said acts to the citizens of the other counties and incorporate towns of the state, and the immunities and privileges of citizens of said town of Lake City and of the county of Williamsburg are abridged by the seventh section of said act; that the same is unconstitutional also in this: that it contravenes subdivision 11 of section 34 of article 3 of the Constitution in this: that the proviso of the said section * * * provides for the establishment of dispensaries throughout the county of Williamsburg in a manner different from that provided by said act for the other counties of the state, thereby rendering said act a special act, in that it is not uniform in its operation throughout the state; that the seventh section of the said act is unconstitutional also in that it undertakes to allow dispensaries to be located outside of incorporated towns in the counties of Horry and Beaufort, and in no other.' I cannot approve such contention of the plaintiffs. In the case of Utsey v. Hlott, 30 S. C. 365, 366, 9 S. E. 333, 339, 14 Am. St. Rep. 910, it is declared: 'While there may be just objections for local laws in general, it is well established that the authority that legislates for the state at large must determine whether particular rules shall extend to the whole state and all its citizens, or, on the other hand, to a subdivision of the state or single class of its citizens only. The circumstances of a particular locality of the prevailing sentiment in that section of the state may require or make acceptable different police regulations from those demanded in another. The Legislature may therefore prescribe different laws of police in each district municipalities, provided the state Constitution does not forbid. These discriminations are made constantly, and the fact that the laws are of local or special operation only is not supposed to render obnoxious in principle.' * * * If the laws be otherwise unobjectionable, all that can be required in those cases is that they be general in their application to the class or locality to which they apply, and they are then public in character, and of their propriety and policy the Legislature must judge. And as Mr. Justice McIver said in the case of State v. Berlin, 21 S. C. 296, 53 Am. Rep. 677, the whole matter is well summed up in a note on the same page of Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (390), in the following words: 'To make a statute a public law of general obligation, it is not necessary that it shall be equally applicable to all parts of the state. All that is required is that it shall apply equally to all persons within the territorial limits described in the act.' In the case of Utsey v. Hlott, supra, it was averred that a certain act of the General Assembly was unconstitutional, in that it violated section 12 of article 1 of the Constitution of 1868; and in the case at bar it is urged that section 7 of the act of 1896 (22 St. at Large, p. 128) and the amendatory act of 1902, contravene the corresponding section of the Constitution of 1895, to wit, section 5 of article 1. While the section of the act in question prescribes a method of establishing dispensaries in the county of Williamsburg different from other sections of the state, yet the provisions of that section are general in their application to the class or locality to which they apply, and apply equally to all persons within the territorial limits of Williamsburg county.

"Nor can subdivision 11, § 34, art. 3, of the Constitution, avail the plaintiffs. While that section declares that 'in all other cases where a general law can be made applicable no special law can be enacted,' yet the proviso of section 12 of the same section declares 'that nothing contained in this section shall prohibit the General Assembly from enacting special provisions in general laws.' My construction of the proviso in question is that it is a special provision in the general dispensary law, and is not, therefore, in contravention of that section of the Constitution invoked by the plaintiffs. Grocery Co. v. Burnett, 61 S. C. 205, 39 S. E. 881, 58 L. R. A. 687.

"Furthermore, section 11 of article 8 of the Constitution confers upon the General Assembly, 'in the exercise of the police power,' the right to 'authorize and empower state, county and municipal, all or either, under the authority and in the name of the state, to buy in any market and retail within the state, liquors and beverages in such packages and quantities, under such rules and regulations as it deems expedient. * * *' This section is very comprehensive, and, it seems, confers such power upon the General Assembly of the state, in relation to the subject-matter of the section, as is limited by the disposition of that legislative body to determine what legislation is expedient for the purchase and sale of 'alcoholic liquors and beverages within the state.' It is independent of, and is not to be controlled by, any other section of the Constitution. I therefore hold, and so adjudge, that 'section 7' of the act of 1896 is constitutional, and that the amendatory act of 1902 is a valid 'exercise of the police power' by the General Assembly, as authorized by section 11 of article 8 of the Constitution."

From the circuit decree the defendants appeal.

U. X. Gunter, Atty. Gen., for appellants.
W. L. Bass and S. W. G. Shipp, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The defendants, constituting the board of control of Williamsburg county under the dispensary law, had printed in the County Record, a newspaper published at Kingstree, the following notice:

"All voters in Lee Township, county of Williamsburg, State of South Carolina, are hereby notified that application has been made to the county board of control of said county of Williamsburg for the location of a dispensary at Scranton, in Lee Township, and one at Lake City, in Lee Township, both in the county of Williamsburg, State of South Carolina, and that petitions for and against the location of said dispensaries will be received by the undersigned, county board of control, for twenty days from date hereof.

"[Signed] R. A. Murphy, Chairman,

"S. M. McClary,

"P. G. Gourdin,

"County Board of Control."

This notice was given under section 563 of Criminal Code (section 7 of dispensary law of 1896; 22 St. at Large, p. 128), which, for a proper understanding of this discussion, it is necessary to set out in full. After amendment by the act of February, 1902, this section reads as follows:

"There may be one or more county dispensers appointed for each county, the place of business of each of whom shall be designated by the county board, but the state board of directors must give consent before more than one dispenser can be appointed in any county; and when the county board designates a locality for a dispensary, twenty days' public notice of which shall be given, it shall be competent for a majority of the voters of the township in which such dispensary is to be located to prevent its location in such township by signing a petition or petitions, addressed to the county board, requesting that no dispensary be established in that township. The county board may in its discretion locate a dispensary elsewhere than in an incorporated town in the counties of Beaufort and Horry, and no others, except such as are authorized by special act of the General Assembly: provided, however, that any county, town or city wherein the sale of alcoholic liquors was prohibited by law prior to July 1, 1893, may secure the establishment of a dispensary within its borders in the following manner: Upon petition signed by one-fourth of the qualified voters of such county, town or city wishing a dispensary therein being filed with the county supervisor or town or city council, respectively, they shall order an election submitting the question of dispensary or no dispensary to the qualified voters of such county, town or city, which election shall be conducted as other special elections; and if a majority of the ballots cast be found and declared to be for a dispensary, then a dispensary may be established in said county, town or city: provided, that dispensaries may be established in the counties of Williamsburg, Pickens and Marion, and at Seneca and other towns now incorporated in Oconee county, without such election, on compliance with the other requirements of this chapter: provided, that nothing in this chapter contained shall be so construed as to prohibit persons resident in counties which shall elect to have no dispensary from procuring liquors from dispensaries in other counties, or county dispensers from shipping same to their places of residence under proper labels or certificates: provided, further, that nothing in this chapter shall be construed to repeal an act entitled 'An act to allow the opening of dispensaries in Pickens and Oconee counties,' approved December 18th, 1894." 23 St. at Large, p. 1105.

Upon publication of this notice this action was instituted by the plaintiffs, residents of the town of Lake City, in Lee township, to enjoin the defendants from taking any further steps to establish a dispensary in Lee township. The complaint rests, first, on the allegation that the section above quoted is unconstitutional in so far as it provides "that dispensaries may be established in the counties of Williamsburg, Pickens and Marion, and at Seneca and other towns now incorporated in Oconee county, without such election, on compliance with the other requirements of this chapter," on the grounds that the immunities and privileges of the citizens of Williamsburg and the counties mentioned with it are thereby abridged; and that this provision denies to the citizens of the counties named the equal protection of the laws accorded by the dispensary law to the citizens of other counties; and that, inasmuch as this portion of the section is not uniform in its operation throughout the state, it is special legislation, contravening subdivision 11 of section 34 of article 3 of the Constitution. The second proposition of the complaint is that "said notice was fatally defective, in that the board did not designate a locality in said Lee township, but merely gave notice that in the future that they might make such designation, but whether they would or not was left uncertain; and the board has never otherwise designated a locality for the establishment of a dispensary in Lee township, and given twenty days' public notice thereof; that the said notice was also defective in that the same did not specify, as required by law, the building, giving street and number or location, in which the dispensary was to be carried on at Lake City, in said township." The defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

His honor Judge Dantzler sustained the constitutionality of the provision of the section of the dispensary law above quoted relating to Williamsburg and other counties included with it upon reasoning so clear and conclusive that we shall not attempt to strengthen it. He held, however, that the notice was fatally defective, and on this ground permanently enjoined the defendants from taking further proceedings towards establishing a dispensary in the town of Lake City, in Lee township. In this, we think, he was in error. The portion of the section now under consideration provides: "And when the county board designates a locality for a dispensary, twenty days' public notice of which shall be given, it shall be competent for a majority of the voters of the township in which such dispensary is to be located to prevent its location in such township by signing a petition or petitions, addressed to the county board, requesting that no dispensary be established in that township." The word "designate," as here used, certainly does not mean that the board shall name a place where they have determined to establish a dispensary, for the law contemplates no conclusion, or even intention, upon the part of the board until the majority of the voters have had 20 days to prevent its establishment by petition. The true interpretation of the law is that the board must indicate by public notice that they have under consideration the establishment of a dispensary at a designated place, so that the voters of the township may have opportunity to petition against it. No argument is necessary to show the notice now under consideration fully met this requirement.

The circuit judge further held that the designation of locality required to be stated in the notice meant not only the designation of the town, but the place in the town where the dispensary was to be placed. Nothing short of the clearest expression of legislative intention would justify this view, for the board of control in that case might have to rent or purchase property for a dispensary before giving notice, and run the risk of having it on their hands in consequence of an adverse petition by a majority of voters. It will be observed the statute provides for the designation of a "locality" within the limits of a township, not a town. A particular town is a locality in a township, while a street or street number is a locality in a town. That the General Assembly did not mean to limit the meaning of the word "locality" in this section to a particular building or lot is further shown by the fact that, when such exactness was regarded essential, the act so provides in unmistakable language. In section 564 of Criminal Code it is enacted concerning the appointment of dispenser: "The county board of control shall authorize him to keep and sell intoxicating liquors as in this chapter provided, and every appointment so made shall specify the building, giving the street and number or location, in which intoxicating liquors may be sold by virtue of the same." Again, we find this act provides in section 565 of Criminal Code: "The county board of control shall designate or provide a suitable place in which to sell the liquors." This designation of the place—that is, lot or building—in which the business is to be conducted requires no notice to the public, and the act manifestly contemplates it shall be provided or designated after the board of control have taken the preliminary steps by publication of notice, etc., and have decided to establish a dispensary in a certain locality. It is clear that the law contemplates the board of control, before opening a dispensary within the limits of a township, shall give public notice designating the locality by mentioning the town, village, or other definite neighborhood where they contemplate establishing it. The majority of the voters of the township may keep it out of the township by petition. If the requisite petition is not presented, the board of control without public notice designates the exact place in the town, village, or neighborhood which it regards suitable for the dispensary. We think the notice here under consideration substantially complied with all the requirements of the statute.

The plaintiffs' first and third exceptions and both of defendants' exceptions have been disposed of in the foregoing discussion.

The plaintiffs allege in the tenth paragraph of the complaint: "That it is unreasonable and unjust for the said board to attempt to locate a dispensary at Lake City, in said township, when a majority of the voters of the said town and township have indicated their objections thereto, as above set forth; and plaintiffs aver that said dispensary ought not to be located in said town and township until a reasonable time has elapsed, to wit, one year, from the time of such protest; and plaintiffs allege that they and other citizens ought to be protected from the great vexation, annoyance, and expense put upon them by the frequent attempts of the board to locate a dispensary at Lake City, in said township." In their second exception the plaintiffs submit these allegations are admitted by the demurrer, and are sufficient to sustain the injunction. It further appears from the complaint that an election was held in the town of Lake City on September 7, 1901, on the question of dispensary or no dispensary, and resulted adversely to the dispensary. On October 12, 1901, another election was held on the same question, and the town council passed a resolution "that the election be considered in favor of the dispensary by a majority of one, vote standing 30 for and 29 against." The complaint alleges that this election should have been declared against the establishment of a dispensary. Even if the October election was a nullity, or if the result should have been declared against the dispensary, this could not avail the plaintiffs, because, as we have already seen, the county board of control have the power to establish a dispensary in this instance without an election. The allegation of the complaint that after these recent elections it is unreasonable and unjust for the board to locate a dispensary at Lake City is a mere conclusion, and, if true, furnishes no ground for the court to attempt to limit the power conferred by law on the county board of control.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the complaint dismissed.

On motion of defendants, remittitur held up for time to prepare writ of error to United States Supreme Court, and November 20th Mr. Justice WOODS ordered that, on motion of George Galletly, Esq., attorney for the respondents, the order heretofore granted in the cause, staying the remittitur from this court to the circuit court of Williamsburg county, is hereby revoked.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 15, 1903.)

ESTOPPEL IN PAIS—TITLE TO LAND—DEFECTIVE FORECLOSURE—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGOR.

1. Evidence held to show such positive acts on the part of the true owner of the land, inducing an innocent party to purchase it as if the title were in another, as to estop the true owner from setting up title in himself, though no fraud was actually intended, and though he was ignorant of his title.

2. Where a mortgage was defectively foreclosed, the mortgagor can recover possession only by payment of the amount due on the mortgage debt.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Aldrich, Judge.

Action by Mary A. Chambers against A. G. Bookman, Mary A. Bookman, Osmund W. Buchanan, D. R. Flenniken, Sarah A. Davis, J. E. McDonald, Chas. A. Douglass, Obear & Douglass, David V. Walker, and Mrs. M. M. Flenniken. From decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. H. Lyles, for appellant. Halcott P. Green, for respondents Bookman, McDonald, Douglass, and Obear & Douglass. Jas. W. Hannahan, for respondent Walker. Robt. W. Shand, for respondent Davis.

Statement of Facts.

GARY, A. J. The issue involved and the facts of the case are thus set out in the report of the master:

"The object of the action was to have an adjudication of the title to a certain tract of land situate in Fairfield county, alleged by the plaintiff to have been owned by the defendant Mrs. Mary A. Bookman, and by her mortgaged to Mrs. Mary A. Holmes, by whom the mortgage was subsequently assigned to the plaintiff, which mortgage was foreclosed in an action in the court of common pleas for Fairfield county, wherein the plaintiff in this action was plaintiff, and the defendants Mary A. Bookman and others were defendants. It proceeded to the point of a decree in favor of the plaintiff for the foreclosure of the mortgage and for a sale of the premises by the sheriff for Fairfield county, after the decree of the circuit court had been affirmed on appeal to the Supreme Court, at which sale the property was bid off by Henry N. Obear, Esq., attorney for one Weston C. Bookman. But his bid was subsequently transferred to the plaintiff, and she was about to comply with the bid when an agreement was entered into between her and the defendant Mrs. M. A. Bookman for the conveyance of an interest in a certain part of the mortgaged premises to the said Mrs. M. A. Bookman. This agreement will be referred to later in this report. About this time it was discovered that the defendant A. G. Bookman claimed title to the said premises superior to the title of the defendant M. A. Bookman, and that the other defendants to this cause claimed liens and incumbrances upon said property operative through the said A. G. Bookman. The questions before me were as to the superiority of title, and they have been fully considered. I find the following facts:

"For some years prior to 1867, and up to the 4th day of January, 1869, one Jacob Bookman, of Fairfield district, now county, was seised in fee and possession of a tract of land situate in said district, containing some 1,200 or 1,500 acres, which embraced the tract of land in question described in the complaint in this action. In 1867, Adam F. Du Bard duly recovered a judgment against said Jacob Bookman for a large sum, and it was duly entered in the office of the clerk of the court of common pleas for said district, now county, and state, and a writ of fi. fa. was duly issued to the sheriff of that county. By virtue of the fi. fa. so issued, L. W. Du Val, Esq., sheriff, Fairfield district, now county, levied upon the tract of land in question, and a homestead being claimed by Jacob Bookman, it was set off to him, comprising the residence and 40 acres of land carved out of the tract levied upon. The balance of the tract was sold, and purchased by one S. W. Bookhart, who received a deed therefor, duly executed and delivered by said sheriff, bearing date the 4th day of January, 1869, which was duly recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyances for Fairfield county. Thereafter the said S. W. Bookhart reconveyed the said tract of land to Jacob Bookman, by deed dated the 29th day of January, 1869, and duly recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyances for said county and state. This deed, in consideration of $4,100, conveyed the said premises to the said Jacob Bookman in trust for the benefit of his children, upon terms specified in the deed, but I find that the trust originated in that transaction and was created by the said Samuel W. Bookhart at the instance and request of Jacob Bookman, said Samuel W. Bookhart intending to receive the full purchase price of said premises, and that the same should be secured by the mortgage hereinafter mentioned. On the same day, to wit, the 29th day of January, 1869, in consideration of said conveyance, to secure the entire purchase price thereof, said Jacob Bookman executed his bond to the said Samuel W. Bookhart, conditioned for the payment of $4,100, on or before the 1st day of January, 1870, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, payable annually, and compounded if not paid, and on the same day duly executed and delivered his deed of mortgage, whereby he undertook to mortgage the premises in question to secure said bond of $4,100. Subsequently, nothing having been paid upon the said bond, it was assigned by said S. W. Bookhart to one Starnes, and the defendant A. G. Bookman, who was then, and still is, the husband of the defendant M. A. Bookman, and was living upon said premises, agreed with Dr. Bookhart to assume the said debt, and, to satisfy the said Starnes, arranged to execute his note, indorsed by his wife, the defendant M. A. Bookman, and by Mrs. M. A. Holmes, who was then an aged lady, residing at Columbia, S. C., the aunt of his wife, Mary A. Bookman, and the mother of the plaintiff, Mary A. Chambers. This note was payable to the order of Dr. S. W. Bookhart, and, in consideration thereof, the bond and mortgage of Jacob Bookman, trustee, were turned over and delivered to the said A. G. Bookman, who, by the arrangement, caused the same to be assigned to Mrs. M. A. Holmes by an instrument dated the 14th day of September, 1877, to indemnify her from loss on her indorsement of said note. This arrangement was negotiated by the defendant A. G. Bookman, himself, with the purpose in view of accomplishing a sale of said premises so that they could be purchased in the name of his wife, Mrs. M. A. Bookman.

"Subsequently, at the instance and request of the defendant A. G. Bookman, Mrs. M. A. Holmes, the legal holder of said bond and mortgage, caused the tract of land to be advertised, under the powers contained therein, for 21 days in the Winnsboro News and Herald, and to be offered for sale before the courthouse door for said county and state, at which sale the defendant Mary A. Bookman became the purchaser at the price of $3,800. The evidence seems to show that this purchase price had been paid either at the time or subsequently. The whole transaction, however, was conducted with the full knowledge and approval of the defendant A. G. Bookman.

"It is now claimed that Mrs. Holmes was never compelled to pay anything on account of her liability on the note to Starnes, and evidence was introduced before me to show that the note was not protested at maturity, and, therefore, that Starnes could not hold Mrs. Holmes responsible. As before stated, the note was made by A. G. Bookman, payable to the order of Dr. S. W. Bookhart, and was indorsed by Mrs. M. A. Bookman and Mrs. M. A. Holmes, who thereby intended to become responsible to Dr. Bookhart for its payment. They thus, under the law of this state, became joint makers with A. G. Bookman, and were not entitled to notice of protest. Mrs. Holmes has been dead for a good many years, and no evidence was offered directly to the point that the note had not been paid by her. At any rate, the relations which are shown to have existed between Mrs. Holmes and the defendant Mary A. Bookman and her husband, A. G. Bookman, were such as to satisfy me that, although she may have held only the legal title to the mortgage as indemnity, she has received no payment except what was due to her, and none that did not meet with the full approval of both of the defendants M. A. Bookman and A. G. Bookman. It is seen that she repeatedly indorsed notes for both of the defendants, and united with them in guaranty-

ing their contracts for supplies for the running of their plantation. Mrs. M. A. Holmes executed to Mrs. M. A. Bookman a deed for the premises in question, bearing date the 4th day of February, 1878, whereby she recited the execution of the mortgage by Jacob Bookman, as trustee, to Samuel W. Bookhart, and the advertisement and sale under the powers contained in the mortgage, and that Mrs. M. A. Bookman had become the purchaser thereof at the price of $3,800, and undertook to convey the premises to her, but executed the said deed in her name only. Mrs. M. A. Bookman at once took possession of said premises, and her husband, A. G. Bookman, commenced to cultivate the same, claiming that he was cultivating the same as her property. Jacob Bookman, the trustee, continued to live on the premises with the family of A. G. Bookman, and does not seem to have questioned the title of the defendant M. A. Bookman, at any time. Indeed, he seems to have acquiesced in the arrangement whereby the title of the property was to be transferred to Mrs. Bookman. He died in the fall of 1883. Mrs. Holmes, who seems to have entrusted the management of the entire scheme to the defendant A. G. Bookman, seems to have been convinced that he had been successful in transferring the title to her niece, Mrs. M. A. Bookman, for we see that in 1882 she indorsed two notes made by A. G. Bookman and indorsed by Mrs. M. A. Bookman, the payment of which was secured by a mortgage made by Mrs. M. A. Bookman to her on the property in question for $1,900. These notes were afterwards paid by her, and represented the debt which was adjudged to be the second lien upon the property in question in the case of Mary A. Chambers v. Mary A. Bookman and others. In 1884, A. G. Bookman applied to Mrs. Holmes for a loan of $2,500 on the bond of his wife, Mrs. M. A. Bookman, secured by a mortgage of the premises in question. Mrs. Holmes referred him to Mr. Edward R. Arthur, who was her attorney in fact, and Mr. Arthur required that he should furnish a certificate from Mr. Buchanan, of the Winnsboro bar, as to the sufficiency of the title and its freedom from incumbrances. This was furnished in the shape of a letter addressed by Mr. Buchanan, dated January 5, 1884, to Mr. A. G. Bookman, and was delivered by Mr. Bookman to Mr. Arthur. Mr. Bookman also made representations that the title of his wife, Mrs. Mary A. Bookman, to the property in question, was good and free from incumbrances. Upon the strength of these representations, Mr. Arthur, acting as attorney for Mrs. Holmes, made the loan, and paid off, at the direction of Mr. Bookman, a note made by A. G. Bookman, indorsed by Mrs. M. A. Bookman and Mrs. M. A. Holmes, to Jones, Davis & Bouknight, and remitted the entire balance of the proceeds ($1,650) by a check payable to the order of A. G. Bookman, attorney for M. A. Bookman, and that amount was received by said A. G. Bookman and used entirely for his own purposes. No installment, either of interest or principal, having been paid upon the bond in question, the action above referred to, of Mary A. Chambers v. Mary A. Bookman and others, was commenced, and was defended by her upon the ground that, being a married woman, the money had been borrowed for the use of her husband, A. G. Bookman, and said defendant A. G. Bookman actively prosecuted said defense, testifying on his wife's behalf that every dollar of the proceeds of the money had gone to his own benefit and not to hers. Notwithstanding this defense, the circuit court decreed in favor of the mortgage, from which decree an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, where it was affirmed. In said cause, Mr. Buchanan appeared as the attorney for Mrs. M. A. Bookman, defendant, and Mr. Obear appeared as attorney for one of the defendants to said cause. At the sale under such decree, Mr. Obear bid in the property as attorney. It was afterwards learned that in making such bid he acted as attorney for Weston C. Bookman. After the decree of the Supreme Court affirming the decree of the circuit court in said cause, some time prior to May, 1889, the defendant A. G. Bookman learned, through a communication from Mr. Buchanan, that there was some defect in the proceedings for the sale under the Jacob Bookman mortgage, and that the title to the premises in question was probably in himself and his brothers and sisters, as children of Jacob Bookman. He thereupon procured from all of his brothers and sisters a deed of conveyance for their interests in said premises, and he now sets up that title as against the claim of the plaintiff that the title is in the defendant Mrs. M. A. Bookman.

"It is contended by the plaintiff that the execution of the bond and mortgage by Jacob Bookman, being a part of the transaction whereby the trust itself was created, and being the consideration for the deed creating the trust, was binding upon the trust estate, and I concur in their view upon this point. It is further contended that, although the deed whereby Mrs. Holmes undertook to convey the premises in question was defectively executed, so as not to operate as a deed of conveyance, Mrs. M. A. Bookman having entered into possession upon the sale and having paid the purchase money; that she has a good equitable title as purchaser in possession, having paid the purchase money, and also that her title, by possession and the statute of limitations, has ripened into a perfect title. I am inclined to think that she is correct in both these views, but I do not rest my judgment upon either of them. She further contends that even if not correct in either of these views, the defendant A. G. Bookman, and all of the other defendants who claim as privies with him, are estopped by his active participation in the negotiation of the loans in question, and by his representation that the title of the property was in Mrs. M. A. Bookman, from now averring to the contrary.

"I find as facts that the connection of Mrs.

Holmes with this matter, and every step taken by her towards the consummation of the arrangement, was with the full knowledge and at the solicitation of the defendant A. G. Bookman, and that, if the defendant Mrs. M. A. Bookman did not acquire a good title to the premises by the purchase in question, it was because of the failure to accomplish what the defendant A. G. Bookman represented would be accomplished by such proceedings; and that when the defendant A. G. Bookman applied to Mrs. Holmes and her attorney in fact, Mr. Arthur, for the loan above referred to, they had the right to rely upon the representations, then and previously made, that the title to the property in question was in Mrs. M. A. Bookman, and that the said A. G. Bookman, having then and previously actively represented the title so to be in Mrs. M. A. Bookman, and having made use of the funds so borrowed for his own purposes, it would be the grossest fraud upon the holder of the mortgage for him now to be allowed to aver that the title was not in Mrs. Bookman. Mr. Arthur, who acted for Mrs. Holmes as her attorney in fact, is certainly not shown to have known or had any reason to suspect any defects in the title. It is urged that Mrs. Holmes, having been the assignee of the mortgage, and having allowed the sale to be transacted in her name, is bound to know of the defects in the title of Mrs. Bookman. In this I do not concur, as she received the papers only from A. G. Bookman, and seems to have known only what he represented to her. The sale seems to have been transacted with his full knowledge and consent, and I have reached the conclusion that even then she had full reliance upon his representations and his faithfully performing acts necessary to carry out the scheme which had been formed for the transfer of the title to Mrs. M. A. Bookman. If the money due to Mr. Starnes on his note was never paid, it was because the defendant A. G. Bookman desired and requested that it should not be paid. I therefore am of opinion that every principle of equity now estops him from setting up his title to the premises in question.

"The other defendants, except Mrs. M. A. Bookman, all claim through mortgages executed by him subsequent to the mortgage to Mrs. M. A. Chambers, and therefore are privies with him and bound by this estoppel, unless they can put themselves in position of purchasers for value without notice of the equity. None of them have undertaken to prove the considerations of their mortgages, or that they did not have full notice of the claim of Mrs. Bookman and Mrs. Chambers, except the defendant Mrs. Davis, who took her mortgage from the defendant David R. Flenniken. Counsel for Mrs. Davis admits that, being the assignee of the bond and mortgage, which are sealed instruments, Mrs. Davis cannot occupy a higher position than the defendant David R. Flenniken, but that David R. Flenniken was in the position of a purchaser for value without notice, having taken the bond and mortgage in consideration of some other mortgage surrendered by Flenniken to Bookman, and said Flenniken had no notice. I find from the evidence that it is very uncertain as to what paper, if any, was surrendered by Flenniken at the time of the execution of the new mortgage, and I further find that at the time thereof said Flenniken was in such a position as to have been bound by knowledge of the claim of Mrs. Bookman. He had testified in the cause on the trial of the cause above referred to. He had, in 1888, taken from Mrs. Mary A. Caldwell, his mother-in-law, an assignment of her claim, which had been adjudged to be the first lien upon the premises in the name of Mrs. M. A. Bookman, and he was the actual holder of that claim at the time of the taking of the mortgage in question. That claim was subsequently paid to him by Mrs. M. A. Chambers, the plaintiff in this action, who took from him the assignment which he then and previously had held from Mrs. M. A. Caldwell. I therefore conclude that none of the defendants can avail themselves of the plea of purchasers for value without notice.

"The defendant Mrs. M. A. Flenniken sets up a mortgage executed to her by A. G. Bookman, trustee, upon the premises in question, in consideration of her conveyance of the premises to the said A. G. Bookman, trustee. She bases her right to so convey upon a tax title made by the sheriff of Fairfield county to her in 1895, at a sale of the property for delinquent taxes levied against the same as the property of the defendant Mrs. Mary A. Bookman. She produced in evidence a tax deed, signed by the sheriff, purporting to convey a tract of 300 acres to her. With reference to this claim, I find the following facts:

"That a tract of 300 acres of land was assessed for taxation in the year commencing the 1st of November, 1893, in School District 18, Fairfield county, in the name of the defendant Mrs. M. A. Bookman, and further find that this was intended to be the tract of land which is a part of the larger tract in question, as above stated. I find that the taxes were not paid by Mrs. M. A. Bookman, and that they became delinquent upon the books of the treasurer for Fairfield county. I find that the treasurer for Fairfield county issued to the sheriff for Fairfield county an original execution against the property of the defaulting taxpayer, but that he did not issue the same in duplicate, as the duplicate execution was produced before me still in the book of original executions. It was not filled out, and it is clear that it was never issued. I further find that the sheriff did not enter upon the premises in question and take exclusive possession thereof before the pretended sale thereof. I further find that the advertisement of the land was not such as was calculated to inform any one that the land in question so to be sold was the property which was undertaken to be conveyed. The advertisement, dated July 15, 1895, stated that the tract of land contained 390 acres, and that it was sold as the property of Mrs. M. A. Bookman for taxes for the year commencing November 1, 1895. There was not a single element of correct description except the statement that the property was situate in School District 18 of Fairfield county. No effort was made to state the boundaries. This sale occurred on the 5th day of August, 1895, but the money was not paid until the 9th of September, 1895, when the sheriff delivered the deed, which was produced and offered in evidence under the objection of the plaintiff's counsel, who afterwards moved to strike out the same because it was not a complete deed. The sheriff did not attach to it a duplicate of the execution lodged at the time by the treasurer, and did not indorse, even upon the original execution, any statement of his proceedings thereunder. I find that the original execution was duly returned to the treasurer of Fairfield county on the 9th of September, the day the sheriff received the payment of the bid. The sheriff did not undertake to put the purchaser, Mrs. M. M. Flenniken, into possession of the property. That she subsequently entered into an agreement with the defendants A. G. Bookman and Mrs. M. A. Bookman, whereby they executed to her a quitclaim deed in consideration of her reconveying the property to A. G. Bookman in trust for his children. I conclude that without the lodgment of a duplicate in his office, and the taking of the exclusive possession of the premises under the provisions of law, and the due advertisement of the said premises, that said sheriff had no authority of law to make the sale; and I further conclude that not having attached to the deed executed by him a duplicate of the execution, with the certificate as to his proper proceedings thereunder, and not having put the purchaser, Mrs. M. M. Flenniken, into possession of the property, that the deed in question was not executed with due formality, and that no title passed to said Mrs. M. M. Flenniken thereby.

"This brings me to the conclusion that the agreement referred to, entered into by the plaintiff and the defendant Mrs. M. A. Bookman, on the 27th day of December, 1890, should be carried into effect. By the terms of that agreement the plaintiff, Mrs. Mary A. Chambers, was to comply with the bid for the premises assigned to her by Henry N. Obeas, as above stated, and was thereupon to convey to the said Mrs. Mary A. Bookman in fee simple, but without warranty, 200 acres of said tract of land, to be selected by her, including the homestead of 40 acres thereof; but if, upon the test thereafter to be applied, it should appear that said homestead was not so to be sold by decree in said cause, and that consequently said Mary A. Chambers had acquired no title thereto by her purchase at said foreclosure sale, then said Mary A. Chambers would convey to said Mary A. Bookman, in fee, but without warranty, 40 other acres of said tract adjacent to that already conveyed in lieu of the said homestead, and that the said Mary A. Bookman was to pay the sum of $2,000, to be applied, first, to the payment of the Caldwell claim provided for in said decree, and then to the payment of any and all cost for which the said Mary A. Bookman might be liable, except the cost and disbursements of her own attorneys, if any there should be, and the residue to be paid over to the said Mary A. Chambers, or her attorneys, to be applied to the payment of her attorney's fees in said cause. The defendant Mrs. Bookman has paid to the plaintiff, Mrs. Chambers, on account of said agreement, the sum of about $800. The exact amount paid has not been satisfactorily established before me, and I therefore recommend that she be adjudged to pay the full sum of $2,000, with interest from the date of said agreement, and to be credited with the exact amount paid by her, to be ascertained by a further reference for that purpose, and that upon such payment the plaintiff, Mary A. Chambers, be adjudged to convey to her the said 200 acres, including the homestead, as I find that said homestead was included in the tract ordered to be sold in said cause; and I further recommend that the 200 acres of land so conveyed be charged with the payment of the costs and expenses of this case, to be taxed by the clerk of the court; and that if the said Mrs. Mary A. Bookman shall fail to pay said sum of money on or before the 1st day of November, 1901, that said 200 acres of land be sold by the clerk of the court of common pleas for Fairfield county before the courthouse door for said county, on sales day of December, 1901, or on some convenient sales day thereafter, for one-half cash, the balance to be secured by the bond of the purchaser and a mortgage of the premises, payable 12 months after date, with a clause providing for the payment of attorney's fees, taxes, etc., in case of foreclosure; and that out of the proceeds of said sale the costs and disbursements of this case and expenses of said sale be first paid, and then that the balance coming to the plaintiff, Mrs. Mary A. Chambers, to be ascertained as aforesaid, be then paid, and that the surplus, if any, be paid out to the other defendants in this case who have established their liens against the said defendants in the order of their priority, which has been settled by the decree of the court of common pleas for Fairfield county in the cause entitled 'McDonald & Douglass vs. A. G. Bookman et al.'

"All of which is respectfully submitted."

That portion of the decree of his honor the circuit judge relating to the priorital question in the case is as follows:

"I will next consider the question of estoppel. Estoppel must be established by the preponderance of the evidence, and the burden rests on the party claiming the estoppel. Bethune v. McDonald, 35 S. C. 88, 14 S. E. 674. The allegations of the complaint as to the estoppel are:

"Paragraph 3. That the defendant Mary A. Bookman was the niece of the said Mrs. Mary A. Holmes, and from about the year 1882 up to the present date was seised in fee of a certain tract of land situate in the county of Fairfield and said state, described in the mortgage hereinafter alleged, executed and delivered by her to Edward R. Arthur, attorney, and being so seised and possessed of the said tract of land, and desiring during the year 1884 to procure a loan thereon from said Mrs. Mary A. Holmes, she and her husband, the defendant A. G. Bookman, represented to Mrs. Mary A. Holmes that the said Mrs. Mary A. Bookman was seised in fee of the said premises, and that they were free from incumbrances save and except a mortgage previously executed thereon by the said Mary A. Bookman to the said Mary A. Holmes; and upon the earnest solicitation and the strong representations made by the said Mrs. Mary A. Bookman and A. G. Bookman to the said Mary A. Holmes as to the value of the said premises, and that the same were the property in fee simple of the said Mary A. Bookman, free from incumbrances other than as above stated, the said Mrs. Mary A. Holmes consented to make the loan so applied for, and instructed her attorney, E. R. Arthur, Esq., upon the delivery to him of a bond and mortgage executed by the said Mrs. Mary A. Bookman to him, as attorney, to pay over the money to the said Mrs. Mary A. Holmes."

"Paragraph 7. That in said transaction the said defendant Mary A. Bookman was represented by the defendant A. G. Bookman, as her attorney in fact, save in the act of executing the said bond and mortgage, and the proceeds of said loan were paid over to the said A. G. Bookman, as the attorney in fact of the said Mrs. Mary A. Bookman, and was in large part used by him without the knowledge or consent of the said Mrs. Mary A. Holmes or her attorney, but with the knowledge and consent of the defendant Mrs. Mary A. Bookman."

"Paragraph 15. This plaintiff alleges that the claim of said A. G. Bookman is without foundation; but, even if there had been color of right for such claim, he would be in law estopped from setting up the same on account of his representations and dealings with the said Mrs. Mary A. Holmes, through whom this plaintiff claims."

"Why should Mrs. Mary A. or A. G. Bookman have made the representations above set out, or any other, as to the title of Mrs. Mary A. Bookman? Mrs. Bookman derived all the title she had from Mrs. Holmes, and it would have been a strange demand on the part of Mrs. Holmes to ask Mrs. Bookman to say whether the deed she received from Mrs. Holmes, and for which she paid $3,800 had conveyed to her a good title. All of the parties honestly believed, at that time, that Mrs. Bookman's title was good, save for the mortgage she had put upon the place. The knowledge of Mrs. Holmes was as perfect as that of Mrs. Bookman or of A. G. Bookman. I shall not quote the testimony; but a careful study of it induces me to conclude, as matter of fact, that Mrs. Holmes, Mrs. Bookman, and the attorney who examined the title of Mrs. Bookman, all believed that Mrs. Bookman's title was good, and acted upon that belief. Under these circumstances there was no reason in asking A. G. Bookman his opinion of the title or his knowledge thereof. He could give no knowledge upon the subject to Mrs. Holmes. She knew every fact in relation to that title just as well, if not better, than either Mary A. or A. G. Bookman. The testimony failed to show that A. G. Bookman made the representations as alleged in the complaint; and, further, the testimony shows that Mrs. Mary A. Holmes did not act upon such representations as are alleged to have been made by A. G. Bookman regarding the title of Mary A. Bookman. In 1888 or 1889, A. G. Bookman was advised as to his rights under the deed of S. W. Bookhart to Jacob Bookman, and he then assumed possession and control of the land, and purchased the interests of the other children of Jacob Bookman. Prior to 1888, and the advice then received, A. G. Bookman did not know that he had an interest in said land. The recording of the deed from S. W. Bookhart to Jacob Bookman was constructive notice thereof; but, as matter of fact, A. G. Bookman believed, as did Mary A. Bookman and Mrs. Mary A. Holmes, that the sale and deed of Mrs. Holmes to Mrs. Bookman had passed the fee to Mrs. Bookman. A. G. Bookman, as the attorney or agent of his wife, Mary A. Bookman, approached E. R. Arthur, Esq., as the attorney of Mrs. Mary A. Holmes, to close a loan which, as alleged in the complaint, Mrs. Holmes had agreed to make to Mrs. Bookman, and had 'instructed her attorney, E. R. Arthur, Esq., upon the delivery to him of a bond and mortgage executed by the said Mrs. Mary A. Bookman to him, as attorney, to pay over the money to the said Mrs. Mary A. Bookman.' The said E. R. Arthur, instead of following such directions, refused to make the loan or to pay over the money until the title to the land was examined by an attorney at law and his report upon the title was received. This clearly shows that, if any representations as to title had been made by either A. G. Bookman or his wife, it was not relied upon, and that the loan was made upon the faith of an attorney's opinion which E. R. Arthur, Esq., required, and without which the loan would not have been made.

'The requisites of equitable estoppel, as laid down in Bigelow on Estoppel (3d Ed.)

434, and approved by our Supreme Court in Gaston v. Brandenburg, 42 S. C. 351, 20 S. E. 157, are as follows: '(1) A false representation or concealment of facts. (2) Such representation must have been made with a knowledge of the facts. (3) The party to whom such representation was made must have been ignorant of the truth of the matter. (4) The representation must have been made with the intention that the other party should act upon it. And (5) the other party must have been induced to act upon it.'

'What are the facts as regards these requisites? (1) The evidence does not show, by the preponderance thereof, that any representation or concealment in relation to the title to the land in question was made by A. G. Bookman. (2) If any representation was made by Bookman, it was made in ignorance of the true state of facts. (3) That while the party to whom such representations are alleged to have been made may have been ignorant of the true state of facts, she had the same and better means of knowing the truth than did A. G. Bookman. She had the mortgage of Jacob Bookman in her possession, she had the lands covered by said mortgage sold, and she made the invalid deed to Mrs. M. A. Bookman. She knew what she had done. (4) If there was any representation made by A. G. Bookman, as alleged, the evidence does not show that it was his intention that Mrs. Holmes or E. R. Arthur, Esq., her attorney, should rely upon his statements, nor that there was any gross or culpable negligence on his part in relation thereto. He readily complied with the demand made on him that the opinion of attorney at law on the title should be obtained before the loan could be made. (5) The representations of A. G. Bookman, if made as alleged, are not proven to have been the inducement to the making of the loan of Mrs. Holmes and her attorneys, because the loan was refused without the opinion of an attorney upon the title. (6) If Mrs. Holmes was misled, it may be that she was misled to her injury, but not by A. G. Bookman.

'It is alleged that A. G. Bookman received and used a part of the money for which the mortgage was given by Mary A. Bookman, and therefore he was, or should be, estopped. This is denied. The Supreme Court, in the case of Chambers v. Bookman, held that Mrs. Bookman borrowed this money, that her estate was bound by the mortgage given to secure it, and that what she did with the money could make no difference. She had a right to give it to her husband, and plaintiff had no right to complain.

'Having reached the conclusion that plaintiff has failed to make out her case that the defendant A. G. Bookman is not estopped by his representations or dealings with Mrs. Mary A. Holmes from asserting his title to the premises described in the complaint, it follows that plaintiff's cause or causes of action cannot be sustained, and that her complaint should be dismissed, with costs in favor of the defendants."

The plaintiff appealed from the decree upon numerous exceptions.

Opinion.

The first question that will be considered is whether the circuit judge erred in deciding that A. G. Bookman was not estopped from relying upon the fact that he was the owner of the land in fee. After careful consideration of all the testimony in the case, this court is satisfied that A. G. Bookman, by his active conduct, induced Mary A. Holmes, without fault on her part, to enter into the transaction with Mary A. Bookman which resulted in the execution of the mortgage that has given rise to this case. In volume 2, § 803, Pom. Eq. Jur., the author of that philosophical work says: "When all the varieties of equitable estoppel are compared, it will be found, I think, that the doctrine rests upon the following general principle: When one of two innocent persons—that is, persons each guiltless of an intentional moral wrong—must suffer a loss, it must be borne by that one of them who by his conduct, acts, or omissions has rendered the injury possible." It has been well said: "If one remains silent where in conscience he ought to speak, equity will debar him from speaking when in conscience he ought to remain silent." For a stronger reason he should remain silent when his active conduct has brought about the loss to an innocent party. In section 807 of Pom. Eq. Jur., under the head of "Fraudulent Intent Necessary in an Estoppel Affecting the Legal Title to Land," the general principle is thus stated: "The general rule is that, if a person interested in an estate knowingly misleads another into dealing with the estate as if he were not interested, he will be postponed to the party misled, and compelled to make his representation specifically good. It applies to one who denies his own title or incumbrance when inquired of by another who is about to purchase the land or to loan money upon its security, to one who knowingly suffers another to deal with the land as though it were his own, to one who suffers another to expend money in improvements without giving notice of his own claim, and the like; this equity being merely an instance of fraud which is evidence of an intent to deceive. In the language of a most recent decision, to preclude the owner of land from asserting his legal title or interest under such circumstances, 'there must be shown, either actual fraud, or fault, or negligence equivalent to fraud, on his part in concealing his title, or that he was silent when circumstances would impel an honest man to speak; or such actual intervention on his part, as in Storrs v. Barker, to render it just that as between him and the party acting upon his suggestion he should bear the loss.' What is the reason of this rule? It is accurately explained in this same decision. While the owner of the land may by his acts in pais preclude himself from asserting his legal title, it is obvious that the doctrine should be carefully and sparingly applied, and only on the disclosure of clear and satisfactory grounds of justice and equity. It is opposed to the letter of the statute of frauds, and it would greatly tend to the insecurity of titles if they were allowed to be affected by parol evidence of light or doubtful character." The most important "ground of justice and equity admitted by courts of equity to uplift and displace the statute of frauds concerning legal titles to land, by fastening a liability upon the wrongdoer, is fraud. There are many instances in which equity compels the owner of land to forego the benefits of his legal title, and to admit the equitable claims of another, in direct contravention of the literal requirements of the statute, but they all depend upon the same principle. The rule under consideration is strictly analogous to another familiar rule, that a legal owner of land cannot be turned into a trustee ex delicto by any mere words or conduct. A constructive trust ex delicto can never be impressed upon land as against the legal title by any verbal stipulation, however definite, nor by any mere conduct; such trust can only arise where the verbal stipulation and conduct together amount to fraud in the contemplation of equity."

Turning to the case of Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 166, 10 Am. Dec. 316, the court uses this language: "The presumption is that every person is acquainted with his own rights, provided he has had reasonable opportunity to know them; and nothing can be more liable to abuse than to permit a person to reclaim his property, in opposition to all the equitable circumstances which have been stated, upon the mere pretense that he was at the time ignorant of his title. Such an assertion is easily made and difficult to contradict. It is rarely that a mistake in point of law, with full knowledge of all the facts, can afford ground for relief, or be considered as sufficient indemnity against the injurious consequences of deception practiced upon mankind; and if the person, as in this case, is not merely silent and passive, but gives explicit confirmation of the title of the party in possession, and encourages him to sell and encourages the purchaser to buy, the case is greatly altered, and equity and policy equally dictate that he, and not the purchaser, ought to suffer. His ignorance of the law ought not to protect him from the operation of the rules of equity. He could easily have dispelled that ignorance, for he had the fact of the will of his daughter before his eyes; and, if he may be allowed to plead his voluntary ignorance in destruction of equitable rights growing out of his own acts and assertions, the grossest imposition and the greatest fraud might be practiced with impunity. It would seem, therefore, to be a wise principle of policy, that ignorance of the law, with knowledge of the fact, cannot generally be set up as a defense; and it appears to be settled, by a course of equity decisions, that ignorance of one's legal rights does not take the case out of the rule, when the circumstances would otherwise create an equitable bar to the legal title."

In the case of Dunlap v. Gooding, 22 S. C. 550, the court quotes with approval the following from Bigelow on Estoppel, 434: "It is now a well-established principle that when the true owner of property holds out another, or allows him to appear, as the owner of, or as having full power of disposition over, the property, and innocent third parties are thus led into dealing with such apparent owner, they will be protected. Their rights in such cases do not depend upon the actual title or authority of the party with whom they have directly dealt, but they are derived from the act of the real owner, which precludes him from disputing, as against such third party, the existence of the right or power which he caused or allowed to appear to be vested in the party making the sale."

In volume 2, Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 434, under the caption of "Distinction between Silence and Positive Act of Party Estopped," it is said: "The rule has been laid down unqualifiedly that silence, in the absence of knowledge of one's rights, will not work an estoppel. Thus the omission to assert title to land against persons dealing with it as their own, in the absence of knowledge of such title, will not estop the owner to set up his claim thereto. On the other hand, it has been held that positive acts tending to mislead one ignorant of the truth, which do mislead him to his injury, are a good ground of estoppel, and ignorance of title or right on the part of him who is estopped will not excuse his act. Thus, where an owner positively encourages another to purchase land from a third person on the faith that such third person is the owner, ignorance of the facts of the case will not, as a general rule, prevent the operation of an estoppel against him." See, also, Holland v. Jones, 48 S. C. 267, 26 S. E. 606; Wardlaw & Edwards v. Rayford, 27 S. C. 178, 3 S. E. 71.

Our conclusion from the foregoing authorities is that positive acts on the part of the true owner of land, which induce an innocent party to deal with it as if the title was in another, will estop him, even if he was ignorant of his title and no fraud was actually intended. The circuit judge was therefore in error when he ruled that A. G. Bookman was not estopped by his conduct.

There is another reason why A. G. Bookman cannot defeat the plaintiff's rights in this action. When Mary A. Bookman entered into possession of the land under a deed made in execution of a defective and invalid power of sale contained in the mortgage, believing that she was clothed with the legal title at the time of entry, A. G. Bookman's right to recover possession of the land was postponed until he paid the amount due on the mortgage, and he was remitted to his equitable right of redemption. In Sims v. Steadman, 62 S. C. 300, 40 S. E. 677, the principle is thus stated: "The main question is whether the heirs of the mortgagor are entitled to recover possession of the land from the defendants claiming under a continuous chain of title from one who entered upon the land, under a deed made in execution of a defective and invalid power of sale contained in a mortgage, in good faith and in the honest belief that he was clothed with the legal title, at the time of such entry. The cases of Givens v. Carroll, 40 S. C. 413 [18 S. E. 1030, 42 Am. St. Rep. 889], and Williams v. Washington, 40 S. C. 457 [19 S. E. 1], conclusively show that his Honor, the Circuit Judge, did not err in ruling that the defendants are entitled to be subrogated to the rights and equities of the original mortgagees. The complaint does not allege that the defendants, or those from whom they claim, entered into possession of the land forcibly and in violation of law, but simply 'that the defendants are in unlawful possession thereof, and withhold the same from these plaintiffs, claiming some interest therein.' The agreed statement of facts, and the decree of the circuit judge, show that Cook went into possession under and by virtue of his said purchase and deed, and that the defendants claim the land by a continuous chain of title from him. When one enters into possession of land under a deed purporting to convey legal title, believing that his title is good in fee, but which is nevertheless void by reason of the fact that the power of sale contained in the mortgage in pursuance of which the deed was executed was defective and invalid, equity will refer his possession to his deed purporting to convey the fee, to prevent him, in tenderness for his honest mistake, from being considered a trespasser. The case of Rabb v. Patterson, 42 S. C. 528 [20 S. E. 540, 46 Am. St. Rep. 743], shows that he is not a trespasser. The necessity of being clothed with a title purporting to convey the fee is set forth in 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 756, 785. Equity gives effect to the deed purporting to convey the legal title in so far as is necessary to protect the rights of those entering into possession of the land under these circumstances, and postpones the plaintiff's right to recover possession until he does equity by paying the amount due on the mortgage (Cathart v. Sugenhimer, 18 S. C. 123; Bailey v. Bailey, 41 S. C. 337 [19 S. E. 669, 728, 44 Am. St. Rep. 713]; Bryan v. Kales, 162 U. S. 411 [16 Sup. Ct. 802, 40 L. Ed. 1020]; Bryan v. Brasius, 162 U. S. 415 [16 Sup. Ct. 803, 40 L. Ed. 1022]), and remits him to his equitable rights of redemption." The question as to right of A. G. Bookman to redeem was not presented by the pleadings, and could not properly be considered, even if he was not estopped from raising such question. Johnson v. Johnson, 27 S. C. 309, 3 S. E. 606, 18 Am. St. Rep. 636; Sims v. Steadman, supra.

All other questions were dependent upon that of estoppel, and are satisfactorily disposed of in the report of the master.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

RISER v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 27, 1903.)

TORT OF SERVANT—LIABILITY OF MASTER—DEPOSITIONS—CERTIFICATE—PERSONAL INJURIES—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An action lies against a corporation and its servant for the willful tort of the servant, though the master has not directed or ratified the tort.

2. Under Code of Law, § 2283, providing that depositions taken de bene esse shall be retained by the officer until he delivers them into the court, or, together with the certificate, shall be sealed up by the officer, and directed to such court, and sent either by mail or express, where the certificate of the notary states that the depositions were retained by him until they were placed in the post office properly addressed, and that he personally placed them in the post office, it makes no difference whether he prepared the certificate before or after placing the depositions in the envelope.

3. In an action for personal injuries a physician cannot testify whether the shock of a stated collision produced a stated result.

4. Where an objection to evidence does not state the grounds thereof, it will not be considered.

5. Where there was nothing in the testimony in an action for injuries to plaintiff contesting the fact that he was a mail agent, assumption of such fact in an instruction is not erroneous as a charge on the evidence.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Newberry County; Izlar, Special Judge.

Action by Luther A. Riser against the Southern Railway Company and Marion Rich. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The following are defendants' exceptions other than those stated in the opinion:

"First. Motion to Require Election. 1. Error of the presiding judge in overruling defendant's motion to require plaintiff to elect upon which cause of action stated in the complaint he would proceed to trial, namely, the cause of action based upon ordinary negligence or that based upon willful tort. These causes of action are separate and distinct from and inconsistent with each other. The act of 1898 (22 St. at Large, p. 693) relieves plaintiff from election only where the acts of negligence or other wrongs are several acts, and where they cause or contribute to the injury. It is impossible that one act can be both negligently and willfully done, thus making of one act several distinct, separate, and inconsistent acts. It is equally impossible that an act negligently done should cause or contribute with the same act willfully done to the injury complained of, or vice versa.

"Second. Demurrer to Complaint. 2. Error of the presiding judge in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the complaint, which was as follows: The defendant, Southern Railroad Company, demurs to the complaint upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the action is based upon the alleged joint and concurrent tort of the railway company and its conductor. The facts alleged in the complaint show that the injury was the result solely of the negligence of the conductor, for which in a proper action the railway company may be held liable under the principle of respondeat superior, but which does not constitute a case of joint and concurrent tort.

"Third. Objections to the Jurisdiction. 3. Error of the presiding judge in overruling the objections of the defendant to the jurisdiction of the court, and in refusing the defendant's motion to remove the case to the United States Circuit Court; the grounds of said objection and motion being as follows:

"(1) That the said defendant is a non-resident of the state in which said suit is brought, to wit, the state of South Carolina, but is a corporation under the laws of the state of Virginia; that the matter and amount in dispute in said suit exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000; that the said suit is of a civil nature, being an action for $15,000 for personal injuries to the plaintiff caused on the 26th of September, 1901.

"(2) That prior to the time when the defendant was required by the laws of South Carolina to answer or plead to the complaint served upon defendant on January 17, 1902, to wit, on the 6th day of February, 1902, the defendant filed with the clerk of the court of common pleas for Newberry county, South Carolina, its petition for the removal of said cause to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, setting out the matters and things above set forth and more fully appearing in the said petition, which is now on file with the clerk of this court, and reference to which is hereby made as constituting a part hereof; that the defendant at the same time offered therewith and caused to be filed with the said clerk a bond with good and sufficient surety for its entering in said Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina on the first day of its next session a copy of the record in this suit, and for paying all costs that may be awarded by said Circuit Court if said court shall hold that this suit was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto.

"(3) That thereafter, to wit, on February 6, 1902, before the time for answering said complaint expired, the defendant served its answer upon the plaintiff's attorneys, and procured a certified copy of the record in said cause to be filed with the clerk of the Circuit Court of the United States aforesaid.

"(4) That the defendant is advised that it is the duty of this court, when said petition and bond have been filed, to proceed no further with the cause; that this court is without jurisdiction to pass any order or render any judgment therein.

"(5) That to proceed with the trial of this cause under the circumstances will deprive this defendant of a right guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of the United States, the right of removal of this cause to the Circuit Court of the United States under section 639 et seq., Rev. St. U. S., and acts of Congress amendatory thereof [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 520], and Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2.

"(6) The complaint states a separable, and therefore removable, case, so far as the Southern Railway Company is concerned. The facts alleged present a case where a master is liable only by reason of the sole negligence of a servant, in which the master has had no participation. The tort is that of the servant; the liability of the master is imputed by law. There is therefore no joint tort stated."

"4. Error of the presiding judge in holding: 'If it has been removed to the United States court, and Judge Simonton sent it back, it is properly before this court, and I overrule the motion.' The error consisting in his honor being controlled by the decision of Judge Simonton, whereas the defendant was entitled to the individual judgment of his honor upon the question, uninfluenced by Judge Simonton's ruling.

"5. Error of the presiding judge in holding: 'It cannot be made now. Having been made over and having been sent back, it cannot be made now' (referring to the motion to remove the cause). Judge Simonton having granted the motion to remand, from which no appeal lies, the only mode of securing a final decision of the question was to renew the motion in the state court to remove the cause, and to appeal from the ruling therein.

"6. Error of the presiding judge in holding that the court of common pleas for Newberry county had jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause.

"Fifth. Motion for Nonsuit. 10. Error of the presiding judge in not sustaining the first ground of the motion for nonsuit, which was as follows: 'The complaint alleges that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the joint and concurrent tort of the defendants. The evidence does not tend to sustain this allegation. On the contrary, if it tends to show any negligence, it is the negligence solely of the defendant Rich, for which in a proper action the defendant company may be held liable, but which does not make out a case of joint and concurrent tort.'

"11. Error of the presiding judge in not sustaining the second ground of the motion for nonsuit, which was as follows: 'The plaintiff having alleged a joint and concurrent tort of the defendants, the defendant Southern Railway Company, a foreign corporation, has been deprived of the right to remove this cause to the United States court. He should be required to prove the facts so alleged. To allow him to proceed in the state court without some evidence of this fact would deprive the defendant of a substantial right guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of the United States.'

"12. Error of the presiding judge in not sustaining the third ground of the motion for nonsuit, which was as follows: 'To allow the plaintiff, after alleging a joint and concurrent tort by a railroad company and one of its employes, to recover without proof of such joint and concurrent tort, but simply on proof of a negligent act of the employe, would deprive the company of its property without due process of law, contrary to amendment 14 of the Constitution of United States, for this reason: it would deprive the company of the right of reimbursement from the defaulting servant, which would otherwise exist.'

"13. Error of the presiding judge in not sustaining the fourth ground of the motion for nonsuit, which was as follows: 'A master cannot be held to be a joint tortfeasor with a servant in a willful or reckless tort calling for punitive damages unless he has authorized, directed, participated in, or ratified the same.'

"Sixth. The Judge's Charge. * * * 17. Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendant's first request to charge, which contained a correct proposition of law applicable to the case, as follows: 'The plaintiff having alleged a joint and concurrent tort of the defendants, the defendant Southern Railway Company, a foreign corporation, has thereby been deprived of the right existing under other circumstances of removing this cause to the United States court. To sustain this action he must, therefore, prove that the acts complained of were the joint and concurrent negligence of the defendants.'

"18. Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendant's second request to charge, which contained a correct proposition of law applicable to the case, as follows: 'The negligence of an employe, for which, and on which account only, the employer is liable, is not the joint and concurrent negligence of the employer and employé.'

"19. Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendant's third request to charge, which contained a correct proposition of law applicable to the case, as follows: 'To constitute a joint and concurrent tort on the part of employer and employé, it must appear that each had a direct share in such tort. The liability of the employer by reason of his relation to the employé does not make out a case of joint and concurrent tort.'

"20. Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendant's fourth request to charge, which contained a correct proposition of law applicable to the case, as follows: 'To allow the plaintiff, after alleging a joint and concurrent tort by a foreign corporation and one of its employés, to recover without proof of such joint and concurrent tort, would deprive such foreign corporation of the right of removal guarantied by the Constitution and laws of the United States.'

"21. Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendant's fifth request to charge, which contained a correct proposition of law applicable to the case, as follows: 'To allow the plaintiff, after alleging a joint and concurrent tort by a railroad company and one of its employés, to recover without proof of such joint and concurrent tort, but simply on proof of a negligent act of the employé, would deprive the company of its property without due process of law, contrary to amendment 14, Constitution of United States, for this reason: it would deprive the company of the right of reimbursement from the defaulting servant, which otherwise would exist.'

"22. Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendant's sixth request to charge, which contained a correct proposition of law applicable to the case, as follows: 'A master is not responsible in punitive damages for the willful tort of his servant unless he authorized or ratified it. To hold otherwise would deprive the master of his property without due process of law, contrary to amendment 14, Constitution of United States.'

"23. Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendant's seventh request to charge, which contained a correct proposition of law applicable to the case, as follows: 'A master cannot be held to be a joint tortfeasor with his servant in a willful or reckless tort calling for punitive damages, unless he has authorized, directed, participated in, or ratified the same.'

"24. Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendant's eighth request to charge, which contained a correct proposition of law applicable to the case, as follows: 'The plaintiff, not having alleged in his complaint any injury to his kidneys, is not entitled in this action to recover damages therefor.'

T. P. Cothran, for appellants. Johnstone & Welch, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for $15,000 damages on account of personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff in a railroad collision on defendant's line in Richland county, S. C., 26th September, 1901. The complaint sets forth two causes of action separately stated; one based upon the joint and concurrent negligence of the defendants, the other upon their joint concurrent willful tort. The complaint alleges that on the night of the 26th of September, 1901, the plaintiff was in charge of the United States mail as railway mail clerk upon the passenger train of the defendant Southern Railway Company, No. 16, the evening train from Greenville to Columbia; that said train collided at Fornance with freight train No. 72, the former running into the rear of the latter. The collision is alleged to have been due to the joint and concurrent negligence and carelessness and fault of defendants in the particulars stated in paragraph 6 of the complaint, the substance of which is that the defendant Rich, who was the conductor of No. 72, disobeyed orders, and ran his train ahead of No. 16, without allowing the time required by the rule, and, as a result, before he could get his train upon the side track at Fornance, the passenger train ran into the rear of his train while it was standing upon the main line. The second cause of action states the facts substantially as in the first cause of action, except that the conduct of the defendants is characterized as wanton, willful, and malicious. The answers of the defendants were separate, and contained a general denial of each and every allegation of the complaint. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $8,000. The defendants appealed upon numerous exceptions, which will be set out in the report of the case, except those hereinafter considered.

While the appellants' attorney insists upon the ruling of this court on the questions presented by the exceptions numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and 23, he has not argued them, as he is of the opinion that they have been decided by this court on previous occasions, adversely to the contention of appellants. He is right in this view, and, such being the case, we deem it only necessary to overrule those exceptions.

The assignment of error by the seventh exception is as follows: "Error of the presiding judge in admitting in evidence the deposition de bene esse of George R. North; the ground of objection by the defendants being that it did not appear that the package, at the time it was proposed to be opened, was sealed under the seal of the notary public, as required by law. On the contrary, it appears that all the notary public proposed to seal was the certificate of deposit with the postmaster, and that was sealed before the deposition was placed in the envelope." A photographic copy of the front and back of the envelope containing the deposition is set out in the record. Upon the back of the envelope there is in type-writing a certificate signed by J. A. Bell, notary public for North Carolina, to the effect that the deposition was retained in his hands until he personally deposited it in the United States post office in Charlotte, N. C., duly addressed to John C. Goggans, clerk of the court, Newberry, S. C. This typewriting extends across the flap of the envelope. The signature of the notary public is in ink, and is below this typewriting, but not across the flap of the envelope. The impression of the seal is below the flap, and over the notary public's name. These facts are sufficient to bring the case within the provisions of section 2883 of the Code of Laws, which is as follows: "Every deposition taken under the provisions of the two preceding sections shall be retained by the officer taking it, until he delivers it, with his own hand, into the court for which it was taken, or it shall, together with a certificate of the reasons aforesaid of taking it and of the notice, if any, given to the adverse party, be by such officer sealed up and directed to such court, either by mail or express, and remain under his seal until opened in court." The appellants' attorney, however, contends that the following facts show that the package containing the deposition was not sealed in the manner required by law: The impression of the seal shows clear through on the front side of the envelope, one stroke making both impressions. There was no evidence of the impression of the seal upon the contents of the envelope, which consisted of the testimony of the witness, certificate of the notary, etc., showing that the impression of the seal was made before the contents were placed within. When the certificate of the notary public taking the deposition shows that it was retained by him until it was placed in the post office properly addressed, and that he personally placed it in the post office, it makes no material difference whether he prepared the certificate before or after placing the deposition in the envelope. This is a substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute. By reference to the case of Travers v. Jennings, 39 S. C. 410, 17 S. E. 849, it will be seen that the facts in that case were quite different from those in the case under consideration. This case falls within the principle stated in McKenzie v. Barnes, 12 Rich. Law, 205, in which the court uses this language: "All the requisitions of these rules were chiefly directory to the commissioners, intended to suggest to them, usually persons beyond the jurisdiction of the court, means for guarding against frauds which may be practiced upon the depositions taken under the authority intrusted to them. So far as the requisitions of the rule now of force affect the discretion of the court itself, a substantial compliance with them, accompanied by appearances of fairness, may serve; whilst the most exact adherence would not countervail evidences of fraud. The names of commissioners must be 'written by themselves,' yet a commission from Australia would not be ordered to remain unopened until another one was sent to prove the handwriting of the commissioners; for who would prove the handwriting on the second one? Until the contrary appeared, the handwriting would be presumed genuine. With like indulgence, names written on a sealed envelope will be considered across the seals until some reason arises for supposing that the seals have been broken. * * * It has been supposed that 'across the seals' meant to require such arrangement of the names as would prevent breaking of the seals without disturbance of the names. It is, however, well known that, where skillful villainy is exercised upon the fastenings of paper packages, simple expedients relied upon to expose its tricks serve only to prove treacherous security and delusion. To the care and fidelity of the commissioners and the vigilant integrity of the post-office department the safe return of commissions sent by mail must be confided, and when, as rarely happens, grounds for suspecting unfairness are presented, a literal compliance with directions may be demanded to prevent fraud. But when there has been a manifest effort to pursue a direction, and its end has been attained, the court will not allow it to be turned to the defeat of a full and fair trial by nice discriminations between degrees of formality not plainly distinguished by material circumstances. The prominence given by the appellants, in their argument here, to their first ground of appeal, must be our excuse for the attention we have bestowed on it, so disproportionate to its intrinsic importance." This exception is overruled.

The assignment of error by the eighth exception is as follows: "Error of the presiding judge in sustaining the plaintiff's objection to the following question asked of Dr. McIntosh: 'Did the shock of that collision produce any injury upon Mr. Riser's kidneys?' Dr. McIntosh was a medical expert. More than that, he attended the plaintiff from the night of the collision, before he was removed from the place of the accident, to the time he left the hospital. His knowledge as an expert and his personal examination of the plaintiff qualified him to answer the question." There are two reasons why this exception cannot be sustained. In the first place, the question propounded to the witness was in antagonism to the rule laid down in Easler v. Ry. Co., 59 S. C. 317, 37 S. E. 938. The court has so recently considered the question raised by the exception that it only deems it necessary to refer to the authority just mentioned. In the second place, the record shows that the witness had already practically answered the question propounded to him. This exception is therefore overruled.

The assignment of error presented by the ninth exception is as follows: "Error of the presiding judge in overruling defendant's objection to the following question asked Mr. Rich: 'When this accident happened, were you retained in the service of the company?" the same being irrelevant." When the defendant's attorney objected to the testimony, he did not state the grounds of his objection. The numerous cases in this state show that the question is not properly before this court for consideration, and the exception must therefore be overruled.

The assignments of error in the fourteenth and fifteenth exceptions are as follows:

"(14) Error of the presiding judge charging the jury as follows: 'The Southern Railway having undertaken to transport the United States mail was bound to carry the agents in charge of the mail.' The error consisting in charging as matter of fact, in violation of article 5, § 26, Const. S. C., that the Southern Railway Company had undertaken to transport the United States mail, which was at issue."

"(15) Error of the presiding judge in charging the jury as follows: 'The company owed to this agent—this mail agent—the duty to carry him safely.' The error consisted in charging as matter of fact that plaintiff was a mail agent, and that he was on duty as such at the time of the accident, which facts were at issue, in violation of article 5, § 26, Const. S. C." Appellants' attorney does not discuss these exceptions in his argument further than to say: "Exceptions 14 and 15 impute error in charging upon the facts. A reference to them is all that is needed, we submit, to be convinced that error was committed." When the charge is considered in its entirety, it will be seen that the presiding judge submitted the facts at issue to the jury, and likewise charged the jury, that, "If the testimony satisfies you that the plaintiff was a mail agent in charge of the United States mail, and was on board of the passenger train of the defendant the Southern Railway Company at the time of the injuries of which he complains," etc.; thus submitting this specific fact for their determination. There is nothing in the testimony showing that this fact was contested. It seems to have been assumed even by the defendants' witnesses. These exceptions are likewise overruled.

The assignments of error in the sixteenth and twenty-second exceptions are as follows:

"(16) Error in charging the jury as follows: 'If the said negligent acts were done by the defendant, its agents or servants, wantonly, willfully, and maliciously, such mail agent would be entitled, on proving his case, to not only compensatory, but punitive, damages.' The error consisting in (1) holding a master liable for punitive damages for the willful tort of the servant without authorization, direction, participation, or ratification on the master's part; (2) in an action based upon the joint willful tort of master and servant allowing a recovery of punitive damages against the master upon proof of a willful tort by the servant without authorization, participation, direction, or ratification on the part of the master. In both instances depriving the defendant company of its property without due process of law, contrary to amendment 14, Constitution of the United States."

"(22) Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendants' sixth request to charge, which contained a correct proposition of law applicable to the case, as follows: 'A master is not responsible in punitive damages for the willful tort of his servant, unless he authorized or ratified it.' To hold otherwise would deprive the master of his property without due process of law, contrary to amendment 14, Constitution of the United States."

The cases cited in the argument of the appellants' attorney from this state show that the question is settled in South Carolina contrary to his contention. These exceptions are likewise overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

VIRGINIA ACCIDENT INS. CO. v. DAWSON, Secretary of State.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. May 16, 1903.)

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES—RIGHT TO DO BUSINESS—CERTIFICATE FROM SECRETARY OF STATE.

1. A foreign accident insurance company is not required to comply with section 2, c. 34, of the Code of 1899, and get its certificate to do business in this state from the Auditor, but gets its certificate from the Secretary of State, under section 30, c. 54, of the Code of 1899, upon complying with the latter section. It is not required to file a writing accepting the provisions of section 30, and agreeing to be governed thereby.

Poffenbarger, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition of the Virginia Accident Insurance Company for writ of mandamus to W. M. O. Dawson, secretary of state. Writ granted.

Rucker, Anderson & Hughes, for petitioner. Brown, Jackson & Knight, for respondent.

BRANNON, J. The Virginia Accident Insurance Company, a Virginia corporation, desiring to do business in this state, filed with the Secretary of State, March 7, 1903, a copy of the certificate of its corporation, and requested the Secretary of State to issue to it a certificate of the fact, as provided in section 30, c. 54, of the Code of 1899, as it appears in chapter 35, p. 108, Acts 1901, but the Secretary refused such certificate; and the company asks from this court a mandamus requiring the Secretary to issue such certificate, in order that it may carry on its corporate business in this state. The company's petition states that it engages in the business only of insuring persons against bodily injury sustained through external, violent, and accidental means only; that it issues but one form of policy; that, in case of accident to one of its assured, it is bound by its policy to pay him $7 per week during disability for a period not exceeding 26 weeks; that, in case of death within 16 weeks after the injury, the company would pay $60 to the representative of the assured; that under one policy the liability could not exceed $182; that its policy assumes risk for only one month at a time, and lapses in default of premium, which is $1 per month. The return of W. M. O. Dawson, secretary of state, to the mandamus nisi awarded by this court, presents for our consideration two reasons why the mandamus should not go: First, that petitioner is a foreign insurance company, and, as such, must get a certificate, not from the Secretary of State, under section 30, c. 54, Code 1899, but from the Auditor, under another statute (section 2, c. 34); and, second, that, if the Secretary is to issue a certificate, the company had not fully complied with section 30, c. 54, as it did not, in addition to filing the certificate of incorporation, also file a writing accepting the provisions of section 30 of chapter 54 of the Code of 1899, and agreeing to be governed thereby.

The case involves only the construction of our statute law pertinent to the subject. Does the certificate to enable the petitioner, as a foreign corporation, to do business in this state, emanate from the Secretary of State, under section 30, c. 54, Code 1899, or from the Auditor, under section 2, c. 34, Code 1899? That depends on the question whether an accident insurance company is an insurance company, within the meaning of section 2, c. 34. If it is, then the petitioner is not entitled to a certificate from the Secretary of State at all, but its certificate must come from the Auditor. On the other hand, if this company is not an insurance company, within the meaning of section 2, c. 34, then its certificate comes from the Secretary of State, if it has fully complied with section 30, c. 54, of the Code of 1899. Chapter 34 concerns insurance, telegraph, and express companies, generally, by its title, and by numerous detailed provisions as to terms upon which they shall operate, their taxation, service of process on them, and their liability. Section 1, as found in chapter 107, p. 234, Acts 1901, says that every insurance, telegraph, telephone, or express company having its principal place of business in this state, incorporated by Virginia before June 20, 1863, or by this state, shall be a domestic corporation; all others, foreign. This provision is applicable to all insurance, telegraph, telephone, and express companies. It distinguishes foreign from domestic corporations for the general purposes of that chapter, or any other, because there are certain provisions applicable to the one, and not to the other, and this section gives the test as to whether such a corporation is domestic or foreign for general legal purposes. It is applicable to all; but, when we come to section

2, we find it limited to particular corporations, reading: "It shall not be lawful for any officer, or agent of any life, fire or marine insurance company, directly or indirectly, to take risks or issue policies of insurance within this state, without first procuring from the Auditor a certificate as hereinafter directed. Before obtaining such certificate, such company, its officers or agents, shall furnish the Auditor with a statement under oath of the president or secretary of the company, for which he or they may act, which statement shall show: First. The name and locality of the company," and 10 other items of the statement, "which statement shall be filed in the office of the said Auditor." Clearly, this language is limited to "life, fire or marine insurance" companies. It does not include, but by implication excludes, accident insurance companies. Such are its words. Do not these words mean what they import? Though only the words "life, fire or marine insurance" are used, do they have a broader meaning, and include accident insurance—any insurance company? Do they include employers' liability insurance, or fidelity and guaranty insurance, or title insurance, or live stock insurance, or boiler or glass insurance? Will those words open to take in every new species of insurance that may come in the mutation of business in future? I think not. But it is so argued virtually. Let us go back to see whether those three words, "life," "fire," "marine," were sedately chosen. An act passed in 1867 (Acts 1867, p. 146, c. 117) laid a tax on "all insurance companies establishing agencies or doing business in this state except life and accidental," and required a deposit of $25,000 with the Treasurer. This favored life and accident companies, by exempting them from those demands. In the Code of 1868 we find section 2, c. 34, the parent of our present section 2, c. 34: "It shall not be lawful for any officer or agent of any foreign fire or marine insurance company, directly or indirectly, to take risks or issue policies without procuring a certificate from the Auditor as hereinafter directed." This included only fire and marine insurance. So did Acts 1871, p. 145, c. 107. Two acts of 1872-73, chapters 69 and 221, and Acts 1881, p. 294, c. 38, still include in the requirement of a certificate from the Auditor only fire and marine insurance; but in 1882 (Acts 1882, p. 202, c. 85) section 2 was amended to include life insurance companies. Chapter 108, p. 320, Acts 1891, again amended section 2, but did not widen it as to the character of the companies. Thus we see that the act of 1867 required of all insurance companies a deposit, but exempted life and accident companies. The Code of 1868 required of foreign insurance companies an invested capital of $200,000 in section 2, c. 34, "Of foreign insurance companies," but the section only named fire and marine companies. Accident and life companies were still exempted. The acts later exempted those two until 1882, when life companies were put into the section, but accident companies were still favored, as they were by the act of 1867. The Legislature, through several acts, favored life and accident companies, and then saw proper to make life companies come under the requirements of section 2, but still left out accident companies. Surely it knew of accident companies. Through eight acts amending section 2 it was choice in selecting the companies it would bring under the demands of section 2. The letter of that section does not include accident companies, and past acts show a purpose not to include them. Besides, there is reason for this. Fire, marine, and life insurance companies issue large policies, calling for hundreds of millions of dollars in the aggregate, and only a few policies are of inconsiderable amount, while accident companies have small risks, and do not compare with fire, marine, or life companies, either in the aggregate of policies, or in the amount of the several policies. The losses from them are incomparably smaller. Here we find a reason for difference.

But section 2, after requiring of all fire, marine, and life insurance companies a certain certificate, adds, "No foreign insurance company, or agent thereof, shall transact any business of insurance in this state unless such company is possessed of at least one hundred thousand dollars of actual capital invested in the stock or bonds . . . at the current market value at the date of such statement." It is said that this applies to all insurance companies, and includes accident companies. Observe that the section opens with requiring a statement of the character, assets, and other circumstances of only life, fire, and marine insurance companies, and in immediate connection it adds the obligation, as to foreign insurance companies, of having a certain capital. Why leave the words of the section a few lines above, in the opening words giving the companies to which the section relates—the subject of the section—and go off to find an accident, title, or guaranty insurance company, and apply this clause also to it? That clause makes this capital an element required for the issuance of the certificate, and that is the certificate required in the outset of the section only of life, fire, and marine companies. This capital requirement is not an element participating in a distinct certificate. It is only one certificate with which the section deals. As the office of this clause is to add a prerequisite to the certificate as to foreign companies, we must relate it only to those companies required to have that certificate. The section demands a certificate, by its words, only of certain companies, and specifies the requisites for it; and, having done this, section 3 requires the Auditor to issue that same certificate spoken of in the opening of section 2; that is, after the "statement" is filed, and evidence adduced of the invested capital, and in case it is a company of a state which requires a deposit of our companies, there must be also evidence that a like deposit has been made here. It is the one certificate which the section speaks of, and that is required only of life, fire, and marine companies by the letter of section 2.

It is admitted that the "statement," distinctively so called, is required only of life, fire, and marine companies. If so, accident companies do not have to file it. This tends to show that accident companies are not included. Note the words in section 2, "market value at the date of such statement." That statement is required only of life, fire, and marine companies. It requires the investment only of them. Stress is placed in argument upon the provision in section 2 that the Auditor may investigate the condition of any insurance company, and, if its condition is unsound, revoke its certificate. That does not broaden the scope of the section. That applies only where a certificate is required, and I repeat that there is but one certificate mentioned in the section, and that is the one required of life, fire, and marine companies. If no statement is required of an accident company, then no certificate is required of it, for the filing of the statement is an element of the certificate, or prerequisite. The same answer is given as to the feature authorizing the Auditor to revoke a certificate where a company holding it has failed to pay a judgment. It applies only in those cases where a certificate is demanded by the statute. It may be that such powers over unsound accident, title, stock, or other insurance should exist, but the Legislature has not yet provided for it.

We are called by the brief to consider section 18, c. 34, wherein it is provided that no agent shall make, renew, or negotiate any insurance without "first obtaining the Auditor's certificate of authority as required by law," and subjecting him to penalty for so doing. It is said this requires a second certificate. Whether so or not, it has no force on the question in hand. But this section does not define a second certificate. It is the certificate "required by law"; that is, by other law—the one issued to the company under section 3. The only purpose of section 18 is to enforce the provisions of section 2 requiring certain companies to have certificates of authority to insure. Insurance companies operate by officers and agents. If they are by punishment restrained from getting insurance for unauthorized companies, the evil contemplated will be suppressed; that is, the issue of insurance policies by companies which have no certificate of authority. It is needless to cite authority to prove that an accident company is different from a life or fire or marine insurance company. The difference is substantial. We cannot accede to the position that this company is a life insurance company because if death ensues it pays $60. It is not a life insurance company, within the meaning of section 2, c. 34. We think that life, fire, and marine insurance companies are the only ones contemplated by section 2. In answer to a question, we do not think that life, fire, or marine insurance companies obtaining a certificate under section 2, c. 34, have also to comply with section 30, c. 54, and get certificate under the latter section.

We conclude that accident insurance companies do not come under section 2, c. 34, of the Code of 1899, so as to require the Auditor's certificate therein specified. The Legislature has not yet so ordered. It has not yet seen fit to require of them $100,000 capital invested. We cannot legislate. We cannot amend the statute.

After writing the above, I discover that section 13, c. 34, was amended by chapter 107, p. 234, Acts 1901, so as to place a fixed license tax on foreign accident insurance companies. Until the act of 1901, they were not in that section by express specification. That section says that, if any company fail to make payment or report of business, the Auditor shall not issue to the company the certificate mentioned in section 3 of chapter 34; and from this it may be argued that, as foreign accident companies are brought under the license, they must obtain the Auditor's certificate, under section 2, just the same as life, fire, and marine insurance companies, and have invested capital of $100,000. To so hold, we must amend section 2 by inserting the word "accident," and make it read, "It shall not be lawful for any officer or agent of any life, fire, marine or accident insurance company * * * to take risks without the Auditor's certificate." We must thus amend the section by implication. We must do what the Legislature did not do. Nothing short of this will bring such result. The Legislature in 1901 selected certain sections of chapter 34 for amendment, but left section 2 untouched. Shall we amend it by inserting that word? The Legislature put it in one section, but not in the other. We cannot thus amend when the Legislature having the matter in hand has not done so. We must say that it intended to leave section 2 stand, and must give it as left standing, and section 13 as amended in 1901, each, effect. Thus we say that section 13 denies the Auditor's certificate to those companies in default required by section 2 to have such certificate, but that such companies as are not required by section 2 to have the certificate are not meant by that clause. Those companies not reporting business for license tax, or not paying it, are under section 14, which puts them and their agents under penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000. The act of 1901 did not insert accident companies in section 2, because it did not intend to require of them proof of $100,000 assets.

The next question is, is the petitioner entitled to a certificate from the Secretary of State under section 30, c. 54, of the Code of 1899? We think it is. That section says: "Any corporation duly incorporated by the laws of any state or territory of the United States, or of the District of Columbia, or of any foreign country, may unless it be otherwise expressly provided hold property and transact business in this state upon complying with the requirements of this section, and not otherwise." The requirement is only that it file with the Secretary of State a copy of its articles of association, and of the law or authority under which it is incorporated. Then the Secretary issues a certificate of the fact of filing such documents, and this certificate operates by law to allow it to do its corporate business in this state. If, however, the corporation is a railroad or other corporation doing business in this state, as lessee of the works, franchise, or property of another corporation, or person, or otherwise, it must, in addition to the documents just mentioned, file a paper, sealed with the corporate seal, accepting the provisions of section 30, and agreeing to be governed thereby. This is not required of any but such lessee corporation. The object of this provision is to prevent such lessee from escaping the liability imposed by that section on the plea that it is only a lessee. The section makes railroad corporations doing business in this state, as to property, works, and operations, domestic corporations. It was the purpose to compel agreement to be so liable as a domestic corporation in demanding a corporate consent from such lessee company. But this accident insurance company is not a lessee corporation operating works of another. The Legislature of 1893 considered that section 2, c. 34, would not apply to guaranty companies, as it put in a section making it apply to them. Code 1899, p. 121, c. 10. What the Legislature ought to have done is one thing. What it did do is another. Only the Legislature can cure defects. A court cannot legislate.

Therefore we award the mandamus.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting). The Virginia Accident Insurance Company, a Virginia corporation, and clearly a foreign corporation, within the meaning of the statutes of this state, asks for a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the Secretary of State to issue to it a certificate, under section 30 of chapter 54 of the Code of 1899, authorizing it to do business in this state. This application is resisted by the Secretary of State on the grounds that said company is not entitled to a certificate under said section, and that he has no authority to issue the same, and that said company must obtain its certificate and authority to do business in this state from the Auditor.

The solution of the question presented depends upon the construction of chapter 34 of the Code, under which, if at all, accident insurance companies must obtain such authority from the Auditor. Said company insists that only life, fire, and marine insurance companies are subject to supervision by the Auditor, and required to obtain from him authority to do business. Whether accident insurance companies fall within the requirements of said chapter must be determined by reference to the several acts of the Legislature, commencing with section 8 of chapter 113, p. 146, of the Acts of 1863, requiring, among other things, a license to any person to "act as agent for any foreign insurance company," and inflicting a penalty of not less than $5 nor more than $50 for acting without such license. Section 55 of chapter 118, p. 166, of the Acts of 1863, required every agent of any insurance company incorporated by any other state or government to return under oath to the assessor, annually, the gross receipts of such agency. Section 16 of chapter 123, p. 222, of the Acts of 1863, imposed license taxes upon every agent of a foreign insurance company doing business within the state; the amount being $50 for every such company for which the agent acted, except in towns or cities containing a population of 3,000 or more, and in such cities or towns a tax of $100 per annum. Chapter 33, p. 23, of the Acts of 1864, may be regarded as the groundwork of legislation in this state looking to the creation of a bureau for the supervision and control of insurance. That chapter contains 13 sections, and expressly repeals the sections hereinbefore referred to, as well as the twenty-third and following sections of chapter 39 of the Code of Virginia of 1860. This chapter took out of the hands of the assessors of the various counties the licensing of the agents of foreign insurance companies, and placed the entire control and supervision of insurance companies and their agents in the hands of the Auditor of the state. Section 1 of said chapter reads as follows: "Every domestic insurance and express company, and every person acting in this state as principal agent of any foreign insurance or express company, shall semi-annually make returns to the auditor as follows." Then follow section 2, showing what shall be returned; section 3, requiring the payment into the treasury of the state of a tax of 3 per cent. on the amount of premiums so returned; section 4, prescribing the penalty for failure to make the returns, and relieving said companies from the payment of any other taxes to the state, and any county levy or school tax; section 5, prohibiting any foreign insurance company, after the 1st day of April then next, from renewing any contract of insurance without having complied with the provisions of section 6; section 6, requiring the appointment of an attorney, and consent and agreement that service of process upon him should be as effective as if duly served upon the company; section 7, requiring the power of attorney to be filed by the company in the office of the Secretary of State; section 8, providing that the power of attorney should be irrevocable as long as any liability of the company remained unsatisfied in the state; section 10, making service on the attorney equivalent to service on the principal; section 11, imposing a penalty of not less than $20 nor more than $200 upon the agent acting without having complied with the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth sections; and section 12, providing that every insurance company which had been or should be incorporated by an act of the General Assembly of Virginia in force within this state, or under the act of the Legislature of this state passed October 26, 1863, "shall be deemed a domestic company within the meaning of this act, and every other insurance or express company, a foreign company." An examination of chapter 34 of the present Code will show that it contains, in some form and in some connection, the general plan and substantial provisions of said chapter 33, p. 23, of the Acts of 1864, and plainly and unmistakably includes, when read in the light of said act of 1864, every foreign insurance company, of any description whatever.

Recurring again to previous legislation, we come to chapter 117, p. 146, of the Acts of 1867, the first section of which reads as follows: "All insurance companies establishing agencies or doing business in this state, except life and accident insurance company, shall pay to the state semi-annually, on the first day of July and January of each year, a tax of three per cent. upon the gross receipts of such companies during the previous six months of their business within this state." Section 2 requires such companies to deposit with the Treasurer of the state $25,000. Section 3 imposed a penalty for noncompliance with the provisions of the act. The act contains no repealing clause. It probably relieves life and accident insurance companies from the payment of the tax imposed by chapter 33, p. 23, of the Acts of 1864, by implication, and also from making the deposit; but it does not relieve or except them from other duties and liabilities imposed by the act of 1864, not included with the exceptions named by the act of 1867. The next legislation on the subject is found in chapter 34 of the Code of 1868. Section 1 of said chapter is like the same section of the same chapter of the present Code, except for the addition of one word in the present section. Section 2 of said chapter, down to "life insurance companies associations," reads, in all substantial respects, like section 2 of the Code of 1868, except that in the Code of 1868 the word "foreign" was inserted in the first line after the words "agent of any," and the word "life," appearing in the first line of the present section, was omitted, and except, further, that the capital required was $200,000 under the Code of 1868, while it is but $100,000 in the present statute. Said section 2 of chapter 34 of the Code of 1868 contained a further provision as to how much capital should be in cash, and required $25,000 to be deposited with the Governor. The remaining provisions of said chapter of the Code of 1868 are very similar to those of chapter 34 of the present Code. In one significant respect it altered the act of 1864. It will be remembered that the act of 1864 required the power of attorney to be filed in the office of the Secretary of State. The Code of 1868 required, as does the present Code, that the certificate be filed in the Auditor's office. While it did not require from life and accident insurance companies the statement prescribed in section 2, either foreign or domestic, it did require "every foreign insurance, telegraph and express company doing business in this state, or the agent or agents thereof, shall annually make returns to the Auditor as follows." Section 7. The present statute requires the same thing. Section 13 of chapter 34 of the Code of 1868 required a tax to be paid "by any foreign fire or marine insurance, telegraph or express company." Section 13 of chapter 34 of the present Code requires such tax to be paid by any foreign insurance, telegraph or express company, in the first clause thereof, and by all others, including life insurance companies, in the remaining clauses. The tax on both life and accident insurance companies was clearly restored by chapter 34 of the Code of 1868. Chapter 107, p. 145, of the Acts of 1871, amended section 2 of chapter 34 of the Code of 1868, but not in any substantial or important particular. It made section 2 inconsistent with section 13, and to that extent modified said section 13. Chapter 69, p. 164, of the Acts of 1872-73, again amended and re-enacted said section 2 of chapter 34, and expressly repealed so much of the act of 1871, and sections 3 and 13 of chapter 34, as were inconsistent or in conflict with said section as amended by the act of 1872-73. Section 2 of chapter 34 of the Code of 1868, before and after amendment by the act of 1871, made it unlawful for any officer or agent of any "foreign fire or marine insurance company" to do business in this state without having procured from the Auditor a certificate, etc. As amended by the act of 1872-73, said section made it unlawful for any officer or agent of "any fire or marine insurance company" to do business as aforesaid, leaving out the word "foreign." It is to be observed that the change has been carried into the section as it stands now. All life, fire, or marine insurance companies, whether domestic or foreign, are now, and have been since the act of 1872-73, required to render the statement prescribed in the first part of said section. The part of that section requiring such statement, which is not confined to foreign insurance companies of any kind, is immediately followed by this language: "And no foreign insurance company, or agent thereof, shall transact any business of insurance in this state, unless such company is possessed of at least one hundred thousand dollars of actual capital," etc. The change in the statute in reference to the statement, and the omission to change the succeeding part of it, prohibiting foreign insurance companies, without any express exception, from doing business in the state, except upon the conditions thereafter named, clearly shows that the words "life, fire or marine insurance company," in the first part of the section, were not intended by the Legislature to limit or qualify, as antecedent words, the words "no foreign insurance company," found in the second part of the section, after the requirement as to the statement, and in reference to a wholly different matter, namely, the amount of assets required to enable a foreign insurance company to do business in this state. Said act of 1872-73, however, did not require the statement from life insurance companies, but in the second part of the section, as amended by that act, imposing a 3 per cent. tax on the gross amount of premiums received in this state for the previous year upon "every foreign insurance company doing business in this state," contained the proviso that "any foreign life insurance company which shall invest in this state the whole amount of its net receipts from its business therein, shall pay only one-third of the aforesaid rates." This shows clearly that, while foreign life insurance companies are not included in that part of the statute requiring the statement to be made, they were included in the second part, which imposed a tax upon them, and required the fulfillment of certain conditions as to assets and the making of returns for taxation; thereby again emphasizing the entire separation and distinction of the second part of that section from the first part.

The next act is chapter 88, p. 204, of the Acts of 1881, which again amended and re-enacted said section 2. The amendment consisted principally of the elimination therefrom of certain provisions, not important to be considered in this connection. This was followed by chapter 85, p. 202, of the Acts of 1882, amending and re-enacting the whole of chapter 34 of the Code of 1868. One change made in section 2 by this act is the insertion of life insurance companies among those from which the statement is required to be made. Several other changes were made in that section, which need not be repeated here. By chapter 108, p. 320, of the Acts of 1891, section 2 was again amended, and re-enacted so as to read as it now appears in the Code of 1899.

From what has been stated, it is very clear that in its origin, as well as its progress down to the present time, all this legislation had for one of its purposes, but perhaps its chief purpose, the obtaining of revenue from these corporations. It started as a revenue measure, and is continued as a revenue measure. Clearly the second part of section 2 places all foreign insurance companies under the supervision and control of the Auditor. Section 7 requires a return to the Auditor by every foreign insurance company. Section 8 shows what returns a foreign insurance company shall make. It reads as follows:

"If such returns be made on behalf of an insurance company, they shall show the amount of premiums on all insurances made, renewed or negotiated within this state, or on any subject of insurance within this state, on behalf of such companies, during the period to which the said returns relate, including as well premiums uncollected as those which are paid." Section 11 shows when and for what period the returns shall be made, and with what degree of particularity the facts shall be stated. Section 12 authorizes the Auditor to prescribe forms and regulations for carrying the provisions of the chapter into effect, and makes it the duty of every assessor to transmit to him a list of all the companies and agents doing business within the assessment district. What is the reason for all these requirements? The question is answered in the next section, which reads, in part, as follows: "At the time of making such return by any foreign insurance, telegraph or express company, the officer or agent making the same shall pay into the Treasury of the state a tax of two per cent. on the gross amount of the premiums, or charges and freights, or receipts for dispatches and messages stated in the said return, which shall be in full of state taxes only." What about domestic insurance companies? This is answered by the sixth section, which says: "The property of domestic insurance, telegraph and express companies shall be assessed for taxation as other property in this state. But the stock notes of such companies shall not be assessed; nor shall such notes or any part of them be considered a part of the indebtedness of the maker thereof, in listing his property for taxation."

It has been shown that the act of 1864 taxed all insurance companies, without any distinction between foreign and domestic companies. The act of 1867 probably exempted life and accident insurance companies from any taxation, and required a deposit from all insurance companies except life and accident companies. Subsequent acts have clearly and unmistakably restored the tax upon life and accident insurance companies, both foreign and domestic. It has been shown that originally the power of attorney executed by a foreign insurance company was required to be filed in the office of the Secretary of State, but is now required to be filed in the Auditor's office, and there is no statutory provision which expressly gives to the Secretary of State or his office any connection with or control over an existing insurance company. The statement required to be made by life, fire, and marine insurance companies was at first confined to foreign fire and marine insurance companies, and made its first appearance in the Code of 1868. That has been modified so as to apply to life, fire, and marine insurance companies, whether domestic or foreign. All must make that statement. Likewise, the requirement as to assets to be possessed by a foreign insurance company made its first appearance in the Code of 1868, and has since been retained, except as to the amount of the assets. In that, as first inserted, no class of companies was included except insurance companies, and they were limited to foreign insurance companies. It said that no foreign insurance company should do business, unless possessed of a certain amount of actual capital. Nothing but the most unsubstantial inference or implication could limit the words "no foreign insurance company," found in the second part of said section, so as to mean foreign fire and marine insurance company in the Code of 1868. If any such meaning was intended originally, the Legislature, in the Acts of 1872-73, clearly obliterated it, and showed a contrary interpretation, when it left the words "fire and marine insurance company" in the first part of the section, and found it necessary to except life insurance companies, in express terms, so as to prevent their being compelled to pay the entire amount of tax. This clearly shows that the Legislature never did intend the statute to mean what it is claimed to mean by the plaintiff here. No rule of construction, in the absence of such express legislative interpretation, will justify the construction contended for by the petitioner. Whatever may be said of the statute as it stood in the Code of 1868, no such connection and limitation as is contended for here can be made in the present condition of that section. Of that part requiring the statement to be made, the section applies to all life, fire, and marine insurance companies. Of that part containing the requirement as to assets, it is limited to foreign insurance companies, so that it cannot have the same meaning as in the former part of the section, even if it could have had such meaning when the former part was limited to foreign companies. This legislation having been commenced for revenue to be derived from all insurance companies, and other provisions having been ingrafted upon it, partly for the purpose of enforcing the payment of revenue, and partly for the purposes of supervision, and a virtual department of insurance created in the Auditor's office, through which the payment of taxes is to be enforced and supervision exercised, and the Legislature having manifested in this legislation a clear intention to extend the supervisory power of the state over all insurance companies, no rule of mere composition or grammatical construction ought to be permitted to overcome and defeat that intention, as well as to narrow and cut down the express language of the statute. The rule of construction of deeds, wills, statutes, and constitutions differs from that of composition, under which a general and indefinite expression is limited in meaning and effect by definite words antecedently used in the same connection. In law the rule of construction looks not only to what has gone before, but to what follows and consequences as well. It compels consideration of the whole instrument, so that every part of it, if possible, may take effect, and that every word in it may operate in some way. The maxim applied by Blackstone is "Nam ex antecentibus et consequentibus fit optima interpretatio." Not only must every word have some effect, if possible, but its full effect, if not inconsistent with other provisions. Even the rule of grammar under which general and indefinite words are limited by definite antecedent words is not applicable to this case. Can it be said that "no foreign insurance company" is uncertain and indefinite? Most assuredly it is not. It is general, but its meaning is not the least uncertain, and it cannot be said to be indefinite, so that its meaning must be obtained from antecedent words.

Do the words "at the date of such statement," found in the clause providing that "no foreign insurance company, or agent thereof, shall transact any business of insurance," etc., demand a different construction? Plainly, these words refer to the statement required in the first part of the section, and it is urged that their presence is conclusive evidence of legislative intent to narrow the words "no foreign insurance" so as to mean "no foreign life, fire, or marine insurance company." Such may have been the original design and proper construction. As stated, the requirement of a statement was first made in the Code of 1868, and applied only to "foreign fire and marine" insurance companies, but the chapter required payment of taxes by all foreign insurance companies. See sections 7 to 13, inclusive, c. 34, Code 1868. Section 7 requires "every foreign insurance" company to make return for taxation. Section 13 requires payment of taxes by every "foreign, fire or marine" insurance company; also by "any other insurance company, except life insurance companies"; and finally, "by a life insurance company," prescribing different rates of taxation for each class, namely, 4, 3, and 2 per cent., respectively. Since 1868, sections 2, 3, and 13 of chapter 34 have been radically changed, without striking out the words "at the date of such statement." Among others, this was inserted by chapter 69, p. 164, Acts 1872-73: "When by the laws of any other state, any deposits of money or other securities, or other obligations or prohibitions, are imposed or would be imposed on insurance companies of this state, doing, or that might seek to do business in such other state, or upon their agents therein, so long as such laws continue in force, the same obligations and prohibition, of whatever kind, shall be imposed upon all insurance companies of such other state doing business within this state, or upon their agents here." When this was inserted, the first part of section 2 required the statement to be made only by fire and marine insurance companies. Shall the words "all insurance companies of such other state," in the new provision, be so restricted? Why? It is later in date, and, if there is inconsistency or repugnance, shall not the later expression of legislative will control, and, if need be, broaden the first and older part of the section? Is not that a well-settled rule of construction?

Another new provision inserted by the act of 1872-73 is this: "Every foreign insurance company doing business in this state at the time of the making of the annual statement as required by law shall pay into the State Treasury, as taxes, three per cent. of the gross amount of premiums received in this state during the previous year, taking duplicate receipt therefor, one of which shall be filed with the Auditor; and upon the filing of said receipts, and not till then, the Auditor shall issue the annual certificate as provided by law, and the said sum of three per cent. shall be in full of state taxes only: provided, that any foreign life insurance company which shall invest in this state the whole amount of its net receipts from its business therein shall pay only one third of the said rates." Are the words "every foreign insurance company," found in this new provision of section 2, limited in meaning to fire and marine insurance companies by force of the old language in the first clause of the section? If so, why the necessity or reason for the proviso as to life insurance companies? Although not so required by the first clause, did not this new clause clearly mean that foreign life insurance companies should make the annual statement and procure the certificate? If so, did not the same clause require all other foreign insurance companies to do the same things? If, to effectuate this new and later requirement, the old language of the first part of the section must be broadened, what harm results or violence is done? "Whether the prior statute is recent or of long standing, it must yield, if there is conflict. But with a view to ascertain the intent of the legislation on a given subject at any time it must all be considered, whether it has continued in force or been modified by successive changes." Suth. Stat. Const. § 283. All these new provisions and changes, and others hereafter to be noted, make manifest an intent which cannot be restrained or cut out by referring such general words as "no foreign insurance company," "every foreign insurance company," "any insurance company," and the like, to the antecedent words, "life, fire, and marine" insurance companies, as ejusdem generis, for they occur in new and distinct provisions, which by their express terms show a contrary intention. On this subject, Sutherland on Statutory Constructions, § 279, says: "In cases coming within the reach of the principle just illustrated, general words are read not according to their natural and usual sense, but are restricted to persons and things of the same kind or genus as those just mentioned. They are construed according to the more explicit context. This rule can be used only as an aid in ascertaining the legislative intent, and not for the purpose of controlling the intention or of confining the operation of the statute within narrower limits than was intended by the lawmaker. It affords a mere suggestion to the judicial mind that, where it clearly appears that the lawmaker was thinking of a particular class of persons or objects, his words of more general description may not have been intended to embrace any other than those within the class. The suggestion is one of common sense. Other rules of construction are equally potent—especially the primary rule which suggests that the intent of the Legislature is to be found in the ordinary meaning of the words of the statute. The sense in which general words or any words are intended to be used furnishes the rule of interpretation, and this is to be collected from the context; and a narrower or more extended meaning will be given, according as the intention is thus indicated. To deny any word or phrase its known and natural meaning in any instance, the court ought to be quite sure that they are following the legislative intention. Hence, though a general term follows specific words, it will not be restricted by them when the object of the act and the intention is that the general word shall be understood in its ordinary sense."

Having ascertained that this rule restraining general words to antecedent specific words never controls, but yields to, clearly apparent legislative intent, and that, where the provisions of a prior statute are in conflict with those of a later one, the former must yield, how is it possible to say the words "at the date of such statement" can stand, and control the clearly expressed intent of the Legislature that every foreign insurance company shall procure from the Auditor a certificate to do business? Take the following clause found in section 2 of chapter 34: "No person shall act as agent or broker in the solicitation or application for a policy of insurance, for any company or corporation referred to in this act, without first procuring a certificate of authority from the Auditor." Can there be any doubt that it applies to agents of all insurance companies? Are not all classes of insurance companies, domestic and foreign, mentioned in the chapter? Are not life insurance companies, without any designation or limitation, mentioned in the very section in which the clause is found? All the provisions of the entire chapter relate to the same general subjects; they have sprung into being at different times within the past 40 years; they are or were acts in pari materia; they have been, from time to time, combined, arranged, altered, rearranged, and finally put into chapter 34 of the Code; and the legislative intent must be gathered from them all, and must prevail. The application of any one narrow rule of construction, or a construction based upon a single clause, is not only violative of the rules of statutory construction, but injurious to the state and the public, as it will operate to deprive the state of its revenues, and expose the people to the fraudulent or dangerous practices and operations of unsound insurance companies.

I do not intend to say here that all insurance companies are required to have $100,000 of capital, to enable them to do business in this state. That question is not presented. No application has been made to the Auditor for a certificate to do business, and the petitioner denies that it is required to have such certificate, or that its agents must obtain such certificates. If, on such application, the Auditor should refuse it on the ground of insufficiency of assets, the question may come before this court for decision. However it may be as to the requirement concerning assets or capital, I think there cannot be any doubt that all foreign insurance companies must pay taxes, are subject to the right and duty of the Auditor to examine into their conditions and affairs, and must procure the certificate of authority to do business in this state.

The provision for the issuance of a certificate by the Auditor authorizing insurance companies and their agents to do business in the state is found for the first time in the Code of 1868, it having been put in at the same time that the requirements as to statement and assets were inserted, and has ever since been retained in the statute, and no foreign insurance company of any kind or character is entitled to do business without such a certificate. Under the Code of 1868, no provision was made for any certificate to any domestic insurance company, and neither sections 2 nor 3 applies in any manner, shape, or form to anything but foreign insurance companies. In 1882, when the whole chapter was re-enacted, it was provided that, "upon any domestic company complying with what is required of it by the preceding section, the Auditor shall issue a like certificate thereof." This was not done without reason. Up until that time the Auditor was authorized to examine into the condition and affairs of foreign insurance companies only. The act of 1882 authorized him to examine into the condition and affairs of any insurance company doing business in this state. Here it appears, by express language, and the cutting out and insertion of words and clauses by way of amendment, that sections 2 and 3 were not intended to be limited to the companies mentioned in the first part of the section only. These changes made in the two sections in 1872-73 are retained in the statute as it is found in the Code to-day. Not only in express terms, but by the manifest intent of the Legislature, as read in the nature of the provisions made, and the whole course and history of antecedent legislation, it clearly appears that these two sections are designed to give to the Auditor supervision and control, according to the provisions of the sections, over all insurance companies doing business in this state, of whatever size, character, or jurisdiction, for by section 2 he may not only inquire into the conditions and affairs of any insurance company doing business in this state, but, "whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of said Auditor that the affairs of any such company are in an unsound condition, he shall revoke the certificate granted in behalf of such company and shall cause a notification thereof to be published in some newspaper of general circulation published at the capitol of this state, and the agent or agents of such company are, on and after such notice, required to discontinue the issuing of any policy or of the renewal of any previously issued," said section 2 was amended in important respects by chapter 221, p. 648, Acts 1872-73, and a new section added.

It may be said that this argument is without force, for the reason that section 3 says such companies may acquire a certificate from the Auditor, and not that they shall have such certificate. But if some other part of the statute says they shall not do business without it, the certificate becomes essential, and its acquirement a condition precedent to the doing of business. They are not compelled to take it, but they are not allowed to do business without it. This question is set at rest, in express and emphatic language, as to all insurance companies, domestic and foreign, in section 2, where it is said, "No person shall act as agent or broker in the solicitation or application for a policy of insurance, for any company or corporation referred to in this act, without first procuring a certificate of authority from the Auditor. Said certificate of authority must be renewed annually on the first day of January, or within sixty days thereafter."

Further light is thrown upon this question by the history of the provisions found in section 18 of chapter 34. That section came to life in 1868, along with the provisions as to the statement and the assets and the certificate to do business, and, like them, was confined to the officers and agents of foreign insurance companies, who were prohibited from making, renewing, or negotiating in this state any insurance or contracting for insurance on behalf of such company unless the company had complied with the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of the chapter, in reference to the appointment of an attorney and service of process. In the Acts of 1872-73, which struck the word "foreign" out of the first part of section 2, there was added something that was not contained in section 18, nor any other part of chapter 34, namely, that "no officer or agent of a foreign insurance company shall make, renew or negotiate in this state any insurance or contract for insurance on behalf of such company, or transact any business for such company, directly or indirectly, without first obtaining the Auditor's certificate of authority as required by law; and this applies to all persons engaged in any manner in soliciting risks, issuing or obtaining the issue of policies, selling tickets of insurance, or otherwise doing the business of insurance, either by direct appointment from the company or as such agent." When the act of 1882 was passed in an effort to systematize the law on the subject, and when it was provided that certificates should be issued to domestic as well as foreign insurance companies, and the Auditor was authorized to examine into the condition and affairs of any insurance company, the provision added to section 2 by the Acts of 1872-73, and just quoted, was somewhat changed in its phraseology, namely, by striking out the word "foreign," and embodied in section 18 of the chapter where it is now found, and expressly made to include the agents of any insurance company doing business within this state.

Plainly, the certificate prescribed and authorized by section 3 of chapter 34 is designed for two purposes, in that it may be withheld or revoked on either of two grounds for the purpose of enforcing compliance with the statutory regulations. Whether, when first provided for, it was intended as a weapon or instrument by which to exclude unsound insurance companies, by way of protection to the public, for which purpose it is still used and intended, or to enforce the payment of taxes by foreign insurance companies, it is unnecessary to inquire. Certainly it is, by express provision of the statute, authorized to be used for the latter purpose, as chapter 34 now stands. By section 13, requiring payment of taxes by foreign insurance companies to the Auditor, it is further provided that, "should any company fail to make such payment and file such receipt, the Auditor shall not issue to such company the certificate mentioned in the third section of this chapter so long as such failure may continue." That is the only direct remedy to be found in the Code of West Virginia by which to enforce payment of the taxes by foreign insurance companies. There can be no remedy for the collection of taxes, except such as is given by the statute, and there is none other. Unless, therefore, foreign insurance companies are required to take such certificate, there is no remedy by which they can be compelled to pay the taxes. Are they not required to pay taxes? Does not the statute expressly require them to pay taxes? The answer to these questions is found in the provisions of the statute hereinbefore quoted, expressly requiring every foreign insurance company to pay taxes into the State Treasury. It is true that certain penalties are prescribed for failure to make the return and payment of the taxes, but that is not a remedy for the collection of the taxes. Conditions may be imagined under which an insurance company might well afford to pay the penalty fixed by the statute, rather than to pay the taxes. The taxes might be far in excess of the forfeiture for failure to pay. Surely the Legislature never intended to im-

Go back and trace up the history of the remedy for the collection of taxes from foreign insurance companies. Section 3 of chapter 33 of the Acts of 1864 required the return to be made and the tax to be paid at the same time, and section 4 of said chapter inflicted a penalty for failure to make the return or nonpayment of the tax. No certificate was required. The act of 1867 gave a remedy by action of debt to recover the penalty. The next legislation on the subject is found in the Code of 1868, c. 34, § 13. That section provided that at the time of making the return the tax should be paid by "foreign fire or marine insurance companies," and then says, "And at the time of making such return by any other insurance company, except life insurance companies, the officer or agent making the same shall pay into the Treasury of the state a tax of three per cent. on the amount of premiums mentioned in said return; and at the time of making such return by a life insurance company, the officer or agent making the same shall pay into the Treasury a tax of two per cent. on the amount of premiums mentioned in said return." The express language of this section did not require the withholding of the certificate for nonpayment of the tax. When this section was amended and re-enacted by the act of 1882, it required "any foreign insurance company" to pay the tax at the time the return was made, and then said that, if such company failed to make such payment, the Auditor should not issue to such company the certificate mentioned in the third section of the chapter so long as such failure continued. There, for the first time, the withholding of the certificate was made the remedy for the collection of the tax from foreign insurance companies; and such use has been from that time, and still is, continued.

The amendment of section 13 of chapter 34 of the Code of 1899, by chapter 107, p. 234, of the Acts of 1901, but confirms the views hereinbefore expressed. Prior to the amendment, section 13 required all foreign insurance companies, except "foreign live stock" insurance companies, to pay taxes at the rate of 2 per cent. on the gross amount of premiums. It and other sections were so amended as to require payment of taxes on the risks taken, instead of on the premiums, and as to classify the companies, and prescribe different rates of taxation, making fire companies pay one-fourth of a mill on each dollar, life and accident companies $1\frac{1}{2}$ mills on each dollar, and miscellaneous companies one-tenth of a mill on each dollar. This separation and classification, resulting in the naming of "accident" companies as subject to taxation, confirms the view that the Legislature itself considered such companies as included in the words "foreign insurance" companies, used in the sections imposing taxation.

Further pursuit of this question of legislative intent is unnecessary. Every recurrence to the statutes, and re-examination of them, reveals changes by elimination of words, insertion of words, and rearrangements, all indicating the same thing, and setting the matter of legislative intent entirely beyond question. All insurance companies, domestic and foreign, except some that are expressly exempted, and possibly some mentioned in chapter 55 of the Code of 1899, and those provided for by chapter 28, p. 47, of the Acts of 1891, are clearly made subject to supervision, examination, and taxation, and must procure their certificates to do business from the Auditor. For domestic mutual fire insurance companies organized under chapter 55 of the Code of 1899, and title and trust companies provided for by chapter 28, p. 47, of the Acts of 1891, Code 1899, p. 1118, no express provision is made in those chapters; and whether chapter 34 of the Code applies to them is a question which does not arise here, and cannot be decided. Companies formed for mutual relief and for insuring lives on the assessment plan, mentioned in section 27a of chapter 55 of the Code, are classified into domestic and foreign companies. Whether the former are required to obtain certificates to do business is not expressly stated in that section, and whether it can be so construed, and whether they are covered by chapter 34, cannot be decided now. Foreign companies of that kind are expressly required to obtain certificates, and made subject to examination. Fraternal societies securing members through the lodge system, without agents, are expressly exempted by subsection 10 of section 27a of chapter 55, Code 1897. Chapter 28, p. 47, Acts 1891, providing for incorporation of title and trust companies, does not require of them such certificate, nor subject them to the examination prescribed for insurance companies. Foreign fidelity and guaranty companies are expressly required to comply with all provisions of law applicable to fire insurance companies.

Having concluded that foreign accident insurance companies must procure certificates from the Auditor, it remains to inquire whether they must also procure certificates under section 30 of chapter 54 of the Code of 1899. Apparently, that would be not only useless, but inconsistent, and likely to lead to confusion. One certificate to do business ought to suffice, it would seem; and, besides that, a company holding a certificate under chapter 54, and another under chapter 34, might have the latter revoked by the Auditor, and still claim the right to act under the other certificate. From these considerations, I conclude that a certificate from the Secretary of State is unnecessary, and need not be issued if demanded, as it would be, alone, ineffectual to authorize an insurance company to do business in the state. Chapter 34 makes special provision for such companies, and is inconsistent with section 30 of chapter 54, which is general in its terms.

For the reasons stated, the peremptory writ ought to be refused, the mandamus nisi quashed, and the petition dismissed.

GREEN v. FARRAR LUMBER CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 14, 1903.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—PAYMENTS TO BUILDING CONTRACTOR—APPLICATION—DUTIES OF OWNER.

1. Under the provisions of the Civil Code of 1895, § 2801, subd. 2, as amended by the act of 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 33; Van Epps' Code Supp. § 6176), the owner of property improved by a contractor is bound to see that money paid by him to the contractor is applied to claims for material or labor unpaid at the date of the payment to the contractor, or else he will be liable for such claims in the event the contractor fails to pay them. When no claims of lien have been filed, the materialmen and laborers may be paid in such order as the contractor determines. If a claim of lien has been filed and recorded, then the owner must see that such materialman or laborer is satisfied out of the money paid by him to the contractor, or he will be held liable for the amount in the event, upon suit brought, it should be determined that the claim was valid. The owner is not in any event required to pay more than the contract price of the improvement to materialmen and laborers, but it is incumbent upon him to see that payments to the contractor are to the full amount of the contract price appropriated to materialmen and laborers, if there are valid claims to this extent.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Flite, Judge.

Action by L. W. Green against the Farrar Lumber Company and others. From the decree plaintiff brings error, and defendants assign cross-error. Reversed on error, and affirmed on cross-error.

R. J. & J. McCamy, for plaintiffs in error. W. C. Martin, W. M. Jones, and Shumate & Maddox, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Mrs. Green filed an equitable petition against Jones and others, in which she alleged that she had made a contract with Jones to erect a dwelling house at a cost of $1,100; that the house was completed, with the exception of several small items mentioned in the petition; that, after deducting what she had paid on the contract and the reasonable cost of completing the house, there was still due Jones $183.40, which she asked that she might pay into court, in order that Jones and the other defendants might determine in what proportion they were entitled to the same. The case came on to be tried upon an agreed statement of facts, in which it was set forth that on July 18, 1901, Mrs. Green entered into a written contract with Jones, whereby he was to furnish all material and labor and do all the work necessary to construct a dwelling house according to the plans and specifications referred to in the contract, the contract price to be paid weekly as the work progressed, Mrs. Green to retain 20 per cent. of the contract price as security for the completion of the house; that as the work progressed she paid to Jones, or to materialmen and laborers at his request, $884.40 in the aggregate, all of this amount having been paid to Jones, except $59.40, which was paid directly to parties who had lawful claims against Jones for material or labor; that during the progress of the work Jones paid to materialmen and laborers $1,013; that when he quit work the house was in such a condition that it would cost $52.71 to complete it according to contract; that none of the parties to whom either plaintiff or Jones had paid sums of money for work or material had filed liens upon the house and lot; that the actual cost of the house for work done and material furnished was $1,632, or $532 more than the contract price; that certain parties named have claims against Jones, amounting in the aggregate to $510.78, for material furnished and work done, and have filed and recorded their liens in due time and in the manner prescribed by law. The judge held that Mrs. Green "was liable to all persons doing work on the house in question, or furnishing material therefor, for such proportionate part of the claim of each as the contract price, less the amount she was forced to pay to complete the job, bore to the amount which the building actually cost W. T. Jones, the contractor." In accordance with this holding he entered a decree against Mrs. Green in favor of the different parties who had filed liens for sums aggregating $277.25. To this decree Mrs. Green excepted, on the ground that it required her to pay a sum exceeding the contract price of the house; and those in whose favor the decree was rendered excepted, on the ground that the court erred in not decreeing that they should be paid their claims in full.

The determination of this question depends upon what is the proper construction of Civ. Code 1895, § 2801, as amended by the act of 1899. See Acts 1899, p. 33; Van Epps' Code Supp. § 6176. Paragraph 1 of the section just referred to provides that all mechanics of every sort who take no personal security for work done or material furnished in improving real estate, and all contractors, materialmen, and persons furnishing material for the improvement of real estate, shall have special liens on such real estate. Paragraph 2, as amended by the act of 1899, provides: "When work done or material furnished for the improvement of real estate is done or may be furnished upon the employment of a contractor, or some other persons than the owner, then, and in that case, the lien given by this section shall attach upon the real estate improved, as against such true owner, for the amount of the work done, or material furnished, unless such true owner shows that such lien has been waived in writing, or produces the sworn statement of the contractor, or other person, at whose instance the work was done, or material was furnished, that the agreed price or reasonable value thereof has been paid; provided, that in no event shall the aggregate amount of liens set up hereby exceed the contract price of the improvements made."

It is well settled that laws giving to a creditor a lien upon the property of his debtor, being in derogation of common law, are to be strictly construed against the creditor and liberally in favor of the debtor. If there are degrees of strict construction, certainly an act of the General Assembly which has for its purpose the giving of a lien upon property of one in favor of the creditor of another should be dealt with according to the strictest rules of strict construction. The purpose of this act is to protect materialmen and laborers for work done and material furnished to contractors who fail or refuse to pay. Under it the liability of the contractor to his materialmen and laborers is transferred to the person who employs the contractor. It would seem that, if the money due to the contractor by the owner is actually used by the contractor in discharging just and valid claims of materialmen and laborers, the purposes of the law have been accomplished. And in the light of the fact that the act expressly declares that in no event shall the claims of materialmen and laborers against the owner and contractor exceed the contract price of the improvement, if the owner can show that all amounts paid by him to the contractor have been appropriated to the payment of valid and just claims of materialmen and laborers, he should not be held liable for any additional sum, notwithstanding the contractor may be indebted to other materialmen and laborers; that is to say, the owner is bound for the contract price, and is bound to see that to the extent of this price the amounts paid to the contractor are appropriated by him to the payment of valid claims of materialmen and laborers; but if the aggregate claims of materialmen and laborers exceed the contract price, the loss should fall upon them rather than upon the owner. If the owner pays to the contractor any sum of money which is not applied to the discharge of claims of materialmen and laborers, then the owner would be liable to the extent of the amount not so applied, in the event any materialman or laborer had an unsatisfied claim against the contractor, and asserted his lien in due time and in the proper manner. Giving this law this construction requires that the word "liens" shall be construed to mean, not the perfected and recorded liens, but the inchoate or imperfect liens, or claims arising by the mere furnishing of material or the performance of labor. If at the time of the payment to the contractor no materialman or laborer has filed and recorded his lien, the payment to any of the materialmen or laborers having claims of lien which might be perfected by the filing and recording of the liens may be made by the contractor; and if the money of the owner is used for this purpose, he will not be required to pay this amount again to any materialman or laborer. Certainly it was not intended that this law should have the effect of compelling materialmen and laborers to file liens before they could obtain payment out of the money paid the contractor by the owner. See Civ. Code 1895, § 3935. When none have filed and recorded liens, but all have claims of lien, the payment by the contractor out of money furnished him by the owner of any such claims will be sufficient to discharge the liability of the owner to any other materialmen or laborers to the extent of the amount paid. If any materialman or laborer has filed his lien, then payment to others in preference to him would be at the peril of the owner; and, if any such lien was finally reduced to judgment, it could be enforced against the owner. This construction of the act requires that materialmen and laborers must be paid to the extent of the contract price; that, whenever a materialman or laborer presents a claim within the time he would be compelled to file and record his lien, the discharge of his claim by the contractor will protect the owner to this extent against unsatisfied claims of other materialmen and laborers; but that, where claims of liens have been duly recorded, payments made to other materialmen and laborers with the money of the owner will be no reply to the claims of such materialmen or laborers so recording their liens. Applying the law so construed to the facts of the present case, there being no liens filed or recorded at the time Mrs. Green made various payments to the contractor, if these payments were in fact applied to the discharge of valid claims of materialmen and laborers at a time when they were entitled under the law to file and record their liens, then the amounts so paid are to be construed as part payment of the contract price, as against the claims of materialmen and laborers who filed their claims of lien subsequently to the payment, and this is true whether the material for which the lien was claimed was furnished at the time of the payment or the work for which compensation was asked was done at that time. The owner and contractor can pay materialmen and laborers in such order as they see proper until claims of lien are filed and recorded. Those who desire to obtain a preference have their remedy by promptly filing their claims of lien under the law. Even so construed, the law will operate harshly in a given case; but it seems to us that the act requires the construction we have given to it. The decree rendered by the judge was not in accord with these views, and the judgment on Mrs. Green's bill of exceptions must be reversed. Under the facts as they appear in the present case, there was no error in refusing to decree the full amount of the unpaid claims, and therefore the bill of exceptions of the Farrar Lumber Company and others will be affirmed. Let the case be tried again in the light of what is herein laid down.

Judgment on one bill of exceptions reversed, on the other affirmed. All the Justices concur.

COOK v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 8, 1903.)

MURDER—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY—EVIDENCE

1. In an indictment for murder, which charges that the accused did kill and murder a named person by shooting him with a gun, from the effects of which shooting he died, it is not necessary to allege that the gun "was loaded with powder and leaden balls."

2. Where in such an indictment the given name of the person alleged to have been murdered is interlined, in lieu of another name which is "crossed out," and is in different ink and a different handwriting from the rest of the indictment, a demurrer upon the ground that, for this reason, the person alleged to have been murdered is not sufficiently identified, is without merit.

3. Where the courthouse of a county has been destroyed, an indictment found and returned into the superior court of such county, by a grand jury sitting in a building, located at the county site, which has been "provided" by the proper county authorities as the place for holding that term of such court, is not void, although such county authorities may not, "by order or resolution duly passed and placed upon their minutes," have "constituted and designated" such building as the place for holding the court, and may not have so "constituted and designated" it "by advertisement or in any other public and formal manner."

4. The verdict was amply supported by the evidence, and there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Earnest Cook was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

E. H. Williams, for plaintiff in error. J. T. De Lacy, Sol. Gen., and Jno. C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

FISH, P. J. Cook was tried at the September term, 1903, of the superior court of Wilcox county, upon an indictment found at that term, charging him with the offense of murder. Before entering his plea of not guilty, he demurred to the indictment, and also filed a plea in abatement. The demurrer was overruled, and the plea in abatement was stricken upon motion of counsel for the state. The defendant excepted, pendente lite, to each of these rulings. The case proceeded to trial before a jury, and a verdict was rendered finding the accused guilty. He made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

1. Error is assigned in the bill of exceptions upon the overruling of the demurrer. One ground of the demurrer was that the indictment failed to allege that the gun with which it was charged the crime was committed "was loaded with powder and leaden balls." The indictment charged that the accused "did then and there unlawfully and with force and arms," etc., "kill and murder one Jonas Snell * * * by shooting said Jonas Snell with a gun, from the effects of which shooting said Jonas Snell died" on a named date. It was not necessary to allege that the gun "was loaded with powder and leaden balls." The charge was that the accused killed and murdered Snell by shooting him with a gun. By necessary implication the indictment charged that the gun was loaded, for one cannot shoot and kill another with an unloaded gun. The question made by the demurrer has long since been decided by this court adversely to the contention of the plaintiff in error. Peterson v. State, 47 Ga. 524; Thomas v. State, 71 Ga. 44.

2. Another ground of the demurrer was that the person alleged to have been murdered was not sufficiently identified in the indictment, in that the deceased was first designated in the indictment as John Snell, and again as Jonas Snell, "the name John being crossed out and the name Jonas being inserted in lieu thereof, and the said erasure and interlineation being in different ink and in a different handwriting from that of the remainder of said bill of indictment." There was no merit in this ground of the demurrer. It will be observed that the indictment was not demurred to upon the ground that it appeared, from the erasure and interlineation, to have been altered after it had been returned by the grand jury, but upon the ground that because of the erasure and interlineation the person alleged to have been murdered was not sufficiently identified. The name "John," being erased, was no part of the indictment, and the name "Jonas," being interlined therein in lieu of the name erased, was a part of the indictment. "If an indictment have an interlineation, and have a caret at the proper place where the interlined words are to come in, the court will take notice of the caret and read the indictment correctly." Rex v. Davis, 7 Car. & P. 319, 3 Bingham's N. C. 524. The indictment, as it appeared when the demurrer was presented, described the person alleged to have been murdered as "Jonas Snell," and only so described him. Hence there was no confusion or uncertainty in the indictment as to the name of the person alleged to have been murdered. This alone was sufficient reason for overruling the demurrer. But if the indictment had been demurred to upon the ground that it was defective because of an apparent alteration therein, we think the demurrer would have been properly overruled. The presumption would have been that the erasure and interlineation were made before it was indorsed by the foreman. French v. State, 12 Ind. 670, 74 Am. Dec. 229. "Interlineations or erasures in an indictment apparently made before it had been acted upon by the grand jury present no cause for quashing the same." Jones v. State, 99 Ga. 46, 25 S. E. 617.

3. The plea in abatement contained the following allegations: (1) That the indictment was not sufficient in law, "for the reason that the same was not found or preferred by the grand jury while assembled at the courthouse of said county, * * * or at any other place duly and legally constituted and designated by the commissioners of roads and revenues of said county by order or resolution duly passed and placed upon the minutes of their court previous to the finding of said bill of indictment." (2) That the building heretofore used as a courthouse, and wherein the superior court of the county had heretofore held its sessions, was sold by such commissioners and removed by the purchaser from its former site, leaving the county without a courthouse. (3) "That the building in the city of Abbeville, said county, known as Beaton's Hall, and in which the bill of indictment was found and returned into court by the grand jury, * * * was never constituted or designated as the place for holding the present term of the superior court of said county, by advertisement or in any other public or formal manner by said commissioners." (4) That "the chairman of the board of commissioners was duly authorized to procure suitable offices in some brick building in said city of Abbeville for the ordinary and clerk of the superior court," but "the said order made no provision for the procurement of a temporary courthouse or room in which the superior court * * * might hold its sessions," and the minutes of the board of commissioners "show no further official action in reference to said matter." (5) "That in view of the foregoing the said grand jury was without jurisdiction or authority to present or indict the defendant." Upon the argument of the demurrer it was admitted by counsel for the accused that Beaton's Hall was within 50 yards of the site of the former courthouse. It is evident that this was a purely technical plea; and we think it was properly stricken upon demurrer. The act of December 17, 1896 (Acts 1896, p. 50; Van Epp's Code Supp. § 6219), provides that if for any cause "it shall or may be impracticable to hold any session or sitting of any superior court in this state at the courthouse, or other place provided by law therefor, it shall and may be lawful to hold any such court, and any session or sitting thereof, at such place or places as the proper authorities of the county, in and for which such court is to be held, may from time to time provide for such purpose; provided, that no session or sitting of any superior or city court of this state can, under this act, be held at any place other than the county site of the county of such court." The courthouse of Wilcox county, having been destroyed, the county authorities of that county had, under this act, the power to "provide," from time to time, the place at which any session or sitting of the superior court should be held. So, if, at the time this indictment was found and returned into court, the court and the grand jury were sitting at a place which had been "provided" by the county authorities for the holding of that term of the superior court, then the grand jury was not without jurisdiction to find the indictment. In our opinion the plea in abatement was defective, in that it did not allege that Beaton's Hall had not been "provided" by the proper county authorities as the place at which to hold the term of the superior court at which the indictment was found. Under the act of 1896 the county authorities had the power to provide the place at which the court should be held, and, for aught that appears to the contrary in the plea, they did provide the place where the court was held and the indictment was found. Indeed, it does not appear from the plea that the board of commissioners of roads and revenues did not, "by order or resolution duly passed," designate the place for the court to be held, for they might have done this and neglected to have such order or resolution entered upon their minutes. But we do not rest our decision here. We place it upon the broader ground that the county authorities might have procured and furnished Beaton's Hall for a temporary courthouse, and let it be known that they had "provided" it as the place for holding this term of the superior court of Wilcox county, without constituting and designating it as such "by order or resolution duly passed and placed upon the minutes of their court"; and, if they did so, such term of said court could have been lawfully held there. They could "provide" a place for the court to be held, without constituting and designating it as such "by advertisement or in any other public and formal manner." While it would probably be better for county authorities, exercising the power conferred upon them by this statute, to designate the place for holding the court by some formal order or resolution, and to give timely notice of the place provided "by advertisement or in some other public and formal manner," for the information of all persons interested, or likely to be interested, in the proceedings of the court to be held there, there is nothing in the statute which requires this to be done. The statute simply declares that it shall be lawful to hold the court "at such place or places as the proper county authorities * * * may from time to time provide for such purpose." The primary meaning of the word "provide" is, "To look out for in advance; to procure beforehand; to get, collect, or make ready for future use; to prepare" (Webster's Dict.); and it is evidently used in this sense in the statute. There was nothing in the plea which negatived the idea that, previously to the assembling of the court at which the indictment was found, the proper county authorities had procured and prepared Beaton's Hall as the place in which the court should be held. We are clearly of opinion that the plea in abatement failed to show that the grand jury found the indictment while sitting at a place which had not been lawfully provided by the proper county authorities as the place for holding the September term, 1903, of Wilcox superior court.

4. The motion for a new trial contained only the general grounds. The verdict was amply supported by the evidence; consequently there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

CAMP, Deputy Sheriff, v. WILLIAMS BROS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 10, 1903.)

EXECUTION—LEVY—PROPERTY IN CUSTODIA
LEGIS—LIABILITY OF SHERIFF—DISTRESS WARRANT—RETURN—AMENDMENT.

1. Where a distress warrant for rent, issued by a proper officer and regular upon its face, was levied by a constable upon personal property, after which levy a mortgage on the same property was foreclosed and the execution placed in the hands of the sheriff, the latter had no right or authority to levy the mortgage execution upon the property which by reason of the constable's levy was already in the custody of the law. Fulghum v. Williams Co., 40 S. E. 695, 114 Ga. 643, 88 Am. St. Rep. 48.

2. Where in such case the sheriff did make an entry of levy on the execution, such entry was void, and the sheriff could not be held liable to the mortgagee for allowing the property to be taken away by the purchaser at the sale under the levy of the distress warrant.

(a) If for any reason the distress warrant was invalid, it was not the duty of the sheriff to resist it, but was the right of the mortgagee to do so.

(b) If the distress warrant was issued against an individual, and the whole property levied upon as his, when as matter of fact it was the property of a partnership of which the defendant was a member, the mortgage execution being against the partnership, it was not the duty of the sheriff to resist the distress warrant on that ground. Such resistance should be made by the other members of the firm or by the mortgagee.

(c) That the levy of the distress warrant was excessive was not a matter into which it was the duty of the sheriff to inquire.

3. If the written entry of levy of the constable did not describe and specify all of the articles levied upon, the sheriff, in the trial of a rule against him for not having sold the property under the mortgage execution, had a right to have the constable amend his levy so as to show what particular articles he had actually levied upon and sold. McLeod v. Brooks Lumber Co., 26 S. E. 745, 98 Ga. 253.

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE—PURCHASE BY ADMINISTRATOR—ACTION BY HEIR —LIMITATIONS.

1. A purchase by an administrator at his own sale of property belonging to the estate of his intestate is voidable at the option of an heir, upon his election within a reasonable time to set the sale aside.

2. An action by an heir against an administrator for realty, purchased at his own sale should ordinarily be brought within seven years from the date of the sale, unless the heir be under age or other disability, and in that event within seven years after the disability has been removed. Candler v. Clarke, 16 S. E. 645, 90 Ga. 550 (3).

3. It appearing from the petition that the sale at which the administrator purchased was made 34 years before the action was brought, and the plaintiff delayed for more than 18 years after attaining her majority before bringing suit for the land in dispute, and that the circumstances were such that with the slightest diligence she might, upon becoming of age, have ascertained that the administrator upon her father's estate was the purchaser of the land at his own sale, and no sufficient reason or adequate excuse for her failure to ascertain this fact being alleged, her election to set the sale aside was not made within a reasonable time (Etheredge v. Slayton, 19 S. E. 818, 94 Ga. 496 [1], and cases cited), and the petition was properly dismissed on demurrer. See Word v. Davis, 33 S. E. 691, 107 Ga. 780.

SIVELL v. HOGAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 10, 1903.)

CONSIDERATION—SEALED INSTRUMENT—PRESUMPTION—UNILATERAL CONTRACT—VALIDITY—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—ENFORCEMENT.

1. At common law the general rule was that when a seal was affixed to an instrument there was a conclusive presumption of law that it was founded upon a consideration. Civ. Code 1895, § 3656, is merely a codification of the common law.

2. The fact that a party endeavoring to enforce a contract under seal and governed by the general rule may himself introduce evidence showing that the contract was in fact without consideration furnishes no reason for not enforcing it.

3. A unilateral contract within the statute of frauds becomes mutual and binding upon the party not originally bound, if he does any act which would take the transaction out of the operation of the statute so far as he is concerned; and where he thus becomes bound the other party cannot insist that the contract is invalid because the obligation of both was not originally in writing.

4. A. signed a writing agreeing to deliver to B. at a time and place stated and at a price named goods exceeding in value $50. B. did not agree, in writing or otherwise, either at the time the above paper was signed or thereafter, to pay for the goods. The time for delivery passed without B. doing anything to bind himself to pay for the goods. After that date B. tendered the price and demanded the goods. Held, that B. could not maintain against A. an action for damages for failure to deliver at the time and place fixed in the writing. The right of B. to demand an enforcement of the obligation depended upon his doing some act prior to the time fixed for delivery which would bind him to pay in the event of delivery.

Error from City Court of La Grange; F. M. Longley, Judge.

Action by T. M. Hogan against E. M. Sivell. Judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

Harwell & Lovejoy, for plaintiff in error.
Henry Reeves and J. R. Terrell, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. T. M. Hogan brought suit against E. M. Sivell for damages claimed to have resulted from the breach of an alleged contract of which the following is a copy: "Georgia, Harris Co. Know all men by these presents, that I have this day sold T. M. Hogan 10 bales of cotton averaging 500 lbs. each, at 7 cents per pound, basis middling threes (Inman's classification); said cotton to be delivered in Chipley, Ga. by Nov. 1st, 1900. Witness my hand and seal this 9th day of July, 1900. E. M. Sivell. [L. S.]" The defendant pleaded that the instrument sued on was without consideration, and wanting in mutuality, and therefore void; that the contract, if a contract at all, was a transaction in cotton futures, and that any promise made by the plaintiff to pay for the cotton was void under the statute of frauds. The petition alleged that the plaintiff tendered to the defendant on November 1, 1900, the agreed price of the cotton, and that the defendant refused to accept the money and deliver the cotton. The plaintiff died before trial, and his administratrix became a party in his stead. The court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and the judgment overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial was reversed by this court. 115 Ga. 667, 42 S. E. 151. On the second trial the jury found for the plaintiff $100, with interest from November 1, 1900. The defendant's motion for a new trial having been again overruled, he excepted.

1. At common law a seal imported a consideration, and, as a general rule, a contract under seal was not open to an attack that it was without consideration. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (1st Ed.) 898; 2 Bl. Com. (Cooley) *446; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 682, 762, 763, 798; 11 Am. Dig. (Cent. Ed.) § 406; Broom's Com. L. 284, 285. The rule, however, was subject to important exceptions. It did not apply to contracts in restraint of trade, or those in which the consideration was fraudulent or illegal. See 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (1st Ed.) 899. Many states have abrogated the common-law rule. See 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 798. The common-law rule was applied by this court in the cases of Rutherford v. Baptist Convention, 9 Ga. 54, and Justices v. Smith, 13 Ga. 502, and recognized in Bruton v. Wooten, 15 Ga. 570. There has never been any legislative enactment on the subject in this state. The first Code codified the common law with reference to this matter, and the provision of that Code has been incorporated into Civ. Code 1895, § 3656, which is as follows: "In some cases a consideration is presumed, and an averment to the contrary will not be received. Such are generally contracts under seal," etc. The case of Smith v. Smith, 36 Ga. 184, 91 Am. Dec. 761, was decided since the Code. The question there was whether the court would decree performance of an agreement of settlement of an estate. The agreement was under seal, and Judge Harris, in discussing the question of consideration, said: "Is the agreement on consideration? It purports to be under seal. The solemnity of a sealed instrument imports consideration, or, to speak more accurately, it estops a covenantor from denying a consideration, except for fraud." The cases of Neil v. Bunn, 58 Ga. 583, and Simms v. Lide, 84 Ga. 553, 21 S. E. 220, contain a bare intimation that the presumption of a consideration arising from the presence of a seal would be a rebuttable one, but in neither was the point made or passed upon. In none of these cases was the provision in the Code cited or referred to. The only case which deals directly with the section of the Code is Weaver v. Cosby, 109 Ga. 310, 34 S. E. 680, where Mr. Justice Lewis apparently treated the provision as meaning that a seal was merely prima facie evidence of a consideration, saying that an instrument under seal then being dealt with "raised a strong presumption of law" that it was founded upon a consideration. Inasmuch, however, as

It was held in that case that the evidence offered to rebut the presumption was not sufficient for this purpose, the decision is not to be regarded as binding authority for the proposition that the seal would not be conclusive upon the question of consideration. It is manifest, in our opinion, that the section of the Code is but a codification of the common law, and that the word "generally" used therein was inserted for the purpose of excluding the exceptions of the common law, as well as any other exceptions which might have been or might be made in the law of this state. An exception has been made in favor of deeds. Civ. Code 1895, § 3599. And before the adoption of the Code it was held by this court that failure of consideration could be pleaded to a note under seal. Albertson v. Holloway, 16 Ga. 377. We are not, however, prepared to adopt the reasoning upon which this decision was founded that the common-law rule related only to such instruments under seal as were known to the common law as "specialties," there being no such thing at common law as a promissory note under seal. We rather prefer the view of the Supreme Court of South Carolina that a seal raised a presumption of the existence of a consideration at the time the contract was entered into, but not that it had not since failed either wholly or in part; and that, while want of consideration could not be pleaded, failure might. See Koster v. Welch, 35 S. E. 435, and citations. Our Code defines a specialty to be a contract under seal. Civ. Code 1895, § 3634. We are not, however, to be understood as definitely committing ourselves at this time to the proposition that even want of consideration cannot be pleaded to a promissory note under seal, though this would seem to be true.

2. It is said, though, that this rule ought not to be applied in the present case, because the plaintiff undertook to show what was the real consideration, and from the evidence which she introduced it appeared that the contract was in fact without any consideration. We do not think the question of want of consideration was open to examination by either party. The presumption raised by the presence of the seal was one of law, and evidence by either party as to what was the real consideration was immaterial, unless it showed that the consideration was immoral or illegal. It is true that when the case was here before it was ruled that the particular evidence offered by the plaintiff to show a promise on the part of her intestate to pay for the cotton was not open to the objection that it was irrelevant. But the court was not then dealing with the question we have been discussing, but with the plaintiff's right to show a promise to take the cotton, so as to relieve against the unilateral character of the instrument sued on. The fact that the evidence was introduced on the last trial cannot be used by the defendant to rebut the conclusive presumption of the law that the contract was founded on a consideration of some kind; and, there being nothing in the evidence to show that the consideration was not such a one as the law would recognize, the contract must be deemed to have been founded upon a sufficient consideration.

3. The contract, as it originally stood, was wanting in mutuality. See Harrison v. Wilson Lumber Co. (Ga.) 45 S. E. 730, and citations. It is well settled, however, that a unilateral contract, though required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, may be made mutual by the other party's doing some act which would take the case out of the statute so far as he is concerned. Perry v. Paschal, 103 Ga. 134, 29 S. E. 708, and citations; Hammon on Con. § 337; Harriman on Con. § 103; 1 Parsons on Con. (8th Ed.) *451; Bishop on Con. (Enlarged Ed.) § 87; Broom's Com. L. (9th Ed.) 300, 301. There was, however, in the present case, no evidence that Hogan had done anything which would take the case out of the statute of frauds, so far as he was concerned. It was sought to accomplish this purpose by the introduction of a paper of which the following is a copy: "Georgia, Harris County. Know all men by these presents, I have this day purchased of E. M. Sivell — bales of cotton, averaging five hundred (500) pounds each, at seven (7) cents per pound, basis middling threes (Inman's classification); said cotton to be delivered in Chipley, Ga. by Nov. 1st, 1900. Witness my hand and seal this —, 1900. [Signed] T. M. Hogan." This paper did not have the effect contended for by the plaintiff. It did not specify the number of bales of cotton, nor was it dated, nor was there anything on the face of the paper to connect it with the writing signed by Sivell. No other writing was offered to so connect it, and parol evidence would not have been admissible. See, in this connection, Turner v. Lorillard Co., 100 Ga. 645, 28 S. E. 383, 62 Am. St. Rep. 345; Augusta So. R. Co. v. Smith, 106 Ga. 864, 33 S. E. 28. When the case was here before, it was ruled that it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove the allegations of the petition that her intestate actually tendered the price of the cotton to the defendant. On the second trial there was evidence of a tender on November 15th. It is insisted now that time was of the essence of the contract, and that, as no tender was made on November 1st, the date fixed by the contract for the delivery of the cotton, the plaintiff could not recover. Time is of the essence of a contract when the parties so stipulate, or when the nature of the contract is such as to indicate that this must have been their intention. Harriman on Con. § 285; Sneed v. Wiggins, 3 Ga. 94; 11 Am. Dig. (Cent. Ed.) §§ 938, 939. When Sivell signed the writing agreeing to deliver to Hogan 10 bales of cotton at Chipley, Ga., on November 1, 1900, Hogan was not bound to take and pay for the cotton, the contract being within the statute of frauds, and he not having signed any obligation in writing to do so. Consequently, as the matter

then stood, Hogan was not bound to take the cotton, even if Sivell had delivered it at the time and place agreed on. Sivell was bound by the terms of the contract so far as the statute of frauds was concerned, he having signed it. But, as Hogan was under no obligation to take and pay for the cotton, Sivell was at liberty to withdraw what at this stage of the transaction was a mere offer to deliver the cotton upon the terms stated in the writing, provided the withdrawal was communicated to Hogan before he did anything which would make him bound to accept the offer and pay for the cotton. But, if Hogan did any act which would take the case out of the statute of frauds so far as he was concerned, and make the contract binding upon him, then what was before a mere offer would become a contract binding upon both parties, and neither would be at liberty to withdraw without the consent of the other. Hogan might have become bound by a payment of the amount to Sivell before the time for delivery arrived. He might have become bound by signing a writing agreeing to pay the amount stipulated in the event the cotton was delivered at the time and place fixed. It is possible that he might have become bound to pay by a tender of the amount stipulated on the 1st of November, or by a continuing tender prior to that date. If he had become bound in any of these ways, it would then have been incumbent on Sivell to deliver the cotton at the time and place agreed on. Sivell, however, being chargeable with notice that at the time he signed the paper Hogan was not bound to take and pay for the cotton, he was under no obligation to complete his offer by delivery, unless Hogan did something to render himself bound to accept it. Consequently, unless Hogan did something to render himself bound, Sivell was not liable to an action for damages for a failure to deliver the cotton at the time and place stated in his offer. By signing the paper Sivell placed himself in a position where he was required either to withdraw his offer before Hogan did something to render himself bound, or to deliver the cotton and complete the offer in the event Hogan became bound to an acceptance. In this sense time was of the essence of the contract, and, if Hogan did nothing on or before November 1st to render himself bound, Sivell had a right to treat the transaction as at an end.

Under this view of the case, the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and the court should have granted a new trial. The foregoing discussion covers all of the assignments of error with which it is necessary to deal.

HALL v. GREENE COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 12, 1908.)

COUNTY TREASURER—COMMISSIONERS.

1. A county treasurer is not entitled to commissions for receiving and repaying money borrowed by the county to meet ordinary current expenses.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Affidavit of illegality filed by George A. Hall against the county of Greene. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jas. Davison, for plaintiff in error. Saml. H. Sibley and Jas. B. Park, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. This case arose upon the trial of an affidavit of illegality filed in Greene superior court by Hall, formerly treasurer of Greene county, to arrest the levy of a fl. fa. against him issued by the county commissioners, and based on an alleged indebtedness by Hall to the county in his official capacity as treasurer. The case was referred to an auditor, who found, on an agreed statement of facts, that Hall was indebted to the county in the sum of $332.83. Both the plaintiff and the defendant filed exceptions to the auditor's report, but at the hearing the presiding judge overruled all the exceptions, and sustained the report in full. Hall excepted. Under the agreed statement of facts, the sole question presented for our determination is, was the county treasurer entitled to commissions for receiving and paying out money borrowed by the county commissioners to pay court and jail expenses, expenses of working a chain gang on the public roads, and other current expenses; the money having been borrowed "to be repaid within less than one year, from the tax of each year, and the borrowed money each year [being] less than the tax for such years." The auditor found, in effect, that the purpose for which the money was borrowed was not to meet casual deficiencies in the revenues of the county, and that the treasurer was therefore not entitled to the commissions claimed. The meaning of the expression "casual deficiencies" is no longer open to question in this state. In the case of Lewis v. Lofley, 92 Ga. 804, 19 S. E. 57, the present Chief Justice, speaking for this court, said: "We cannot conceive how a debt incurred for the building of a courthouse can be regarded as a debt incurred 'to supply casual deficiencies of revenue.' The word 'casual' means that which happens by accident or is brought about by an unknown cause; and we think the framers of the Constitution, in using this language, meant some unforeseen or unexpected deficiency, or an insufficiency of funds to meet some unforeseen and necessary expense." This case has been frequently referred to, and this court has consistently adhered to the doctrine there laid down. In the case of Commissioners of Habersham County v. Porter Mfg. Co., 103 Ga. 614, 30 S. E. 547, the ruling was, upon a request for a review, expressly reaffirmed. It was also discussed in the cases of City of Dawson v. Dawson Waterworks Co., 106 Ga. 703, 32 S. E. 907, and Dyer v. Erwin, 106 Ga. 848, 33 S. E. 63; and, as before stated, the ruling made has never been overruled.

There is no authority whatever in our law authorizing county authorities to make any such loans as the one disclosed by this record. The treasurer was not bound to receive any moneys obtained in this way; and, if he did, and the funds had been misappropriated by him, the securities on his bond would not have been liable therefor. Having received and paid them out, however, he would be accountable for them, although no liability would arise against his sureties. Mason v. Commissioners, 104 Ga. 35, 30 S. E. 513. In the present case the treasurer did receive the borrowed money. He paid it out for the current expenses of the county, and at the end of the year, when the taxes came in, paid off the loan; but, in handling the money derived from the loans, he was not handling county funds, within the meaning of the Political Code of 1895, § 458. If he had taken commissions out of the borrowed money at the time it was turned over to him, the loss would have been that of the lenders, and not the county. Parties loaning money to counties for purposes such as the ones for which the money in the present case was loaned cannot collect back any part of it which does not go to its proper use. The treasurer here did not attempt to retain his commissions at the time of receiving the borrowed money or at the time of paying it back, but sought to take it out of the regular county funds at the time of turning over his office to his successor. In Wood v. Commissioners, 60 Ga. 558, it was held: "On money borrowed without authority of law, whether by the ordinary, the county commissioners, or the county treasurer, no commissions can be retained by the county treasurer out of the county funds; but retaining commissions out of such borrowed money affects the lenders, and not the county, as the county, in the absence of a statute to authorize borrowing, is not bound for any borrowed money which is not applied to its use. If the treasurer has used county funds proper, either to compensate himself for handling money illegally borrowed, or to repay the lenders beyond the sums actually expended for the benefit of the county, he is liable for any deficit thus occasioned." It was not the intention of the General Assembly, in fixing the compensation of county treasurers, to have the public moneys pay toll more than twice. To permit the treasurer to take out 2½ per cent. on $1,000 borrowed to pay current expenses of the county, as commissions on money received, another 2½ per cent. as the $1,000 is expended, another 2½ per cent. as the taxes come in from the public, with which the loan is repaid, and still another 2½ per cent. when the $1,000 is repaid to the lender, would be to tax the same fund four times with payment of commissions, when it is plainly the intention of the law that he should receive commissions only twice—when the money, the lawful income of the county, is received, and when it is paid out.

HORTON & SMITH v. HARVEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 12, 1903.)

NEGLIGENCE—INJURY TO LICENSEE.

1. One who hauls his cotton to be ginned at a public ginnery is not a mere licensee, and may recover for damages when injured on the premises by the owner's negligence, even though they are not willfully and recklessly inflicted.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Floyd County; John H. Reece, Judge.

Action by W. E. A. Harvey against Horton & Smith. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff's petition alleged that defendants were the owners of a public gin, to which he carried a load of seed cotton; that, after it had been ginned and packed, he drove his wagon to the platform erected by defendants, to receive the bale, which weighed about 500 pounds; that defendants, having no proper machinery for lifting the cotton, undertook to load it upon the wagon by hand, shoving it off the ginnery platform to the wagon with great force and violence, so that, by reason of this violence and the sudden motion given to the bale, it was thrown against plaintiff, knocking him off the wagon and breaking his leg. The defendants filed a demurrer, which being overruled, they excepted.

Geo. A. H. Harris & Son, for plaintiffs in error. Fouché & Fouché and M. B. Eubanks, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. The plaintiff was not a mere licensee, but, having been invited to bring his cotton to be ginned at defendants' public ginnery, could recover damages for injuries occasioned by defendants' negligence while he was on the premises, even though the act was not reckless, willful, or grossly negligent. Atlanta Cotton Seed Oil Mills v. Coffey, 80 Ga. 145, 4 S. E. 759, 12 Am. St. Rep. 244. While the petition was meager in its statement of facts, the charge that the cotton was shoved from the ginnery platform onto the wagon with great force and violence, thereby throwing it against the plaintiff and breaking his leg, set out a cause of action as against a general demurrer. The fact that there was no crane and no rope and tackle for lifting the cotton, and that the plaintiff knew thereof, and by the exercise of ordi-

BROWN v. GEORGIA, C. & N. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 28, 1903.)

DISMISSAL—DEFECTIVE PETITION—CARRIERS—DEPOT BUILDINGS—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

1. The court at the trial may dismiss a petition, if so defective that after verdict a motion in arrest of judgment would be sustained, but it cannot consider special demurrers not filed at the appearance term.

2. A railroad company is only bound to keep open its waiting room for a reasonable time before and after the departure of trains, and ticket holders permitted to remain therein during the night have no cause of action for cold and discomfort suffered because the same is not kept heated and lighted.

3. It was alleged that the plaintiff bought, from the agent of a railroad company, tickets for himself and wife, entitling them to transportation on a particular train soon due to stop at the station; that they stood in the rain, alongside the track, waiting for such train, which passed without stopping, thereby occasioning a breach of the contract of carriage; that there were no accommodations available except in the station house, in which they were permitted to remain for the night; and that, by reason of the exposure and the condition of the waiting room, the plaintiff's wife was rendered ill, and he thereby deprived of the value of her services, and put to expense for medical attention. Such a petition set forth a cause of action.

4. The gist of such action was not the failure to furnish and maintain a comfortable depot building, but for consequences arising from exposure incident to the failure to transport, and in spite of the plaintiff's use of the waiting room, which was the only means available to lessen the damages.

Error from City Court of Elberton; P. P. Proffitt, Judge.

Action by A. D. Brown against the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

In his suit against the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company, Brown alleged that on February 24, 1902, he carried to the defendant's station at Heardmont a quantity of household goods to be shipped to McCormick, S. C., on the next train; that the agent informed him that he had no scales on which to weigh them, but would send them forward on the next day; that he thereupon bought for himself and wife two tickets from Heardmont to Calhoun Falls, telling the railroad agent that they would go on the local freight train (which also carried passengers) due at Heardmont about 5 o'clock p. m., which was accustomed to stop there for both passengers and freight, and always did stop when signaled; that the train arrived after dark; that it was cold and raining; that petitioner and his wife left the station building and stood alongside the track, prepared to enter the car when the train stopped; that when signaled by the agent the train slowed up, but failed to stop; that petitioner and his wife were wet and chilled, and, because it was impossible to obtain lodgings or accommodation in the village, they were compelled to remain in the station room all night, and until the next day at 12 o'clock, when the first train stopped for passengers; that the weather was excessively cold, the rains heavy and continuous, and the waiting room uncomfortable; that, although petitioner did his best to keep up a fire with such wet wood as he could find, they suffered severely, and his wife was made seriously sick, and has never recovered her health; that the furniture was not shipped for more than a month, and by reason thereof his wife's illness was aggravated. No demurrer was filed, but at the trial term the defendant moved to dismiss because no cause of action was set forth. That motion was sustained, and subsequently, over plaintiff's objection, the grounds of the motion were set out in a written demurrer, which was sustained, several days after the dismissal.

Geo. C. Grogan and I. O. Van Duzer, for plaintiff in error. Jos. N. Worley, Erwin & Erwin, and H. J. Brewer, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. Railroad companies are bound to provide reasonable accommodations at their stations for passengers who are invited to travel on their roads, and will be liable for such damages as proximately flow from a violation of this duty. The character of the accommodations required, of course, varies with the amount of business done at a particular point, and the company might be relieved altogether of the obligation to furnish depots at flag stations, or points where trains stop for the accommodation of occasional travelers. But even where waiting rooms are maintained, the company is only required to keep them open for a reasonable time before and after the departure of trains. Central Ry. Co. v. Motes, 117 Ga. 923, 43 S. E. 990; Civ. Code 1895, § 2189; Caterham R. Co. v. London Ry., 87 Eng. C. L. R. 409; Boothby v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (N. H.) 34 Atl. 157; Texas & Pac. R. Co. v. Cornelius (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 720; Texas & Pac. R. Co. v. Pierce (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 1122; Weightman v. Louisville, N. O. & T. Ry. Co., 70 Miss. 563, 12 South. 586, 19 L. R. A. 671, 35 Am. St. Rep. 660. The allegation that the room was not kept comfortable during the entire night, therefore, of itself gave rise to no cause of action. The agent having, however, sold tickets entitling plaintiff and his wife to be transported on a particular train, they became passengers and entitled to their rights as such, and, when the train passed without stopping, there was a breach of the contract. But they could not stand alongside the track until the next train arrived and recover damages for the results of the exposure, for they were bound to lessen their damages (Civ. Code 1895, § 3802) and to seek the most available shelter. If the waiting room was, as alleged, the only place where they could stay for the night, and if, in spite of utilizing such means as were feasible, the plaintiff's wife was made sick and her services lost, the husband is entitled to a verdict, not for the failure to keep the waiting room heated after hours, but for the damages which resulted from the company's failure to transport on the train agreed. The condition of the waiting room is not the gist of the action, but is set out to show that damages resulted from the failure to convey, notwithstanding the fact that the parties took advantage of such accommodations as were at hand. Where a passenger is left at an improper place, in consequence of which he suffers injury, the same rule applies as in cases where a passenger has been carried past his destination. In either instance he is entitled to recover the damages naturally and proximately flowing therefrom. Caldwell v. R. & D. R. Co., 89 Ga. 550, 15 S. E. 678 (2).

The petition should not have been dismissed. It set out a cause of action, and after verdict thereon a motion in arrest would not have been granted. The special demurrers, not having been filed at the first term, could not have been considered (Civ. Code, 1895, §§ 5046, 5052), and for that reason the question as to what is a proper measure of damages for a failure to transport person or property is not presented by this record.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 8, 1903.)

INJUNCTION—COMPLAINT—NECESSITY—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT OBTAINED BY FRAUD.

1. A complainant seeking extraordinary equitable relief must make a case which does not rest upon doubtful or disputed principles of law, for an injunction will not usually be granted where his right thereto is not clear.

2. In all cases the complainant must establish the existence of the fraud or fact on which his right to interlocutory relief is based, and show the necessity for injunction, in order to preserve rights or to prevent irreparable injury.

3. A denial by the defendant of the facts set up in the equitable petition, or a conflict in the evidence, does not necessarily require a refusal of interlocutory relief.

4. There should be a balance of conveniences in such cases, and a consideration whether greater harm might be done by refusing than by granting the injunction.

5. Where the evidence is conflicting, and it appears that the injunction if granted would not operate oppressively to the defendant, but that if denied the complainant would be practically remediless in case he should thereafter establish the truth of his contentions, it would be strong reason why the chancellor should exercise his discretion so as to preserve rights by preserving the status.

6. Equity will not only relieve against a judgment obtained by fraud, but against one which has been properly rendered where the losing party has a meritorious defense, and is prevented by the fraud of the other from entering an appeal or making a motion for a new trial.

7. Where the evidence is conflicting, the defendant is solvent, and there is nothing to show that the complainant will suffer irreparable damages by reason of the refusal to grant the injunction, this court will not interfere with the chancellor's discretion in denying the same.

Error from Superior Court, Gilmer County; Geo. F. Gober, Judge.

Action by J. S. Everett against T. H. Tabor and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

In his equitable petition Everett alleged that Tabor had sued him in the justice's court; that he had a meritorious defense, which could only be established by the introduction of a mortgage; that, having failed to give a proper "notice to produce," he was unable to make out his defense, but confessed judgment, intending to appeal; that he had the appeal papers and bond duly prepared, and, within the time allowed by law, presented them to the justice, at the same time tendering the cost; that the justice notified him that Tabor had paid the cost and withdrawn the case; that the justice had by Tabor's direction made the following entry on the docket: "T. H. Tabor withdraws suit, and pays costs of suit to superior court;" that the justice thereupon told Everett that the latter could do nothing more until Tabor commenced his suit in the superior court; that, relying on this statement, Everett took no further action; that later, within the time allowed for entering the appeal, Tabor or his attorney gave similar information to Everett's attorney; that several months thereafter Tabor caused an execution to issue on the judgment previously rendered, and had a levy made. It appears that thereupon Everett filed an affidavit of illegality on the ground that "there was no legal judgment as the foundation of issuing said fi. fa., nor was there any judgment at the time of issuing the same." This affidavit was dismissed, and another of like character subsequently filed, which was in turn dismissed, and this petition for injunction filed. Tabor demurred, and answered, denying that he ever withdrew or dismissed the suit, or that he authorized any one else to do so for him, before or after judgment, but has at all times insisted that he has a valid judgment against Everett, and has in good faith tried to bring about a sale of the property, but has been prevented by the affidavits of illegality, which he charges were made for the purpose of delay. He denied that he had had any conversation with Everett or Everett's attorney, or the justice, about withdrawing the case or about appealing the same, or that he did anything to hinder or prevent Everett from appealing the case, or that he ever prevented him from making any defense, or practiced any fraud to prevent him from doing so, or that he authorized the justice to "withdraw" or dismiss the case; and claimed, if Everett did not appeal, it was his own negligence, or he really had no intent to appeal. The judge refused the injunction, and Everett excepted.

N. A. Morris, A. N. Edwards, and Gordon B. Gann, for plaintiff in error. J. P. Perry and D. W. Blair, for defendants in error.

LAMAR, J. An injunction will not usually be granted where a complainant's right is not clear. He should state by his pleadings a case which does not rest upon doubtful or disputed principles of law. This he did in the present case. For equity will not only relieve against a judgment obtained by fraud, but against one which has been properly rendered, where the losing party has a meritorious defense, and is prevented by the fraud of the other from entering an appeal or making a motion for a new trial. Markham v. Angier, 57 Ga. 43; Marchman v. Sewell, 93 Ga. 653, 21 S. E. 172; Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4913, 4915; Thompson v. Laughlin, 91 Cal. 313, 27 Pac. 752; Sanderson v. Voelcker, 51 Mo. App. 333.

But the defendant insists that the injunction was properly refused, because the defendant denied the allegations in the bill. There are, however, exceptions to the rule that an injunction will be refused where the defendant's answer swears off the equity. Holt v. Bank of Augusta, 9 Ga. 554; Coffee v. Newsom, 8 Ga. 449; Cottle v. Harrold, 72 Ga. 831 (7). For while it is true that the complainant must always establish, to the reasonable satisfaction of the chancellor, the existence of the fraud, or the fact on which the right is predicated, this does not mean that he must establish it beyond controversy. A denial by the defendant, or a conflict in the evidence, does not necessarily require a refusal of the interlocutory relief. In all such cases the chancellor must exercise a sound discretion. Civ. Code 1895, § 4920. If the evidence for the complainant is weak, and that for the defendant strong, the injunction could be refused. If that for the complainant is strong, and that for the defendant weak, or even if it be in practical equipoise, the injunction should be granted or refused according to the peculiar circumstances of the particular case. There should be a balance of conveniences, and a consideration whether greater harm might result from refusing than from granting the relief prayed for. If the grant of an injunction in such a case would operate oppressively to the defendant, the restraining order should be refused; but if it appears that if the injunction were denied the complainant would be practically remediless in the event he should thereafter establish the truth of his contention, it would be strong reason why interlocutory relief should be granted. The delay to one party would not counterbalance the irreparable injury which might flow to the other if the chancellor made a mistake in passing on the disputed issue of fact. Under such circumstances it would generally be a wise exercise of discretion to preserve the rights by preserving the status. But, giving full effect to those principles, a reversal is not demanded. For although the solvency of a plaintiff in fi. fa. is by itself no reason why the enforcement of a fraudulent judgment should not be enjoined (Sanderson v. Voelcker, 51 Mo. App. 328 [3]), yet where the fact of fraud is squarely denied, and the holder of the execution is not alleged to be insolvent, the refusal to grant the injunction does not dismiss the bill, nor prevent the bringing of other appropriate action for damages. No irreparable injury will result to the complainant, if he can eventually satisfy a jury of the invalidity of the judgment. Sharpe v. Kennedy, 51 Ga. 257, 263; Farmers' Bank v. Ruse, 27 Ga. 398.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

TATE v. GAIRDNER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 9, 1903.)

ADMINISTRATOR—STATED ACCOUNT—OBJECTIONS—HEARING.

1. A party objecting to a stated account must surcharge or falsify.
2. When an account has become stated, the party rendering the same is bound thereby, unless he shows that there has been a clear and palpable mistake in the account, or an omission of items is clearly and satisfactorily established; and this must be done to the same extent and with the same degree of certainty that courts of equity require in order to correct mistakes.
3. The returns of executors, administrators, or other trustees to the ordinary become, after approval by him, stated accounts within the meaning of the rules above announced.
4. On the hearing of a citation for a settlement before the ordinary against an administrator or executor, neither the ordinary nor the superior court on appeal has authority to allow the defendant credit for items accruing after the last return, unless such items are specially pleaded in the answer.
5. While the rulings of the judge on the exceptions of fact, which were complained of in the numerous grounds of the motion for a new trial, were in the main correct, the rulings complained of in three grounds were erroneous, and require a reversal of the judgment, which will set aside the entire verdict, in the absence of a direction to the contrary. It not being clear that under the peculiar facts such direction would be in the interest of justice, it will not be given.

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Action by Lavonia Gairdner, administratrix, against E. B. Tate, administrator, for an accounting. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

I. O. Van Duzer and O. P. Harris, for plaintiff in error. Jos. N. Worley, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. H. K. Gairdner and J. H. Grogan were the executors of the will of George W. Dye. Both having died, Tate was appointed administrator with the will annexed of Dye's estate. Tate cited Mrs. Lavonia Gairdner, as administratrix of the estate of H. K. Gairdner, and the executors of Grogan, before the ordinary for the settlement of the accounts of the executors of Dye. The only allegation in the petition upon which the citation was based as to the liability of the executors was in the following words: "There still remain in the estates of said H. K. Gairdner and John H. Grogan assets belonging to the estate of said Geo. W. Dye, deceased, to which your petitioner is entitled, that he may proceed to administer the estate of the said Geo. W. Dye." The executors of Grogan answered the citation, denying the allegation above referred to, and also denying that the estate of their testator was in any manner liable for waste, mismanagement, interest, or funds of any kind. The administratrix of Gairdner answered, alleging that she had no funds or assets in her hands belonging to the estate of Dye which should be turned over to the administrator with the will annexed; and especially pleaded an alleged settlement which had been made between her intestate and the legatees of Dye as an accord and satisfaction of all claims or demands which the estate of Dye had against the estate of her intestate. The ordinary rendered a judgment in favor of the defendants, and Tate appealed to the superior court. The case came on for trial in the superior court and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The case was brought to this court upon a bill of exceptions assigning error upon the refusal of the judge to grant a new trial, and the judgment was reversed. See Gairdner v. Tate, 110 Ga. 456, 35 S. E. 697. In the opinion in the case just referred to Mr. Chief Justice Simmons suggested to the presiding judge that, as the case involved complicated and intricate matters of account, it might with propriety be submitted to an auditor. Adopting the suggestion thus made, the case was referred to an auditor, who reported that the executors were due the estate of Dye $525.58. To this report Tate and Mrs. Gairdner each filed exceptions, both of law and fact. No exceptions appear to have been filed by the executors of Grogan. The exceptions of law were sustained by the court. On the exceptions of fact filed by the parties the court directed a verdict. The jury were directed to find in favor of certain exceptions filed by the plaintiff as well as by the defendant, and against certain exceptions filed by the plaintiff as well as by the defendant. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial upon the general grounds, and by amendment added several grounds, in which error is assigned generally upon the order directing a verdict on the several exceptions of fact filed by the plaintiff and defendant, and also specifically assigning error upon the direction of a verdict against certain exceptions of fact filed by the plaintiff and in favor of certain exceptions of fact filed by the defendant. The motion for a new trial was overruled, and a bill of exceptions was sued out, in which error is assigned upon the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial, and also upon the judgment sustaining certain exceptions of law filed by the defendant, to which ruling exceptions pendente lite had been duly filed.

1-3. It is a well-settled rule in equity that one who objects to a stated account must surcharge or falsify; that is, must allege an omission in the account, or deny the correctness of some or all of the items rendered. Civ. Code, § 3994. An account rendered by an administrator or executor to the ordinary is a stated account, within the meaning of this rule; and when such an account is attacked in equity the burden of proof is upon him who surcharges or falsifies, and consequently the allegations in the bill must be sufficient to admit evidence for that purpose at the trial. Shorter v. Hargroves, 11 Ga. 658 (5). Upon a citation before the ordinary for a settlement the court of ordinary has the same jurisdiction over the matters of the account of the executor or administrator as a court of equity would have upon a bill for a settlement, and the rule in equity above referred to has been held applicable to the pleadings upon which the settlement before the ordinary is to be based; it having been distinctly ruled that: "Where an attack is made upon returns which have been examined and allowed by the court of ordinary, it is incumbent upon the party who attacks them to show wherein they are unlawful, and in his pleading he should point out specifically the items of the returns on which the attack is made, and as to each should disclose the cause or ground of the attack." Bonner v. Evans, 89 Ga. 659, 15 S. E. 907 (1). It is true that in the case just cited the account of the guardian of a lunatic was involved, but the principle is equally applicable to accounts of executors, administrators, and other trustees who are required by law to make returns to the ordinary. If the party against whom the account is rendered is bound to specifically attack the items of the account before he will be heard to make objection to the same, for equal, if not greater reason, the party rendering the account, which has become an account stated, should be held bound thereby until some defect is pointed out in the account by a specific objection thereto. And such has been held to be rule in this state. Trippe v. Wynne, 76 Ga. 200 (2a). While authorities in other jurisdictions are not in accord on this subject, there is authority in harmony with the decision just cited. See Warner v. Myrick, 16 Minn. 91 (Gil. 81); Moody v. Thwing, 46 Minn. 511, 49 N. W. 229; Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 566, 17 Pac. 702; St. Louis Bottling Co. v. Bank, 8 Colo. 70, 5 Pac. 800; Barker v. Hoff, 52 How. Prac. 382; Beach v. Kidder (Sup.) 8 N. Y. Supp. 587; 1 Enc. P. & P. 89. See, also, generally, on the subject of accounts stated, 1 Cyc. pp. 364-401. If such is the rule in reference to accounts stated generally, certainly this rule would be applicable to a stated account like the return of an administrator or executor to the ordinary, which has been approved by the court as correct, and which is declared by statute to be prima facie correct as to all persons interested therein. If a creditor or heir or legatee is bound by the account until he points out specifically the incorrect or omitted items, certainly the executor or administrator who renders the account should be likewise bound. Applying this rule in the present case, we find no specific attack made upon the returns of the executors, either by the plaintiff or the defendants. The plaintiff charges generally that the estates of the executors are liable to the estate that he represents. The representatives of the deceased executors deny this only in general terms, and make no specific attack upon the returns of the executors, or any item therein. Before the plaintiff will be allowed to attack the returns, he must allege in his petition that some of the items are incorrect, setting forth the items, as well as the grounds of attack upon them; or he must allege that there has been an item or items omitted from the returns, which should form a part thereof, setting forth specifically what such items are, so that the defendants may be put on notice of the claims made against them. Before the executors who made the returns, or their legal representatives, will be allowed to attack the returns, they must set forth the items which they claim were incorrectly made a part of the account, or must set forth specifically the items which should have been made a part thereof and were omitted, giving the reasons why such items were omitted or were incorrectly stated, as the case may be. And in a case where an executor or administrator seeks to surcharge or falsify his own account, in order to sustain the objection it must appear that there was a clear and palpable mistake made in the account, or that there has been an omission of items to which the proof clearly and satisfactorily shows he was entitled; and this must be done to the same extent and with the same certainty that courts of equity require where applications are made to correct mistakes. In the absence of clear proof of mistake, the account rendered to the ordinary must stand. See Tripp v. Wynne, supra. It follows from what has been said that when the executors of Dye charged themselves with $1,275 collected from rents, and a return embracing this item was approved by the ordinary, the auditor erred in striking the same from the account, there being no specific attack made upon this item, and the judge should have sustained the exception to the auditor's report which assigned error upon this finding. It also follows that there was no error in sustaining the exceptions of law filed by the defendant which raised the question that the auditor erred in admitting evidence tending to show the incorrectness of certain items in the returns which had not been attacked in the pleadings. Nor was there any error in holding that the exceptions of fact which were directed against the findings of the auditor of the different amounts which were not embraced in the pleadings could not be sustained.

4. It follows from what has been said that, where an executor has been cited to a settlement before the ordinary, and the petition does not make any attack upon his returns, and the defendant, in his answer, merely denies in general terms liability, and does not set up any claim that the return was incorrect or incomplete, the ordinary is to make up the account and settlement from the returns as they appear of record in his office. If the plaintiff desires to charge the defendant, he must set forth in his petition the grounds of liability upon which he relies with the same certainty he would be required to set them up if he had applied to a court of equity to compel the executor to come to a settlement. The defendant is also bound to set up by answer his defense with the same degree of certainty that would be required in an answer in equity. If the executor or administrator has made no returns, then the petition for the citation should allege this fact, and also show what property of the estate has gone into his hands. In such a case the defendant should set forth in detail the credits that he relies upon with the same certainty that would be required in a return to the ordinary. If the defendant has made returns, but payments have been made by him since the last return, he should set forth in his answer the items of such credits with the same certainty as would be required in a return. If his answer does not set forth such additional items, then the court has no authority to allow them in the settlement. It therefore follows that, as Mrs. Gairdner did not set up in her answer the item of $3,000 paid by her on the Howard note since the death of her husband, the auditor erred in allowing her credit for this amount, and the judge erred in directing the jury to find against the exception filed in regard to this matter. The judge also erred in directing the jury to find in favor of the exception of the defendant which set up a credit of 10 per cent. commissions on the item of $1,275 interest, which the executors had earned. This item was not pleaded, nor have we been able to find it in any of the returns of the executors.

5. While the motion for a new trial consists of the general grounds and 10 special grounds referring to rulings of the judge directing findings by the jury on the exceptions of fact, those rulings which seem to us to be erroneous are confined to three of these grounds only. The other rulings are free from error, as under the present condition of the pleadings no other course was open to the judge than that which he followed. The errors in these three grounds will result in a reversal of the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial, which, in the absence of a direction by this court confining the effect of the judgment to the items involved in the three grounds which contain the erroneous rulings will have the effect to set aside the entire verdict. We might, in the exercise of the discretion with which the law invests this court, direct that the verdict and judgment be amended by striking two of the items of credit which the auditor erred in allowing and inserting the item of debit which the auditor erred in striking; but no request was made for such a direction, and we are not altogether clear that this course would be in the interest of justice. We will therefore reverse the judgment generally, and leave the case to be disposed of in accordance with the law applicable thereto when it comes before the judge again for final judgment.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

SWEENEY v. SWEENEY.

EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT—ENTRY—SHERIFF'S DEED—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE—RIGHT OF ACTION—COSTS OF FORMER SUIT.

1. Where, on the trial of an action for the recovery of land, brought by one who claimed to have purchased the same at a sheriff's sale against the defendant in the execution under which it was sold, the plaintiff introduced in evidence the sheriff's deed, accompanied by an exemplification of a valid judgment against the defendant, and proof of the loss of the execution issuing therefrom, a prima facie case of title in the plaintiff was made out, and it was erroneous for the court to charge the jury that the sheriff's deed could be considered only as color of title.

(a) A judgment rendered by the court in 1869 in a suit on an unconditional contract in writing, where no issuable defense was filed under oath, in all respects regular, except that it was not signed by the judge, is valid if entered on the minutes of the court, and they are signed by the judge; and, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, it will be presumed that the judge signed the minutes.

(b) Sufficient evidence was introduced in this case to raise a reasonable presumption that the execution was lost, and to show due diligence in searching for it.

(c) The recitals in a sheriff's deed, of the execution, and the seizure and sale of the property by virtue thereof, are, when the execution is lost, prima facie evidence of the truth of such recitals.

2. The declarations of an agent, who is in possession of realty merely to manage and care for the same, are not admissible in evidence against the principal to disparage his title.

3. Where evidence is objected to as a whole, and some parts of it are admissible, it is not erroneous to overrule the objection.

4. A judgment abating an action upon the ground that the plaintiff had brought the same without having paid the costs which had accrued in a previous suit, involving the same subject-matter and against the same defendant, which had been begun and dismissed by him, is no bar to the bringing of a third suit for the same cause of action, and against the same defendant, if, before instituting the last proceeding, the plaintiff has paid all the costs which had accrued in the two previous suits.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by Miles Sweeney against Mary Maloy, and equitable petition against the same defendant for an injunction. The suits were consolidated, and, on the death of defendant, Kate I. Sweeney, administratrix, was made defendant. Verdict for defendant, and plaintiff brings error, and defendant assigns cross-error. Reversed on main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on cross-bill.

M. W. Harris and J. R. Cooper, for plaintiff in error. W. J. Grace and J. L. Anderson, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. Miles Sweeney brought ejectment, to the April term, 1901, of Bibb superior court, against Mary Maloy, for certain realty in the city of Macon. As ancillary to this action, he brought to the same term, and against the same defendant, an equitable petition for injunction and receiver, in which he set forth the title upon which he relied for a recovery. Pending the suits the defendant died, and Kate I. Sweeney, administratrix on her estate, was made party defendant. On the trial the two actions were consolidated and tried as one. The plaintiff introduced the following documentary evidence: (1) An exemplification of the minutes of Bibb superior court, showing the following judgment: "Patrick Fleming vs. John & Mary Maloy. Complaint. No issuable plea under oath having been filed in this case: It is ordered that plaintiff have judgment against defendants, John Mulloy and Mary Mulloy, for the sum of three hundred dollars principal, with interest from August 22nd, 1867, and costs of suit. By the Court, June 14th, 1869. Whittle & Gustin, Plaintiff's Attys." (2) An exemplification of the execution docket of such court, showing an entry thereon of the execution issued upon such judgment and its delivery to Martin, sheriff, on August 7, 1869. (3) A sheriff's deed, dated May 7, 1873, and duly recorded, executed by George F. Cherry, sheriff of Bibb county, to Miles Sweeney, to the premises in dispute; consideration, $250. This deed recited that James Martin, late sheriff of Bibb county, on August 9, 1869, levied the execution above referred to upon the land in dispute, and that George F. Cherry, sheriff, sold it in pursuance of such levy. The deed also contained the recitals usual in sheriff's deeds. (4) A warranty deed from Miles J. Sweeney to Patrick Sweeney, dated and recorded May 9, 1885, to the premises in dispute; consideration, $256. (5) A warranty deed from Patrick Sweeney to Miles J. Sweeney, to the premises in dispute, dated June 26, 1888, and duly recorded; consideration, $500. The plaintiff testified that he had the execution referred to in his possession some six or seven years prior to the trial; that he did not know what had become of it; that he had made frequent and thorough searches for it, but had failed to find it. Sheriff Wescott and Deputy Sheriff Menard testified that they had made several searches in the sheriff's office for the execution, but it could not be found. Deputy Clerk Holt testified that it could not be found in the clerk's office after careful search. The plaintiff's contentions were, in brief, that he purchased the property in good faith at sheriff's sale, and paid $250 for it; that he went into actual possession under the sheriff's deed, and so remained, holding the property adversely, until 1885, when he conveyed the property to his brother Patrick Sweeney, with the verbal understanding between them that Patrick should hold the title until the plaintiff should return from Ireland, where he then contemplated going for a few years; that, upon his return from Ireland, Patrick reconveyed the property to him, in 1888; that he remained in possession of it till 1893 or 1894, when, Mary Maloy having gone into possession of part of it, he sued out a warrant to dispossess her. The defendant's contentions, in substance, were that Mary Maloy had been in the actual adverse possession of the property for more than 30 years; that plaintiff had never been in possession; that Mary Maloy furnished plaintiff with sufficient money to pay for her the claim of Patrick Fleming, and she believed he had done so; that he fraudulently had the property sold by the sheriff, and took the sheriff's deed to the same, and she had no knowledge until recently that any such sale had ever been made, or that plaintiff claimed to own any interest in the property. Evidence was submitted by both parties tending to sustain their respective contentions. There was a verdict in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which being refused, he excepted.

1. The court charged the jury that, inasmuch as the execution in favor of Fleming against John and Mary Maloy had not been put in evidence, the deed from Cherry, sheriff, to Miles Sweeney could be considered by them only as color of title, and that, to make out a prima facie case, plaintiff would have to show seven years' adverse possession under such deed. In the motion for a new trial, error was assigned upon this charge, and we think the exception well taken. A sale regularly made by virtue of a judicial process issuing from a court of competent jurisdiction conveys the title as effectually as if the sale were made by the person against whom the process issued. Civ. Code 1895, § 5446. And in all controversies in the courts of this state the purchaser at such a sale shall not be required to show title deeds back of his purchase, unless it be necessary for his case to show good title in the person whose interest he purchased. Id. § 5447. As we have seen, the suit was brought against the defendant in execution by the purchaser at sheriff's sale; and the sheriff's deed exhibited in evidence by the plaintiff was accompanied by exemplifications showing a judgment against the defendant, the entry on the execution docket of the execution issued on the judgment, and delivery of the execution to the former sheriff, and by proof of loss of the execution. While the judgment was rendered in a suit upon an unconditional contract in writing, where no issuable defense was filed on oath, yet it appears to have been rendered "by the court," and was entered on the minutes; and the presumption is, nothing to the contrary appearing, that the court did its duty by signing the minutes. The judgment was therefore valid. American Mortgage Co. v. Hill, 92 Ga. 305, 18 S. E. 425, and cases cited. Proof that the fi. fa. was entered on the execution docket, and that the docket showed a delivery of the execution to the former sheriff, was sufficient to show that the fi. fa. had existed; and the unavailing searches made for it by the sheriff, the deputy sheriff, and the clerk, as well as by the plaintiff, were sufficient to authorize the presumption that it was lost or destroyed—proof sufficient to raise a reasonable presumption of its loss or destruction being all that was necessary. Vaughn v. Biggers, 6 Ga. 188 (2); Harper v. Scott, 12 Ga. 125 (4). In Fretwell v. Morrow, 7 Ga. 264, where it appears that a constable levied a justice's court fi. fa. on land, and delivered the execution to the sheriff, who duly sold the land, but failed to execute a deed to the purchaser, and that his successor in office subsequently executed such deed, it was held that upon proof of loss of the fi. fa. the deed was admissible in evidence. It is true that it was not expressly said that the deed was admissible as title, but such was evidently the extent of the ruling, as the deed would have been admissible as color, unaccompanied by the fi. fa., though the latter had not been lost. It has been several times held that "the sheriff's deed alone, unaccompanied by either the judgment or the fi. fa., was sufficient to constitute color of title." Beverly v. Burke, 9 Ga. 440, 54 Am. Dec. 351; Hester v. Coats, 22 Ga. 58; Hammond v. Crosby, 68 Ga. 767. In Watson v. Tindal, 24 Ga. 494, 71 Am. Dec. 142, it was held: "A sheriff's deed must be accompanied by the execution under which the land was sold, or the judgment upon which it issued." In Boatright v. Heirs of Porter, 32 Ga. 130, the following ruling was made: "A sheriff's deed being offered in evidence without the production of the execution under which the sale was made, or of any exemplification of the judgment, but it appearing that great diligence had been shown to procure both, held, that the deed was properly admitted in evidence, under the circumstances, upon the faith of its own recitals." Of course, in view of the previous rulings in Beverly v. Burke and Hester v. Coats, supra, this decision meant that the sheriff's deed was admissible as title, and not merely as color. It was held in Irby v. Gardner, 56 Ga. 643, that "a sheriff's deed, duly recorded, should be admitted in evidence without the justice court fi. fa. under which the land was sold; the sale having been made in 1855, and the fi. fa. lost." And it was early held by this court—Ellis v. Smith, 10 Ga. 253 (2), citing Vaughn v. Biggers, 6 Ga. 188—that the recitals in a sheriff's deed of the fi. fa., and seizure and sale of the property under it, are, when the fi. fa. is lost, prima facie proof, at least, of the facts contained in the deed. While it may not have been expressly held that a sheriff's deed, when accompanied by the judgment only, is admissible as title, and not merely as color, there is certainly a strong intimation in several of the cases which we have cited above that such is the true rule. Be this as it may, however, there can be no doubt that where, as in this case, the sheriff's deed is accompanied by an exemplification of a valid judgment, and proof of the loss of the execution, the deed is admissible as evidence of title, and not merely as color of title.

2. Complaint was made in the motion for a new trial of the admission in evidence, over plaintiff's objection, of a letter written January 29, 1891, by E. J. Burke for Patrick Sweeney, to Mary Maloy, the contents of which, the defendant claimed, amounted to an admission by Patrick Sweeney that the land in dispute was the property of Mary Maloy at the time the letter was written. The court erred in admitting this letter in evidence. According to the testimony of Miles Sweeney, his brother Patrick reconveyed this property to him in 1888, after he returned from Ireland. Miles subsequently went to Ireland again, and, as he testified, left Patrick in possession of the property as his agent, to manage and care for it while he was away, and he had not returned when the letter above referred to was written. The declarations of an agent in the possession of property simply for the purpose of managing it and caring for it for his principal are not admissible to show title to the property out of his principal. An essential condition upon which the admissions of an agent are admissible against his principal is that they be made in pursuance of the agent's power—within the scope of his authority (Civ. Code 1895, § 5192)—for, if they have reference to acts which the agent had no power to perform, or to any matter foreign to the agency, they stand on the same level as the statements of strangers, and are clearly inadmissible. 1 Gr. Ev. § 113. "A letter is inadmissible to bind a third person in the absence of proof of authority from him to the writer to make the statements and admissions therein contained." McMath v. Teel, 64 Ga. 595. "The admissions of an agent only bind his principal when made in the scope of his business as agent, and, if either party relies upon such admissions, he must show they were made in the scope of his business." Wilcox v. Hall, 53 Ga. 685. The only power or authority, under the evidence, that Patrick Sweeney had in reference to the property in dispute, at the time the letter in question was written, was to manage and take care of it—rent it, collect the rents, keep it insured and in repair. So he manifestly had no power to impair or discredit his principal's title to the property, if he had any, by making statements in disparagement thereof. An agent cannot dispute his principal's title. Civ. Code 1895, § 3012. In Olaflin v. Continental Works, 85 Ga. 27, 11 S. E. 721 (3), it was held that "while * * * [an agent] was intrusted with the possession and management of the business [of the principal] he could use the goods so as to realize some profit to his principal, but could not pay even matured claims in goods discounted twenty-four per cent. from the cost price marked upon them by the principal." In the opinion (page 40, 85 Ga., page 722, 11 S. E.) it was said: "There can be no doubt that the agent violated his duty in admitting, upon an ex parte representation, that his principal had committed such wholesale fraud, especially when he knew so little of the latter's concerns as to be totally surprised on hearing of the outstanding indebtedness, and when he professed to have the intention of continuing the business. An agent cannot deny his principal's title." So it has been held that "the declarations of an agent of a vendee, whose agency is limited to the care and custody of goods after they have passed to the possession of the vendee, are not admissible in evidence to show that the purchase of the vendee was fraudulent." Hutchings v. Castle, 48 Cal. 152. On the same line is Winchester Mfg. Co. v. Creary, 116 U. S. 161, 6 Sup. Ct. 369, 29 L. Ed. 591. Counsel for the defendant in error contend that the letter was admissible as a declaration of a person in possession of property in disparagement of his own title. Under the evidence, Patrick Sweeney had possession of the property merely as the agent of Miles Sweeney, and his agency was limited to managing and caring for it. The letter contained nothing in disparagement of the title of Patrick, because he had no title when the letter was written, nor did he claim any. While the declarations of one in possession against his interest are admissible against him and those claiming under him, the rule, as we have shown, does not apply to this case, because Patrick had no interest in the property except as agent for Miles, and the latter did not claim under the former.

3. Error was assigned upon the admission, over plaintiff's objection, of several letters from Miles Sweeney to Patrick Sweeney. These letters, as appears from the motion for a new trial, were objected to as a whole. Some of them, or at least portions of some of them, were clearly admissible, and therefore it was not erroneous to overrule such objection.

4. It appears from a cross-bill of exceptions sued out by the defendant in error that she filed a plea of res adjudicata to the present action, in which it was set forth that Miles Sweeney brought an action against Mary Maloy, returnable to the November term, 1894, of Bibb superior court, to recover the property which is the subject-matter of the present suit, in which former action, as the petition therein showed, he relied for a recovery upon the same muniments of title as in the present case; that on January 25, 1897, the former action was dismissed on motion of counsel for plaintiff therein; that in February, 1897, Miles Sweeney brought another action for the same property against Mary Maloy, returnable to the April term, 1897, of Bibb superior court, in which he again relied for a recovery upon the same muniments of title as in the present suit, the petition reciting that plaintiff had voluntarily dismissed his first petition; that to the second suit Mary Maloy filed a plea of abatement, setting up the voluntary dismissal by plaintiff of his first action, and that he had subsequently brought the second suit, involving the same subject-matter, and between the same parties, without having paid the costs and expenses that had accrued in the first suit; that upon this plea of abatement there was a verdict sustaining the same, and a judgment entered thereon abating the second suit; and that such judgment was reviewed by the Supreme Court and was affirmed. By consent of parties the issue raised by the plea of res adjudicata was submitted to the court for decision without the intervention of a jury. Upon proof of the facts set up in this plea, the court found against it. Error was assigned upon this judgment of the court in the cross-bill of exceptions. We see no error in the court's ruling. The judgment abating the second suit did not bar the plaintiff from subsequently bringing the present action, after paying all the costs in the first and second suits, as the court found he had done.

Judgment reversed on main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on cross-bill. All the Justices concur.

SMITH v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 8, 1903.)

CRIMINAL LAW — APPEAL — REVIEW — EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS — ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL — NEW TRIAL.

1. It not appearing in the motion for a new trial what the answer of the court stenographer to the question asked him was or would have been, this court cannot consider the complaint that the rejection of his evidence was error.

2. It was not error that the court excluded from the evidence the official stenographer's notes of a dialogue between counsel and a witness on a former trial of the same case, it not appearing prima facie that such evidence elucidated any point in the case on trial, and the complaint in the motion for a new trial not showing in what way it injuriously affected the rights of the accused.

3. The assignment of error upon the charge of the court falls within the ruling of this court in Anderson v. Southern Ry. Co., 107 Ga. 501, 83 S. E. 644 (4c), that "when a portion of a charge, which is complained of generally, contains several distinct propositions, and one or more of the same is correct in the abstract, then the general assignment of error is not good and will not be further considered."

4. It did not appear that the evidence objected to, even if inadmissible, was of such materiality that its subsequent withdrawal by the court from the consideration of the jury did not cure whatever harm had been done the accused.

5. The record does not disclose that the alleged improper argument of counsel was made the basis of a motion for a mistrial, or that any objection whatever was made thereto before the trial judge, and therefore it was not error to refuse to grant a new trial on the ground of such argument.

6. The evidence fully sustained the conviction of the accused, and this court will not interfere with the judgment of the court below refusing to grant a new trial.

CAMP et al. v. VAUGHAN.

WILLS — RESIDUARY ESTATE — DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION — CLAIMS AGAINST UNITED STATES.

1. The officers of the army of the United States, during the late war between the United States and the Confederate States, received and appropriated to the use of the army certain supplies, quartermaster and commissary stores, belonging to Jonathan D. Vaughan, of Paulding county. After the war, Vaughan filed with the United States commissioners of claims, under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871 (16 Stat. 524, c. 116, § 2), a claim for compensation for these supplies; setting them out in an itemized statement, and averring his loyalty to the United States during the war. Subsequently his petition, under another act of Congress, known as the "Bowman Act," was referred to the Court of Claims of the United States, and that court found and reported to Congress that there was due and unpaid on this claim the sum of $1,715, and also that the claimant had been a loyal citizen of the United States. On May 27, 1902, Congress passed "An act for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions" of the act just mentioned, and appropriated to J. T. Vaughan, "administrator of the estate of Jonathan D. Vaughan, deceased," said sum of $1,715. 32 Stat. 207, c. 887. Jonathan D. Vaughan made his last will and testament on the 7th of August, 1879, and died in January, 1881. His will was duly probated in the court of ordinary of Paulding county at the February term, 1881, and his widow qualified as executrix under the will. The will, after providing for the payment of his debts and certain nominal legacies, bequeathed the remainder of his estate to his widow and to James T. Vaughan and Ada Vaughan. His widow having, presumably, died, J. T. Vaughan was appointed administrator of the estate, and to him, as such administrator, the appropriation was made, as before stated. Held, that this fund passed under the will to the residuary legatees therein named, and was not a mere gratuity which descended to the heirs at law of Jonathan D. Vaughan under the statute of distributions. Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet. 193, 7 L. Ed. 108; Erwin v. United States, 97 U. S. 392, 24 L. Ed. 1065; Phelps v. McDonald, 99 U. S. 298, 25 L. Ed. 473; Williams v. Heard, 11 Sup. Ct. 885, 140 U. S. 529, 35 L. Ed. 550; Pierce v. Stidworthy, 9 Atl. 617, 79 Me. 234, 239; 1 Underhill on Wills, § 51, and authorities cited.

2. The present case is clearly distinguishable, upon its facts, from that of Ware v. Trustees of Emory College, 65 Ga. 283, wherein it appeared that after the death of a testator "a grant of land was made by the government of the United States to the heirs and legal representatives of said testator," and this court accordingly held that "the heirs and legal representatives took under the grant, and not under the will"; the testator never having had any interest in the lands, and the grant being in the nature of a mere donation made directly to others after his death.

TONEY et al. v. MAYOR, ETC., OF MACON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 28, 1903.)

CITIES—ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—TITLE OF ACT.

1. The existence of prior statutes permitting the enlargement of the boundaries of the city of Macon with the consent of its city council and of the property owners in the territory proposed to be annexed does not deprive the General Assembly of the power to compel the annexation without the consent of the persons affected thereby.

2. The act of August 12, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 579), is not variant from its title.

3. There must necessarily be an interval between the annexation and an election, and the fact that those in the new territory are without representation in council until the next municipal election does not render the act void.

4. Such act is not unconstitutional because persons and property in the newly annexed territory may be subject to taxation for the purpose of paying in part the existing indebtedness of the city of Macon.

5. The obligation to pay such taxes arises from the relation created by legal annexation, and is also usually supported by the equitable consideration that the values in the suburb have been increased by proximity to the existing municipality, and by the further consideration that the newly incorporated inhabitants acquire an interest in the public property purchased with the proceeds of previous bond issues and taxation.

6. There is no attempt by special act to absolutely prohibit the sale of liquor in the new territory, the statute merely preventing the city council from granting licenses for such sale, but leaving undetermined the question as to whether they may be obtained from other sources.

7. Ordinances cannot be oppressive or unreasonable, nor can they unfairly discriminate in favor of one class against another.

8. Municipal laws should be general in their operation, but all places in the same city do not necessarily require the same local legislation. 9. There is nothing in the Constitution which prevents the General Assembly from making sanitary regulations peculiarly adapted to the newly annexed territory; and the act of 1903, extending the limits of Macon, could in no event be declared void as a whole because the penalty for not making sewer connections in the new territory was by fine and imprisonment, while under existing ordinances in the old limits the punishment was by fine only.

10. In advance of any attempt to exercise controverted powers, this court will not pass upon the validity of separate and independent clauses, which, if void, would not interfere with the main purpose of the act to extend the limits of the city of Macon.

11. The act of annexation does not deprive the newly incorporated citizens of the equal protection of the laws, nor is it violative of the Constitution of the United States or of this state for any of the reasons set out in the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by J. W. Toney and others against the mayor and council of Macon. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Toney and other citizens residing in the territory which by the act of August 12, 1903, was annexed to the city of Macon, filed an equitable petition seeking to enjoin the mayor and council of Macon from taking control of said territory, or from exercising any powers under the act, alleging: (1) That it was void because by previous acts in 1863 and 1900 it had been provided that the boundaries of Macon might be enlarged with the consent of those affected thereby, whereas the last act (1903) enlarged the city without the consent of the citizens and property owners in the new section; (2) that the act was void under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it places upon them the burden of taxation without representation, they having had no opportunity to vote for mayor and aldermen; (3) that they are thereby rendered liable for the payment of the present bonded indebtedness of the city of Macon, without having had any voice in its creation, or received any benefit from the same; (4) that it imposes fine and imprisonment for failure to connect sewers in the annexed territory, whereas in the original city limits the punishment is fine only; (5) that it discriminates against petitioners in that it allows citizens in the original territory to sell liquor, and forever prohibits citizens in the new territory from engaging therein in the liquor business; (6) that it is in contravention of the Constitution of the state of Georgia as to the prohibition against granting liquor licenses, the imposition of greater penalties for failing to make sewer connections, and in other particulars which are not included in the brief, and therefore treated as abandoned under the practice in this court. The chancellor refused the injunction, and plaintiffs excepted.

M. G. Bayne and Hardeman & Moore, for plaintiffs in error. Dessau, Harris & Harris and Minter Wimberly, for defendants in error.

LAMAR, J. 1, 2. The act of April 18, 1863 (Acts 1862-63, p. 189), and the act of December 13, 1900 (Acts 1900, p. 336), permitting contiguous territory to be annexed to the city of Macon with the consent of the mayor and council and those living in the new territory, did not deprive the Legislature of its inherent power to enlarge the corporate limits without the consent of those affected thereby. Civ. Code 1895, § 1835; Cheaney v. Hooser. 9 B. Mon. 330. Besides, the act repeals all existing laws providing for an extension of the corporate limits. Nor is it variant from its title. It clearly indicates an intention to amend the charter, and to provide for an extension of the corporate limits.

3. Nor is the act void because the new territory is made part of two different wards without representation in council until the next election. In the nature of things, there must be an interval between annexation and election. See Mayor of Americus v. Perry, 114 Ga. 871 (2), 40 S. E. 1004, 57 L. R. A. 230.

4, 5. The fact that the city of Macon had already incurred a bonded indebtedness did not prevent the General Assembly from annexing contiguous territory, and making all the inhabitants and property within the new corporate limits alike subject to taxation to raise municipal revenue for all legitimate purposes, without respect to the time when some of the liabilities arose to which the revenue is to be applied. Cash v. Douglasville, 94 Ga. 557, 20 S. E. 438; Wade v. Richmond, 18 Gr. 583; Smith v. Saginaw, 81 Mich. 132, 45 N. W. 964; Layton v. New Orleans, 12 La. Ann. 515. The liability of those thus newly included in the municipality arises from the legal relation created by statute and the benefits of local government obtained. But it is also usually supported by the equitable consideration that the population and taxable value of the tract has been increased by proximity to the existing center; and for the further reason that those incorporated therein at once acquire an interest in all the public property belonging to the city, whether paid for out of previous taxes with previous bonds which have been satisfied, or with the proceeds of bonds still due.

6. A part of an act may be valid and a part invalid, and the part which is constitutional will not be defeated by that which is unconstitutional, unless it appears that the latter was so connected with the general scope of the statute that, should it be stricken, effect could not be given to the legislative intent. Elliott v. State, 91 Ga. 696, 17 S. E. 1004. None of the provisions alleged to be void are of a character which, if found to be invalid, would defeat the whole act, unless it be that declaring that the mayor and council of Macon "shall never have any authority to permit or license the sale of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors within said territory; and this proviso shall operate as a contract between the mayor and council of the city of Macon and the people of the territory by this act incorporated into said city of Macon, and shall not be subject to repeal." But this proviso does not, as in Papworth v. State, 103 Ga. 36, 31 S. E. 402, and in Bagley v. State, 103 Ga. 388, 29 S. E. 123, 32 S. E. 414, undertake by a special law to prohibit and render unlawful the sale of liquor within the new territory. It puts a perpetual limitation on the power of the municipality to grant licenses. It had no such authority in this territory before the act was passed. It got none by its adoption, and, so far as the liquor business is concerned, it is as though the statute extending the boundaries had not been passed. The instances would be rare, and on peculiar facts, when it could be successfully contended that a statute was unconstitutional, not for granting, but for failing to grant, certain police powers. But it will be time enough to decide as to the effect of this prohibition against the grant of licenses when some one undertakes to sell and is prosecuted therefor. It is sufficient to say that an integral part of the contract of annexation is that, so far as the mayor and council of Macon are concerned, they shall not license or permit such sale. If, without their license, one can sell domestic wine, or if he can obtain lawful permission so to do from other authorities, the mayor and council will not be responsible, and the contract in the statute contained will not be violated by them. The act seems purposely to refrain from legislation on the subject of liquor, with a view, so far as that can lawfully be done, of preserving the present status.

7-11. The penalty for failing to make sewer connections is different in the newly annexed territory from that in the old limits of the city. But it does not necessarily follow that because there is a difference of regulations petitioners are thereby deprived of the equal protection of the laws. Ordinances cannot be oppressive or unreasonable, nor can they unfairly discriminate in favor of one citizen or of one class against another. Municipal laws "should be general in their operation, but all places in the same city do not necessarily require the same local legislation." Richmond R. R. v. Richmond, 96 U. S. 529, 24 L. Ed. 734. And, if the city council can thus legislate, there is certainly nothing to prevent the General Assembly from making a distinction in regulations peculiarly adapted to the newly annexed territory. Indeed, there are cases which distinctly rule that the new territory may be incorporated with the old on conditions applicable to the former but not to the latter. Cash v. Douglasville, 94 Ga. 557, 20 S. E. 438; United States v. Memphis, 97 U. S. 291, 24 L. Ed. 937. Acts of annexation have been frequently attacked—though generally without success—on the ground that the new territory consists of farming lands, and is sparsely settled; that there is no necessity for municipal government; that the inhabitants are so far removed from the center as to be deprived of fire and police protection, and receive no benefits in compensation for the burdens imposed. See Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 26 L. Ed. 659, affirming 85 Pa. 170, 27 Am. Rep. 633. There is an utter want of any such attack in this case. Nor does it appear that the petitioners propose to engage in the sale of liquor, or that they own property which will require the sewer connections complained of. Reid v. Eatonton, 80 Ga. 755, 6 S. E. 602; Blanton v. Merry, 116 Ga. 288, 42 S. E. 211.

No reason has been shown why the act of the Legislature annexing this territory should be declared void as a whole, nor why the city of Macon should be enjoined from exercising the powers therein conferred for the purpose of giving to the citizens of the new territory the benefits of local government and of police and sanitary regulations.

HAWKINS v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 10, 1903.)

RAILROADS—SALE—VIOLATION OF PUBLIC DUTY—LIABILITY OF PURCHASER—MERGER—DEBTS OF CONSOLIDATED COMPANY—RIGHT OF ACTION—PARTIES—TORTS.

1. Without legislative exemption a corporation charged with a duty to the public remains responsible for the proper discharge thereof, even after a lawful sale or lease.

2. The purchaser or lessee of a railroad company is likewise responsible for the violation of such public duty, where the liability arises from the acts of omission or commission.

3. Where there has been no sale, but a merger, and no provision made for the payment of the debts of the absorbed company, the consolidated corporation is liable for the debts of the former, at least to the extent of the value of the property received.

4. But where there has been a lawful and absolute sale of a railroad, the grantee is not responsible for the existing debts of the grantor.

5. Where, for a consideration furnished by C, A. promises to pay B., the latter, though a stranger to the consideration, may maintain an action on the promise. Civ. Code 1895, § 3664.

6. Actions must be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest in such contract is vested, and where A. makes no promise to C. the latter cannot maintain a suit on the contract, even though A. undertook therein to pay B.'s debt to C. Civ. Code 1895, § 4939; Gunter v. Mooney, 72 Ga. 205.

7. Where the Chattanooga Railroad Company sold its property and vendible franchises to the Central Railway Company in consideration of $1,300,000 and an agreement by the Central Company to pay the Chattanooga Company's current liabilities, the Central was not subject to a suit by a plaintiff for personal injuries alleged to have been inflicted before the making of the sale.

Error from Superior Court, Polk County; A. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by W. W. Hawkins against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Hawkins, a minor of the age of 18 years, was a brakeman in the employment of the Chattanooga, Rome & Southern Railroad Company (hereinafter called the "Chattanooga Company") and on July 26, 1900, in Polk county, he was negligently run over by the company's engine, and seriously injured. He alleged that about 10 months thereafter, to wit, on May 16, 1901, the Chattanooga Company sold all of its property and franchises to the Central of Georgia Railway Company (hereinafter called the "Central Company"), the consideration, according to the recitals in the deed attached as an exhibit, being $1,300,000 50-year 4 per cent. gold bonds of the Central Company, secured by a mortgage, the assumption by the Central Company "of the current liabilities of the Chattanooga Company," and the payment of $5 in cash. It also appears that the sale was made subject to mortgages aggregating $2,743,000 on the property of the Chattanooga Company. For the consideration named the Chattanooga Company conveyed to the Central Company all of its railroad, real estate, personal property, rights, privileges, and franchises of, or belonging to, or hereafter to be acquired by the Chattanooga Company. It was alleged that "petitioner's claim for damages under said deed and the agreement of consolidation in pursuance of which it was made is covered in said deed, and petitioner says that the Central Railway Company is directly liable to him for damages; that after said deed was delivered the Central * * * Company took possession of said Chattanooga * * * Company's entire line of railway," and all of its assets, both real and personal, "and took over also all the franchises of said Chattanooga * * * Company; * * * that said Chattanooga * * * Company has gone out of existence, * * * has no line of railroad, no visible property of any kind, and has ceased to do business, having yielded up to the Central * * * Company all its property, franchises, and rights, and it has no organization, no officers or agents, in the state of Georgia or elsewhere, so far as petitioner can find out, or so far as he is advised and believes; and petitioner says that the Central * * * Company is directly liable to him for his damages, and that the property of the old Chattanooga * * * Company, now in the possession and under the control of the said Central * * * Company, is liable to him for his damages; * * * that by reason of the facts hereinbefore set out said Central * * * Company has injured and damaged your petitioner and is indebted to him in the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, and is liable to him in that sum." The defendant demurred at the first term on the ground that the facts alleged were not sufficient in law for the plaintiff to maintain his action against the defendant: (a) Because there is no privity between the plaintiff and defendant under the contract of sale; (b) because, if defendant is liable in any event, plaintiff cannot maintain his suit until he shall have first recovered judgment against the Chattanooga Company, or without joining the Chattanooga Company with the defendant; (c) because the claim is an unliquidated demand, and not "a current liability" of the Chattanooga Company assumed by the Central Company as part of the purchase money. When, by amendment, the deed was attached as an exhibit to the petition, defendant demurred on the ground that the superior court of Polk county had no jurisdiction, but that the suit should have been maintained in Chatham county, where was located the home office of the Central Company.

Seaborn & Barry and Wright, Bunn & Trawick, for plaintiff in error. J. Branham and Sanders & Davis, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. There is conflict in the authorities as to how far a lessor corporation, charged with a public duty, is liable for the acts of its lessee. But whatever the rule elsewhere, unless there is a legislative exemption, our statute (Civ. Code 1895, § 1864) preserves to the public the liability of the vendor or lessor company, preventing it from escaping responsibility by a transfer of its property or franchises to a nonresident or insolvent, or even to a resident and solvent, grantee. Singleton v. S. W. R. R., 70 Ga. 468, 48 Am. Rep. 574; Hart v. R. R., 33 S. C. 427, 12 S. E. 9, 10 L. R. A. 794; Harmon v. R. R., 28 S. C. 401, 5 S. E. 835, 13 Am. St. Rep. 686. Contra, Arrowsmith v. Nashville R. R. (C. G.) 57 Fed. 165. The original company remains liable for the proper discharge of the obligations which it assumed to the public. It may be held responsible, in damages or otherwise, for a failure to perform the same, even though the act may be committed or omitted by its grantee. Notwithstanding the sale, the duty to carry freight and transport passengers continues; and after the sale or lease a person having a claim for damages by reason of a failure to perform such duty might have maintained an action against the Chattanooga Company, or the Central Company, or possibly both in the same action.

2. It is everywhere recognized that those operating a corporation charged with a duty to the public are subject to its burdens. The franchises are incumbered with corresponding duties, which, like covenants running with the land, are binding upon all who exercise the powers conferred. This principle is codified in Civ. Code 1895, § 1863, which makes the purchaser or lessee liable for its own acts of omission or commission while operating the franchises of another corporation. It is also, of course, solely liable on its private contracts, or for injuries to its own employes. Seaboard Air-Line Ry. v. Leader, 115 Ga. 702, 42 S. E. 38; Georgia R. Co. v. Strauss, 110 Ga. 191, 35 S. E. 332.

3. But while it is conceded that the vendee is responsible for its own contracts or torts committed since the sale, it is claimed that these sections are not exhaustive of the law on the subject, and that on general principles one railroad cannot, by a transfer of any sort, defeat the rights of creditors, or of persons having claims ex delicto, which existed at the time of the conveyance; that the purchaser takes the property burdened with all its pecuniary obligations; and that, therefore, the Central can be made to pay for damages inflicted by the Chattanooga Company upon the plaintiff in December, 1900, although the purchase was not made until May, 1901. In support of this position plaintiff cites Montgomery & West Point R. Co. v. Boring, 51 Ga. 582, and Tompkins v. Augusta Southern R. Co., 102 Ga. 442, 30 S. E. 992, holding that the company which succeeds to the charter rights and privileges conferred upon the other is to be regarded as at the same time becoming responsible for all of its debts and liabilities. But those cases are to be construed in the light of the facts. Both were cases of merger, in which the corporate existence of the company against which the plaintiff had a claim had been merged into and consolidated with the company sued. The liability there was analogous to that of the husband for the debts of the wife under the old law of baron and feme. There had been a sort of corporate marriage, in which not only the name of the debtor had been changed, but its legal entity lost in the consolidation. They twain had become one. The suit necessarily had to be against the new creature. The shares of the old stockholders had been surrendered and exchanged for scrip in the consolidated company. There had been no sale or payment of the purchase price; and, as the interests of stockholders were inferior to those of creditors, it would have been mere repudiation to preserve the rights of the shareholders by issuing stock in the consolidated company in exchange for their holdings in the old without protecting or providing for the rights of its creditors. Hence it was held (102 Ga. 443, 30 S. E. 994) that: "Where a consolidation actually takes place between two companies under a written contract providing for the absorption of the one by the other, but making no provision for liabilities against the company which goes out of existence, these liabilities, by operation of law, become binding upon the new company to the extent of the assets of the absorbed company, or to the extent of the latter's ability to perform the contracts out of which such liability arose." See, also, Morrison v. American Snuff Co., 79 Miss. 330, 30 South. 723, and note in 89 Am. St. Rep. 598. But this is not such a case. Here there was no merger, but an absolute sale, and the purchase price was paid. There is no suggestion of any fraud, or attempt to hinder, delay, or defeat the creditors of the Chattanooga Company; no allegation that the price paid was less than the value of the property bought; while it does distinctly appear that the Central paid $1,300,000 in mortgage bonds for property already incumbered to the extent of $2,743,000. If, as contended by the plaintiff, the purchaser becomes responsible for all the existing indebtedness of the selling road, the Central Company would be liable not only for claims like his, but for any deficiency on the foreclosure of the mortgage securing the outstanding bonds of the Chattanooga Company, even though the $1,300,000 paid was the full value of the property bought. There is no principle of law which requires the buyer to pay twice, or more than the property is worth, or more than the contract price. In the absence of any allegation to the contrary, it is fair to presume that the Chattanooga Company, in exchanging the railroad for negotiable bonds, was expected out of the proceeds to pay all its outstanding claims before any distribution was made among its stockholders. But if it failed in the performance of this duty, or if the liquidated debts were secured by liens, or were of prior dignity to the plaintiff's claim, or exceeded the amount received on the sale, the obligation was not upon the Central to supply the deficiency. The plaintiff's misfortune would in such case be similar to that of the many who have claims against insolvent debtors. However, for aught that appears, the plaintiff, after obtaining judgment, may yet recover from the Chattanooga Company, or from its stockholders, if there has been an unlawful distribution to them (Civ. Code 1895, § 1886); or, if his claim be included in the "current liabilities" assumed, he may by appropriate proceedings raise that question with the Central Company.

4. So far as liability for the previous public duties is concerned, the law makes both the vendor and vendee responsible for breach of that duty occurring after the sale. It preserves the rights of existing creditors to the extent of permitting a suit against the new corporation where there has been a union, merger, or consolidation of the two corporations. As to claims against one corporation whose property has been purchased by another, the general law would apply prohibiting any transaction in fraud of creditors, and preventing an assignment by an insolvent wherein it or the stockholders reserved any benefit or trust. Civ. Code 1895, § 2695, pars. 1, 2. But in other respects an out and out sale of the property of the corporation is not different from a case in which an individual sells visible property subject to levy in exchange for cash or negotiable instruments which may be put beyond the reach of the levying officer. When a railroad has a right to sell, the ordinary incidents of a sale attach; and, assuming that it is in good faith, and for a fair value, the buyer is not responsible for more than the purchase price. The law does not exact the payment of the vendor's debts by the vendee as a condition precedent to the exercise of the power of sale. The plaintiff had the usual rights of creditors in such cases. He could sue the vendor and garnishee the purchaser, or he could obtain judgment and use his legal or equitable remedies in order to enforce payment thereof. Whether both companies can be joined as defendants in one suit is not before us for determination. In Dickey v. Kansas City R. Co., 122 Mo. 223, 26 S. W. 685, Wallace v. Ann Arbor R. Co. (Mich.) 80 N. W. 572 (2), and Dallas R. Co. v. Maddox (Tex. Civ. App.) 31 S. W. 702, the railroads were conveyed by deed to the vendor, and the vendee was held not to be liable for the former's debt. The same conclusion was reached in Hoard v. Chesapeake & Ohio R. Co., 123 U. S. 223, 226, 8 Sup. Ct. 74, 31 L. Ed. 130, where the purchase was made at foreclosure sale. The pleadings must be construed as a whole, and the allegation in the petition that the Chattanooga Company sold all of its property and franchises to the Central Company necessarily refers to property other than the $1,300,000 bonds which were paid, and the franchises must mean those secondary and vendible franchises which may be transferred without destruction of the corporate existence of the vendor. And even if, as alleged, it has "gone out of existence," or if it be no longer transacting business, and has no officer or agent in this state or elsewhere, the Civil Code of 1895, § 1892, provides a method by which service may be perfected so as to find the Chattanooga Company or its stockholders.

5. The plaintiff insists, however, that, even if the Central is not liable as matter of law for torts committed before the sale by the Chattanooga Company, it is liable in this action by reason of the provision in the sealed contract by which the Central assumed the "current liabilities" of the Chattanooga Company. On this subject there are two lines of authorities. One holds that, where a promise is made to one for the benefit of another, he for whose benefit it is made may bring an action for its breach. Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268. The other, recognized in England, in the federal courts, and in several of the American states, is that the consideration must move from the plaintiff, and that a person for whose benefit a promise is made, but who is not a party to the contract, cannot sue the promisor. To this rule there are some exceptions; as where, under the contract between two persons, assets have come into the promisor's hands which in equity belong to a third person. In such a case the third person may sue in his own name, but then the suit is founded rather on the implied undertaking the law raises from the possession of the assets than on the express promise. National Bank of St. Louis v. Grand Lodge, 98 U. S. 124, 25 L. Ed. 75; Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 610, 10 Sup. Ct. 494, 33 L. Ed. 667; Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 321. We are, however, relieved from deciding between these divergent authorities in view of the common-law principle as codified in the Civil Code of 1895, §§ 3664, 4939. Under the first of these it is not necessary that the consideration should have been furnished by the plaintiff if there was in fact a promise to him, for, "if there be a valid consideration for the promise, it matters not from whom it is moved; the promisee may sustain his action, though a stranger to the consideration." Thus, where A. makes a promise to B., and the consideration therefor is furnished by C., the promisee, B., may maintain suit thereon. Thus, if property is placed in the hands of an assignee or trustee to be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of creditors, the latter may sue in equity to enforce the agreement for their benefit (Bell v. McGrady, 32 Ga. 257; Dallas v. Heard, Id. 604 [2]), or at law for money had and received by the assignee for the plaintiff's use (Wright v. Damish, 74 Ga. 828). But where the third person is not named as promisee, and where no trust is created in his favor, but the promisor merely assumes to pay the debt of the other to the third person, the latter cannot maintain an action thereon. Where the Georgia Home Insurance Company purchased the assets of the Empire State Insurance Company, and assumed the payment of indebtedness due or to become due on its policies, and subsequently a policy holder sued the Georgia Home, it was held there was no such privity between it and the assured which would entitle him to a separate action at law against the Georgia Home on the contract made between the two corporations. Empire State Ins. Co. v. Collins, 54 Ga. 376; Pfeiffer v. Hunt, 75 Ga. 513; Gunter v. Mooney, 72 Ga. 205; Austell v. Humphries, 99 Ga. 408, 27 S. E. 736. And Civ. Code 1895, § 4939, provides: "As a general rule, the action on a contract, whether express or implied, or whether by parol or under seal, or of record, must be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest in such contract is vested, and against the party who made it in person or by agent." The rule preventing the third person from maintaining such action is particularly applicable where there is no specification of the number of names of such creditors or the amount of their demands, for, as stated in Dow v. Clark, 7 Gray, 201: "If the plaintiff can maintain this action, so may every one of the other creditors of the corporation, whatever may be their number; and the defendant may be held answerable to persons of whom they never heard. And they will be bound in such actions to litigate the question whether the party who sues them has a legal claim on the corporation." Where the plaintiff's demand is not liquidated, but is based on an alleged tort, the promisor, in the absence of an express agreement, cannot be held to the burden of litigating with the plaintiff on a cause of action he may have against the promisee. On the general subject, see 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 105-109, and the many authorities there cited.

These conclusions render it unnecessary to determine whether the plaintiff's claim was "a current liability" of the Chattanooga Company assumed by the Central. The demurrer was properly sustained.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. MORRIS.

CONTINUING NUISANCE—DAMAGES—LIMITATIONS—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTION—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. Every continuance of a nuisance which is not permanent, and which can and should be abated, is a fresh nuisance, for which a new action will lie. Southern R. Co. v. Cook, 43 S. E. 697, 117 Ga. 286, and citations. Consequently, suit may be maintained for damages growing out of a nuisance of the character indicated, where the damages sued for were inflicted within four years prior to the time of filing suit, though the act which originally caused the nuisance was not done within the period of limitation of the action. Daniely v. Cheeves, 21 S. E. 524, 94 Ga. 264 (3).

2. This being an action for damages to the productiveness of the plaintiff's land by reason of an overflow of water caused by the obstruction of a stream by the defendant, it was permissible to show how much the land was capable of yielding before it was overflowed, and to what extent its fertility had been impaired on account of the obstructions placed in the stream. Such damages were not too remote, speculative, or contingent to be made the basis of a recovery.

CRIMINAL TRESPASS—EVIDENCE—UNOCCUPIED LAND.

1. One bona fide claiming to be the true owner and entitled to the possession of land cannot be convicted of trespass under Pen. Code, § 220.

2. An agent who bona fide believes that his principal is the owner and entitled to the possession of land cannot be found guilty of violating Pen. Code, § 220, if he goes upon the premises in obedience to the directions of such principal.

Error from City Court of Wrightsville; J. S. Adams, Judge.

Sam Wiggins was convicted of trespass, and brings error. Reversed.

The defendant was accused of trespass, in that he "did * * * willfully enter, go upon, and pass over the inclosed or cultivated land of another, after being personally forbidden so to do by Mary Hamilton, she being entitled to the possession for the time being." It appeared that Jenkins had bought an undivided one-half interest in the land at sheriff's sale, and made Mrs. Hamilton a bond for titles, conditioned to make her title to such half interest when she paid the two purchase-money notes. There was a provision in the bond that, "if said notes are not paid at maturity, the above bond herein is void and the sale declared off." It appeared that Mrs. Hamilton failed to pay either of the notes at maturity, and signed what purported to be rent notes. She insisted that she did not read the bond or the rent notes, and supposed that the latter were given for interest, and did not know of the provision rendering the bond void if the purchase money was not paid. This was denied by Jenkins and the attorney who prepared the papers. After the failure to pay the purchase money, Jenkins sued out a distress warrant, and also filed a petition in the superior court for partition. To this latter proceeding Mrs. Hamilton filed a caveat. It appeared that Jenkins directed Wiggins to go to work upon the land, and while there Mrs. Hamilton ordered the laborer away, and directed him not to come on the land, but that he returned the next day; and on this latter alleged trespass the accusation was based. There is no evidence that the land was inclosed or cultivated, except in so far as it appears from the fact that she referred to it as her field, and the further fact that Wiggins "went to work there, and kept coming and working."

Wm. Faircloth, for plaintiff in error. B. B. Blount, Sol., for the State.

LAMAR, J. In order to quiet possession until final trial on the merits, and to prevent the breach of the peace which might result if one should take the law in his own hands and attempt to enforce his own rights, Civ. Code, §§ 4823-4826, provide the remedy relating to forcible entry and detainer. A prosecution under Pen. Code, § 220, is not intended as a substitute therefor, nor to serve the office of an action of trespass to try title. On the other hand, it is not necessary that the prosecutor should have perfect title in fee simple, in order to avail himself of the protection afforded by Pen. Code, § 220. Even possession is sufficient title to sustain an action of ejectment against a mere trespasser. One "entitled to the possession for the time being" is entitled to the undisturbed enjoyment of such right, and, regardless of who is the true owner, one not entitled to the possession may be convicted of a misdemeanor for going on the land in disregard of the statutory notice if the other elements of the offense appear. This section defines a crime in which a conviction can only be sustained where there is a union or joint operation of act and intention. Pen. Code, § 31. If it appears that the defendant went upon the land in the bona fide belief that Jenkins was the owner and had the right to send him there, his mistake, if it was a mistake, ought not to be punished as a crime. Miley v. State, 118 Ga. 274, 45 S. E. 245; Hateley v. State, 118 Ga. 79, 44 S. E. 852. There is nothing to indicate that the laborer intended to violate the law, or to willfully trespass on the lands of another. He acted in obedience to the order of his employer, who actually had a deed to the land, and who insisted that Mrs. Hamilton's right of possession under the bond for titles had terminated.

If there was a bona fide entry under claim of title and right of possession in Jenkins, there would be no violation of the statute, which only applies to those who willfully disregard the notice given by the true owner, or by the one entitled to possession for the time being.

But assuming that the prosecutrix was entitled to the possession; that she gave notice to the defendant not to go on the land; that he willfully disregarded the notice and committed a trespass, with intent to violate the law—the evidence wholly fails to show that the land was cultivated or inclosed. He was not charged with going into or passing over a "field." There is no description of the land on which the trespass is alleged to have been committed; nothing to show whether it was pasture, woodland, or waste land; nothing to indicate that there was any fence or inclosure around it; nothing to show that it had ever been cultivated, or that the prosecutrix ever intended to cultivate it. The unlawful act of the defendant in "working" or "cultivating" the day before the notice would not of itself make the land cultivated, within the meaning of the Code; or, even if an act of trespass could give it that character, there is no evidence as to what part of the place was worked by the defendant on the day of the trespass for which he is prosecuted, nor what kind of work he then was doing—whether cutting down trees, splitting rails, digging ditches, tilling the soil, or doing agricultural work of any sort. No question was made as to the sufficiency of the indictment, but the evidence does not sustain the charge made. The verdict is contrary to law, and a new trial should be granted. Murphey v. State, 115 Ga. 201, 41 S. E. 685; Bryce v. State, 113 Ga. 705, 39 S. E. 282.

OWENS v. MACON & B. R. CO.

CARRIERS—REFUSAL TO TRANSPORT LUNATIC—LIABILITIES—NOTICE.

1. The right of other travelers to a safe and comfortable passage warrants a carrier in refusing to receive one who has been adjudged a lunatic, and who, though in charge of attendants, is loudly cursing and using obscene language at the time of boarding the car.

2. Common carriers cannot absolutely refuse to transport persons who are insane, but may in all cases insist that they be properly attended, safely guarded, and securely restrained.

3. Where it becomes necessary to transport a lunatic, who by reason of his violence may endanger the safety or interfere with the comfort of other travelers, the carrier is entitled to seasonable notice, in order that it may make proper arrangements for his transportation.

Error from Superior Court, Troup County; S. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by J. B. Owens against the Macon & Birmingham Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Under a writ of lunacy in Troup county, before a jury, of which the ticket agent of the railroad was a member, Josh Owens was adjudged insane, and committed to the State Sanatorium at Milledgeville. Being sometimes violent, he was handcuffed and taken to the railroad station by his brother, the plaintiff in error, and another friend, acting as guards. Three tickets from Mountville to Macon were purchased. The train stopped. The insane man was taken toward the passenger car, but the conductor instructed that he should be placed in the apartment ahead of the smoking car. Josh Owens violently resisted being put on the car, though it appears that he was not making any noise or outcry. The general manager of the railroad company happened to be on the train, and, seeing the condition and conduct of the insane person, gave instructions that he could not be carried on the train. The plaintiff replied that the lunatic would be quiet if they could get him on a seat, at which Josh Owens himself, with great noise and vehemence, began swearing, saying that he would not be quiet; and, in reply to the continued objection of the general manager to allow him passage, plaintiff stated that he would be willing to take his brother in the baggage car, which was also declined; witness for the railroad stating at the trial that it was used for carrying express and breakables, and was not in a condition for the transportation of the insane man. The company's agent agreed, however, to transport him in the cab of a freight car due shortly thereafter, which offer was declined on the ground that that train did not make connection at Macon, the point it was necessary to go to in order to reach Milledgeville. There was evidence that, after the refusal to transport, the passage money was tendered and declined, and that plaintiff was obliged to take his brother in a buggy across the country to another railroad, by which he was subsequently carried to Milledgeville. There was evidence on the part of the company that there were only two passenger coaches, in one of which there were ladies, and the other was divided into two compartments, one end of which was used as a smoker, all the seats of which were occupied by passengers, the other end being used for colored people, and in which there was a colored woman passenger; that the general manager offered to carry the insane man on the next day, if he was then quiet, or he would carry him in the cab of the freight train that passed for Macon a few hours later on the same day. The petition alleged that it was the usual custom of the company to transport lunatics and persons adjudged insane, over its line to Macon, en route to the State Sanatorium, to which allegation the defendant answered that it never refused to transport lunatics when they were quiet and not in such a condition as to render themselves dangerous to passengers, and that it would have transported Josh Owens, had he not been resisting those attempting to put him on the cars, and uttering vulgar language in a loud and boisterous manner, and that when the tickets were sold, prior to the arrival of the train, Josh Owens appeared to be quiet. At the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted.

H. A. Hall, for plaintiff in error. L. F. Garrard and Longley & Longley, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. This was a suit by one of the guards in charge of a lunatic, but it was conceded on the argument here that he could not recover if the company was justified in refusing to transport the lunatic, and we shall therefore consider what was the carrier's obligation to the insane man. The relation of carrier and passenger creates reciprocal duties. One is bound safely to transport; the other, to conform to all reasonable regulations, and so to conduct himself as not to incommode other passengers who have an equal right to a safe and comfortable passage. Those who so act as to be obnoxious may be refused transportation or ejected. The payment of fare and the possession of a ticket do not require the carrier to transport those who are noisy or boisterous, or who threaten the safety of, or occasion inconvenience to, others on the train. But in the case of unfortunates who are not responsible for their disorderly conduct, and who, at best, are involuntary passengers, a different question is presented, calling in each case for the exercise of a wise discretion. On the one hand, regard must be had for the safety and comfort of other travelers, and, on the other, to the fact that in losing his mind the lunatic has not lost the right to be transported. It may be vitally important that he be taken to a place where he can receive the attention and confinement rendered necessary by his mental state. The carrier cannot absolutely refuse transportation to insane persons, but it may in all cases insist that he be properly attended, safely guarded, and securely restrained. And even where such precautions have been taken, it is not bound to afford him, if violent, transportation in the cars in which other travelers are being conveyed. And while there may be cases in which the convenience of other passengers should yield to the necessities of the unfortunate, the company may decline to receive one who at the time of entering the train exhibits signs of violence which indicate that his presence and conduct would tend to the manifest annoyance of others. So to do would ordinarily be better than to receive him on the promise of his attendants that he would be quiet, and, on the disorder continuing, force upon the carrier the duty of deciding whether he should be ejected at a station where there might not be proper accommodations. Where, however, it becomes essential to transport one who, though violent and noisy, is not responsible for his actions, the company is entitled to seasonable notice, in order that it may make proper arrangements. The action of the defendant in the present case in offering transportation on a later train, whereon others would not be incommoded, was in strict fulfillment of its double duty to the lunatic and the general public. It could not be required to place him in the baggage car, which was not intended for passengers. If the attendants were unwilling for him to be taken in the cab of the freight train, they were at least bound to give the carrier an opportunity to make other arrangements.

We find no authority directly in point, though the following cases bear more or less on the question raised: Peavy v. Georgia R. Co., 81 Ga. 485, 8 S. E. 70, 12 Am. St. Rep. 334; Atchison R. Co. v. Weber, 33 Kan. 543, 6 Pac. 877, 52 Am. Rep. 548; Paddock v. Atchison R. Co., 37 Fed. 841, 4 L. R. A. 231; Croom v. Chicago R. Co., 52 Minn. 296, 53 N. W. 1128, 18 L. R. A. 602, 38 Am. Although the ticket agent was on the jury inquiring as to the lunacy of Owens, and had notice of his mental state, the latter was not exhibiting any signs of violence when the ticket was sold; and, though the company was accustomed to convey persons insane, it was not bound to admit to its cars one boisterous, cursing, and using obscene language at the time.

There was no error of law committed, and the verdict was demanded by the evidence. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WOODLEY v. COKER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 12, 1903.)

ABUSE OF PROCESS—WHEN ACTION LIES—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

1. An action for the malicious use of process in a civil suit will lie where the person of the defendant was arrested or his property attached.

2. The petition set forth a cause of action for the malicious use of bail process in a trover suit, and was not a composite petition setting forth three causes of action, for malicious use of process, malicious arrest, and false imprisonment.

3. In an action for the malicious use of bail process in a trover suit, it is not necessary to allege that the defendant in the suit was actually imprisoned in the county jail. An averment that he was arrested under bail process, and thereby restrained of his liberty, is sufficient.

4. Punitive damages are recoverable in an action for the malicious use of process in a civil suit.

5. An amendment to a petition which, properly construed, is merely an amplification of the original petition, setting forth additional facts explanatory of the cause of action therein set forth, is allowable.

Error from City Court of Floyd County; John H. Reece, Judge.

Action by G. M. Woodley against W. H. Coker. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

C. E. Carpenter and Griffith & Weatherly, for plaintiff in error. McHenry & Maddox, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Woodley brought suit against Coker, alleging in his petition substantially as follows: Coker has injured and damaged plaintiff in the sum of $2,000. In 1901 Coker brought suit against plaintiff and Clark Bros. for the recovery of 225 bed slats, and at the time of filing this suit made affidavit to obtain bail, under which plaintiff was arrested and held in custody in the county courthouse for two hours. While never actually imprisoned in the county jail, plaintiff was not allowed by the sheriff to leave town for six days. Plaintiff endeavored to make bond, but was unable to do so. Coker claimed to have a bill of sale to the bed slats, executed by one W. B. Clark, a member of the firm of Woodley & Clark Bros., to secure a debt which Coker claimed Clark Bros. owed him. Plaintiff was in no way bound for the payment of this debt, and Clark had no authority to sign his name to the bill of sale. When the trover suit was filed, neither the plaintiff, nor the firm of which he had been a member, was indebted to Coker in any sum whatever. The trover suit was filed, and plaintiff was arrested under the bail process for the sole purpose of forcing plaintiff to pay Coker money which he did not owe him, and which Coker knew plaintiff did not owe him. Plaintiff and Clark Bros. filed a petition asking to be released from imprisonment under the bail process, and this petition was granted by the judge of the superior court. Immediately after the release of plaintiff and his associates, Coker dismissed his bail-trover suit, which had been carried on, maliciously and without probable cause, for the sole purpose of collecting from plaintiff money which Coker knew he did not owe. Plaintiff was greatly embarrassed and humiliated by the arrest, which caused many of his friends and acquaintances to lose confidence in him and look down on him. The petition prays for the recovery of both actual and punitive damages. By amendment, plaintiff prayed that he might recover certain sums which he had expended as attorney's fees and otherwise in securing his release from imprisonment, and for time lost by reason of the alleged illegal imprisonment. The petition was dismissed on demurrer, and the plaintiff assigns error upon this ruling, and also upon the refusal of the court to allow an amendment to the petition.

1, 2. It is contended that, although the petition is not divided into counts, it sets forth, as against a general demurrer, three causes of action—for malicious arrest, malicious use of process, and false imprisonment. Taking into consideration the fact that the petition was in one count, and treating the allegations as a whole, it seems to us that the purpose of the pleader was to set forth one cause of action; that is, for the malicious use of bail process in a trover suit, which resulted in the arrest and imprisonment of the plaintiff. Strictly speaking, the term "malicious prosecution" is applicable only to the carrying on of a criminal case. In this sense only is it used in our Code. Civ. Code 1895, § 3843. When damages are sought for the malicious carrying on of a civil suit, the cause of action is not for malicious prosecution, but for the malicious use of process. See Newell on Mal. Pros. § 7. However, the essential elements in a cause of action for the malicious prosecution of a criminal case and the malicious use of process in a civil suit are the same. Id. § 8; Wilcox v. McKenzie, 75 Ga. 73; Georgia Loan Co. v. Johnston, 116 Ga. 630, 43 S. E. 27. See, also, in this connection, Mitchell v. Railroad, 75 Ga. 398 (3). In the text-books and encyclopædias, and in the opinions of the judges, including our own, it is frequently said that an action for malicious prosecution will lie for the malicious carrying on, without probable cause, of a civil suit. But accurately speaking, and especially under our Code, there can be no such thing as an action for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit, but the action is for the malicious use of legal process. When the averments as to the arrest and imprisonment are read in connection with the other allegations of the petition, it becomes apparent that it was not the purpose of the pleader to set forth three distinct causes of action, but simply one for the malicious use of process, and the averments as to the arrest and imprisonment were made simply for the purpose of making complete the cause of action for the malicious use of process. As against a general demurrer, the petition set forth a cause of action, and the court erred in sustaining the demurrer of that character.

3, 4. The court also sustained a special demurrer which was filed to certain paragraphs of the petition. Two of the grounds of this demurrer raised the point that, as it appeared from the allegations of the petition that the plaintiff was not actually imprisoned in the county jail, the averments as to the imprisonment were not sufficient. The averments of the petition were clear and distinct, that the plaintiff was arrested and restrained of his liberty, and was in the actual custody of the sheriff, for two hours, and that for six days the sheriff refused to allow him to leave town. These allegations were sufficient to show that the plaintiff was restrained of his liberty, and it was not necessary to show that he was actually incarcerated in the county jail.

The paragraph of the petition which prayed for punitive damages was demurred to specially. Punitive damages may be recovered in any action sounding in tort where the tortious acts were wantonly or maliciously committed. See Southern Railway Co. v. O'Bryan (Ga.) 45 S. E. 1000, and citations.

The other grounds of the demurrer relate to matters which were either explanatory of the cause of action set out, or were set forth merely as matter of aggravation. There was no merit in any of the grounds of the demurrer, and it was error to sustain them.

5. The only remaining question is whether the court erred in refusing to allow the amendment. As the allegations of the amendment simply amplified the averments of the original petition relating to the cause of action for the malicious use of the bail process, it was error to refuse to allow it.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

JUDGMENT—ARREST—TRIAL BY COURT—DEFECTS IN PLEADINGS.

1. "A judgment cannot be arrested or set aside for any defect in the pleadings or record that is aided by verdict or amendable as matter of form." Civ. Code 1895, § 5365. And it necessarily follows that where a judge of a city court is empowered, in the absence of a demand for a trial by jury, to try a case upon all issues of law and fact involved, a judgment rendered by him without the intervention of a jury is to be regarded as having all the force and effect of a verdict, in so far as amendable defects in the pleadings are concerned.

Error from City Court of Floyd County; John H. Reece, Judge.

M. B. Eubanks, for plaintiff in error. Lipscomb & Willingham, for defendant in error.

TURNER, J. Lizzie M. Bray instituted in the city court of Floyd county a suit against Seab P. Davis, alleging that the defendant was indebted to her in the sum of \$750, besides interest, etc. She further alleged that this indebtedness was due upon a certain promissory note assigned to her by the Security Investment Company, to the order of which investment company it was originally payable, which note was dated the 1st day of September, 1900, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, as per interest notes attached. It was further averred that the principal amount of the note became payable by the terms of the note on or before September 1, 1905; but the same paragraph of the petition claimed that "said indebtedness is also due for the taxes which said Davis suffered to become delinquent, now represented by fi. fas." A statement of the amount of these taxes was also set forth, and petitioner alleged that she had taken up these fi. fas. A copy of the note was attached as a part of the petition and of the cause of action. In a subsequent paragraph of the petition the plaintiff averred that, "by the terms of the said principal note, time was of the essence of the contract; it being stipulated that, in the case of any default in the payment of taxes assessed against said property before same became delinquent, then the said principal debt, in the discretion of the holder, should become due and payable at the date of such default, regardless of the date of maturity." The plaintiff further showed in her petition that the defendant had broken said contract, in this: that the taxes as set forth in a preceding paragraph were not paid, "by reason whereof the principal debt became due and payable under the contract, and the said Davis became liable to pay your petitioner the aforesaid sums of money, according to the tenor and effect of said notes." It is also to be noted that in another paragraph of the petition the plaintiff alleged that, "to secure the payment of said note, said Seab P. Davis, at the time of making the same, also made and delivered to said the Security Investment Company and assigns a deed to" certain lands described, "which deed was made in conformity to section 1969 of the 1882 Code of Georgia (2771 of the 1895 Code of Georgia)." The note referred to in the petition was made an exhibit, but the deed just recited was not made an exhibit. At the December term of the court the following judgment was entered up: "There being no issuable defense filed on oath in this case, judgment is rendered by the court for plaintiff, Lizzie M. Bray, against deft., Seab P. Davis, for seven hundred and fifty dollars principal, and eleven and $\frac{5}{100}$ dollars interest to date, and future interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum; and the further sum of \$9.50 dollars cost." At the same term of the court the defendant filed a motion to arrest the judgment, upon the following grounds (in addition to one which was, on the argument before this court, abandoned by his counsel): (1) "Because it appears that said petition does not set out any cause of action against defendant upon which a legal judgment could be predicated against defendant, it appearing that said suit was brought upon a note before the same became due, and no conditions being shown that would authorize suit on the note before due." (2) "Because it appears from inspection of the note sued on that there is no condition in said note making the same fall due on default as to taxes; and, failure to pay interest not being alleged, no right of action exists in favor of plaintiff until said note became due, to wit, September 1, 1906. And construing plaintiff's petition as a whole, and admitting everything that appears as true in the record, plaintiff had no right of action on the note sued on at the time of bringing of said suit." (3) "Because said suit being brought upon said note long before the same became due, and plaintiff relying on conditions not contained in the note sued on, and relying upon conditions varying the terms of the note sued on, and plaintiff further suing for \$67.71 and interest not embraced in said note, said suit was not a suit on an unconditional contract in writing, within the meaning of the law, and no judgment could be legally rendered by the court without first having the verdict of a jury." On hearing the motion in arrest of judgment, it was overruled by the city court, and the defendant excepted. The bill of exceptions specifies, as material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of the original suit, petition and process against the defendant, with the exhibits thereto, the entries thereon, and the judgment of the court entered thereon; also the two tax f. fas. and the deed made by Davis to plaintiff which were before the court when the judgment was rendered; and also the original motion in arrest of judgment, with all entries thereon, and the judgment overruling the same. Subsequently the plaintiff below (the defendant in error) caused the judge of the city court to direct that there also be sent up, as a part of the record, the answer of the plaintiff below to the motion in arrest of judgment.

It is unnecessary to state here the general rule that a motion in arrest of judgment is to be tried by the record of the case to which it relates. Taking up the grounds of the motion in arrest in their inverse order, it may be admitted that the note sued upon, on its face, matured after the suit was brought, and that the pleader seemed to rely upon the fact that the taxes against the property were in default, as a contingency on the happening of which the note had matured when such default occurred, and before the bringing of the suit. Assuming that this contention was correct, it may also be conceded that this state of things operated to bring the case within those decisions of this court to the effect that such a suit is not one upon an unconditional contract in writing. In such cases, if in the superior court, or in those city courts which are governed by the rules of practice which obtain in the superior court, judgment cannot be rendered by the judge without the verdict of a jury, even though no issuable defense be filed. But in the ninth section of the act establishing the city court of Floyd county it is provided that "the trial of all issues of fact in said court shall be by the court, without a jury, except where either party in a civil case, or the defendant in a criminal case, shall, in writing, demand a trial by jury." Acts 1882-83, p. 538. This section further provides that a "failure to file such a demand at or before the beginning of the trial shall be a waiver of said right" of a trial by jury. In the present case the record does not show that such a demand was filed, or, indeed, that there was any appearance at all by the defendant. It may be that the form of judgment which the city court of Floyd county may render in a contested case is of no consequence, though it is possible that in such a case a different form of judgment may there obtain. The recital in the judgment rendered in this case that there was no issuable defense filed on oath may have been inserted merely to distinguish it from those cases in which a trial is had on regular issues. But even if it be assumed that this recital was an effort to conform in some way to the form of judgments in the superior court, it ought not, in view of the act creating this city court, to be taken to imply that the suit was upon an unconditional contract in writing, because that court, as we have seen, has the power to render a judgment without a jury even in a suit on a contract which is not unconditional, if, as in this case, no demand for a jury trial is made. We therefore hold that this judgment is not void on its face, either because it was rendered by the court without a jury in a suit on a contract which was not unconditional, or because the judgment contains a recital provided for by the rules of the superior court in certain cases.

The other two grounds of the motion in arrest involve very serious questions of practice, and the conclusion reached is not altogether free from difficulty. The petition rather inaptly avers that the note became due because of the nonpayment of taxes. And it is also true, as claimed in the motion to arrest the judgment, that the copy of the note to which reference is made in another paragraph of the petition, as showing that nonpayment of taxes operated to make it fall due, contains no such stipulation. But the petition also refers to a deed which was given by the defendant to secure the payment of the note. As this latter allegation was made a part of the case, it may, perhaps, be taken for granted that the court had that deed before it. Certainly the petition could have been amended by the insertion and exhibition of that deed in full. May it not very well be presumed that, if such deed had been made a part of the pleadings by amendment, the petition would then have shown that the deed contained a clause which provided that the debt should mature and become payable whenever any taxes assessed against the property were allowed by the defendant to become in default? Certainly some presumptions ought to arise in favor of the proper exercise of its powers by a court of competent jurisdiction, when it appears that the defendant has been duly served, as in this case, and might have had his day in court. Let it also be borne in mind that Civ. Code 1895, § 5365, provides that a judgment cannot be arrested or set aside for any defect in the pleadings or record that is aided by verdict or amendable as matter of form. For an application of this rule, see Artope v. Barker, 74 Ga. 462; Moss v. Stokeley, 95 Ga. 675, 22 S. E. 692. In the particular matter now under discussion, perhaps as much favor ought to be given to the judgment of the court as to a verdict of the jury.

By the new practice act (Civ. Code 1895, § 4901) it is required that petitions shall set forth a cause of action in orderly and distinct paragraphs, and any averment distinctly and plainly made which is not denied by the defendant's answer shall be taken as prima facie true, unless the defendant states in his answer that he can neither admit nor deny such averment, etc. However incorrectly or awkwardly the allegation was made in this petition as to the note maturing on the nonpayment of taxes, still the issue was made. In the case of W. U. Tel. Co. v. Lark, 95 Ga. 806, 23 S. E. 118 (3), this language is used: "No issuable defense having been filed, it was, under the provisions of this act, proper for the court to treat as true, without proof, every essential averment of fact distinctly and plainly made in the plaintiff's petition; and, this being so, the plaintiff's right to recover was established." There are many other decisions of this court to the same effect. On the whole, if we are right in assuming that the petition was amendable so as to set out the deed specified in the petition and hereinbefore referred to, and if the practice act is applicable, as we think, and if there is any presumption that the court below properly and fairly did his duty in this matter, it follows that the motion in arrest of judgment was rightly overruled.

WALKER et ux. v. HILLYER.

CERTIORARI BOND—CERTIFICATE OF MAGISTRATE—NEW TRIAL.

1. The words "Approved by," signed in his official capacity by the magistrate of the court in which the case was originally tried, were indorsed on a certiorari bond; and the magistrate certified that the plaintiff in certiorari had "paid all costs in the case (amounting to $6.75), the subject-matter of the * * * petition [for certiorari], and [had] given bond and security as required by law." Held, that there was a sufficient compliance with the statute requiring in such cases the approval and acceptance of the bond, and the giving of the certificate of the payment of all costs that have accrued.

2. The record clearly shows that the verdict in the justice's court was not demanded under the law and the evidence. Consequently this court will not interfere with the first grant of a new trial by the superior court. Shirley v. Swafford (decided Nov. 16, 1903) 45 S. E. 722.

ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY—NOTICE—DISMISSAL OF CERTIORARI—NEW TRIAL.

1. An assignment of error that the court erred in not dismissing a certiorari "upon the ground that the affidavit for certiorari was not in compliance with the statute for same, and was not sufficient," is without merit, when the record fails to disclose wherein the affidavit was claimed to be defective.

2. Where the record shows a writing signed by the plaintiff, and directed to the defendant in certiorari, purporting to give the latter due notice of the sanction of the writ and the time and place of hearing, and the bill of exception recites that the attorney for the defendant waived the necessity of an affidavit as to the service of such written notice, it was not erroneous to overrule a motion to dismiss the certiorari upon the ground that 10 days' written notice of the sanction of the writ and the time and place of hearing had not been given.

3. As it clearly appears from the record that the verdict in the justice's court was not demanded under the law and the evidence, this court will not interfere with the first grant of a new trial. Walker v. Hillyer (this day decided) ubi supra.

AIKIN v. PERRY.

LANDLORD—FAILURE TO REPAIR—LIABILITIES—NOTICE—DAMAGES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. A person upon whom a wrong has been committed is under a duty to use ordinary care and diligence to lighten the consequential damages resulting therefrom. Civ. Code 1895, § 3802; Georgia Railroad Co. v. Eskew, 12 S. E. 1061, 86 Ga. 641 (5, 6), 22 Am. St. Rep. 490; Nicholas v. Tanner, 43 S. E. 489, 117 Ga. 223.

2. In this state a landlord is bound to keep the rented premises in repair, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary; but the tenant cannot recover for any damages resulting from a failure to repair which he could by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided.

3. In the absence of an agreement so to do, the landlord is not bound to repair patent defects in a building of the existence of which the tenant knew at the time the rent contract was entered into. Driver v. Maxwell, 56 Ga. 11 (2); White v. Montgomery, 58 Ga. 204 (1).

4. In the trial of an action against a landlord for damages alleged to have resulted from his failure to repair, when the landlord admits that he had notice of the defects, it is not prejudicial to the tenant to reject evidence tending to show that the landlord had such notice.

5. The law making it the duty of a landlord to keep rented premises in repair, evidence that he did or did not enter into a contract with a third person to make repairs can throw no light on the question of liability.

6. In the trial of an action for damages for a failure to repair against a landlord by a tenant who had been in possession of the premises under a former landlord, the burden is upon the tenant to show that he sustained damage after the contract with the second landlord was entered into, and the amount of such damage.

7. The evidence authorized the verdict, and there was no abuse of discretion in refusing a new trial.

EJECTMENT—NONSUIT—EVIDENCE—TITLE OF GRANTOR—DESTRUCTION OF DEED—REVESTING TITLE.

1. Where the plaintiff's lessor introduces a deed to himself, and supports it with testimony which the jury might construe as evidence of adverse possession for seven years, it is not error to refuse a nonsuit.

(a) And when the evidence subsequently introduced by the defendant shows that both parties claim under a common grantor, the refusal of the nonsuit will not be overruled. Civ. Code 1895, § 5004; Hanson v. Crawley, 51 Ga. 529; Werner v. Footman, 54 Ga. 128.

2. J. M. Scarborough purchased land, giving his promissory note for the purchase money, and taking from the vendor a bond for titles. Scarborough subsequently sent to the vendor the purchase money, and requested that a deed to the land be made to him. About 10 days after the money was paid by J. M. Scarborough and the deed made to him, the latter sent the deed back to the vendor, requesting that the deed be destroyed, and that a deed conveying the same land to his brother, J. H. Scarborough, be made. J. H. Scarborough had notice of the former deed. Held, that the destruction of the former deed did not revest the title in the vendor, and he had no title that he could convey to J. H. Scarborough. Held, further, that the direction of a verdict in favor of the lessor, J. H. Scarborough, was error.

3. The other assignments of error in the bill of exceptions are not considered, because the grounds of such exceptions may not recur on the next trial.

1. Where a married woman applied for a homestead out of her husband's property, under Civ. Code, § 2866, and the application or schedule does not affirmatively show that the husband has refused to make the application, the homestead so recorded is void (Hirsch v. Stinson, 37 S. 2. An order of a judge of the superior court authorizing the sale of such property as a homestead is likewise inadmissible for the same reason.

3. Where such land is sold, and other land bought in an adjoining county, and the deed taken in the name of the wife, who subsequently borrows money and gives a mortgage on the land so purchased, and such land is sold under foreclosure proceedings, and bought by a purchaser without notice of the alleged homestead or the rights of the husband, the purchaser remaining in possession for 11 years, the children of the husband and wife cannot recover this land either as beneficiaries of the homestead or as heirs at law of their father.

BANK OF WRIGHTSVILLE v. MERCHANTS' & FARMERS' BANK OF MILLEDGEVILLE

PAYMENT—PLEADING—ACTION AGAINST GUARANTOR—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In a suit against a guarantor, no formal plea of payment is necessary to warrant the admission of testimony tending to establish that the liability does not exist inasmuch as the principal debtor has paid the debt guarantied. This is particularly true where the petition alleges that the principal has not paid the debt and the answer denies this allegation.

2. Where the plaintiff contends that the guarantor has not paid a draft covered by the terms of the guaranty, and the defendant insists that such draft was withdrawn, and the amount thereof included in another draft for a larger sum, which was paid by a particular check, which was itself paid, the case does not involve the doctrine of the application of payments under Civ. Code, § 3722, and there was no error hurtful to the plaintiff in the charge on this subject.

3. Even if the charge as to the elements to be considered by the jury in determining the weight to be given evidence was incorrect, it nowhere appears that it was harmful to the plaintiff, for under the record it may have been helpful to him and harmful to the opposite party.

4. There were no errors of law, and the verdict was sustained by the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Baldwin County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Wrightsville against the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank of Milledgeville. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The Bank of Wrightsville sued the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank of Milledgeville on a contract growing out of what the plaintiff designated as a guaranty or letter of credit, by which it contended that the defendant had guarantied the payment of drafts for the purchase of cotton, drawn by Beck, a cotton buyer, on his principal, Smith, if accompanied by bills of lading, and sent to the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank for collection. The plaintiff insisted that drafts were so drawn, presented, and collected, and the proceeds properly remitted for several months by the defendant; that on January 8, 1901, Beck drew seven drafts, aggregating $11,475—one being for $1,446.48—with bills of lading attached to each; that plaintiff advanced the money thereon, and forwarded them to the Citizens' Bank of Savannah, which apparently gave credit therefor. The drafts were sent by it to the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, and by it presented to Smith for payment, but, he being sick, payment was not made, and they were protested on January 12th, and returned. On January 17th the Citizens' Bank sent the drafts to the Bank of Wrightsville, but before doing so detached the bills of lading, awaiting instructions from the bank of Wrightsville. The bills of lading were still held by the Citizens' Bank for the total amount of the former drafts, "except thirty-one bales." The brief of evidence is indefinite, but it seems that new drafts were drawn on the National Bank, to which were attached the bills of lading. Whether this included the one for 31 bales does not appear. There was also evidence of correspondence in August, 1901, in which Smith acknowledged Cook's statement of account, and accepted it as a settlement of the old matter, although he did not think himself liable in agreeing to pay $25 cash each week, and would give his note for $900, due November 1st. Cook testified that "bills of lading for about 250 bales of cotton were attached to the seven drafts aggregating $11,745. These drafts were not paid. Afterwards Smith sent us about $10,000 on these drafts. He owes a balance of something over $1,500. I do not know the exact amount." Smith testified for the defendant: "The drafts were presented to me the 12th of January. We cannot handle fractional lots. I did not know those drafts had been protested until I got my mail on the morning of the 14th, when I sent my personal check to the Bank of Wrightsville to take up these bills of lading. The check was on Savannah. These are invoices from Beck, giving me the gradings and weights of cotton. Attached to each is a check on the National Bank of Savannah, to cover these identical drafts, dollar for dollar. One of these invoices seems to be marked thirty-one bales. I sent that back to Beck, requesting him to add nineteen bales. He did so, and, after having added the nineteen bales, the invoice amounted to $2,306, instead of $1,446.48, as originally drawn, representing thirty-one bales. I did not pay that draft with any draft on Savannah. My personal checks amounted to over $10,000, which left a balance due of $1,446.48, and when I got my buyer to fill out his number of bales that raised this balance of $1,446.48 to $2,306, and that was paid on January 18th, by me, to the Merchants' Bank in Milledgeville. At the time I drew those drafts there was no indebtedness against me in the Wrightsville Bank. On the 18th of January, when I paid the Bank of Wrightsville the draft of $2,306, I did not think I owed them a cent. I gave no directions as to how that $2,306 should be applied, because when you buy a bill of lading you buy the draft." The plaintiff, in rebuttal, offered evidence through Cook: "This draft covers fifty bales of cotton, and was drawn by Smith's agent, Beck, and was applied to his general account. After we had given him credit for this amount, he still owed us fifteen hundred and odd dollars. At that time he owed $2,306, and fifteen hundred and odd dollars besides." Smith, recalled, testified: "On the 18th of January, when I paid this last draft, I did not owe the Bank of Wrightsville a cent, so far as I know. These letters of mine with reference to the thousand dollar compromise relate to a subsequent account in which Mr. Beck and I were mixed up. That happened in March and April. It had nothing whatever to do with these seven drafts sued upon." One of the drafts drawn by Beck on Smith was for $1,446.48, to which was attached a bill of lading for 31 bales of cotton. As it is customary in the cotton export business only to attach bills of lading for 50 bales, or multiples of 50, the defendant contended that on the return of the drafts which had not been paid on account of Smith's illness Beck was requested to buy 19 extra bales, attach a new bill of lading for 50 bales, and draw therefor; that he did this; that Smith paid the draft—$2,306.16—which included and was intended as a substitute for the original draft of $1,446; and that the Wrightsville Bank knew that Smith intended this to be a payment of whatever liability originally existed on the $1,446 draft. The plaintiff insisted that the payments received were on account of an additional indebtedness due to it by Smith, and that the money received from Smith had been appropriated to the payment of such additional indebtedness. When the evidence of payment was offered, the plaintiff objected on the ground that it was inadmissible under the pleadings, there being no plea of payment filed. The objection was overruled, and a motion for a new trial was made upon that and other grounds.

LAMAR, J. If the defendant had offered evidence to show that it had paid the amount due by it under the guaranty, it would have been inadmissible, there being no plea of payment filed. But such was not the case. The evidence was offered to contradict a material contention of the plaintiff that "said Smith has failed and refused, and continues to fail and refuse, payment of said balance due." It was not evidence in support of a plea of confession of original liability and avoidance because of subsequent payment, but went to establish the defendant's contention that it was not liable as guarantor because of the fact that the principal, Smith, had settled the debt. The answer distinctly raises the issue, and the evidence in support thereof was relevant and admissible.

The charge of the court in reference to the duty of the plaintiff to apply the $2,306 was not such as to require a new trial. This was not a case in which the ordinary doctrine of the application of payments controlled. The defendant insisted that the $2,306 draft, with the bill of lading for 50 bales of cotton, was intended and understood by all the parties to include the amount formerly due on the $1,446 draft with the bill of lading for 31 bales of cotton. And hence, though probably inaccurate, it was not reversible error to charge that: "If you believe that the draft of $2,306 covered the amount of a draft for $1,446, and the Bank of Wrightsville knew that this draft covered this amount, or was intended by Smith to cover this amount, or ought to have known it by the exercise of ordinary diligence, and if Smith finally paid that draft, then I charge you that the Bank of Wrightsville could not have applied the payment of $2,306 to any general account Smith might have been due to the Bank of Wrightsville, and the Merchants' Bank would not be bound by any such application of payment, if such was made." The charge must be construed in the light of the whole case, and in view of the fact that this is a suit, not against Smith, but against the guarantor. The $2,306 was the proceeds of a draft for that sum, and had to be applied to the debt represented by the draft. If the $1,446 was included therein, then by operation of law it also was satisfied and discharged, so far as the guarantor was concerned, regardless of any actual or attempted application of the proceeds to any balance on open account or otherwise. Beck's certificate of the amount of Smith's indebtedness to the Bank of Wrightsville was secondary evidence, not binding on the Merchants' Bank. Beck was not the agent of the defendant, which had the right to cross-examine him.

It is not made to appear by the record how the plaintiff was injured by the charge of the court instructing the jury that they might consider the intelligence of the witnesses in weighing the testimony. For aught that appears, it may have been helpful to the plaintiff and hurtful to the defendant. At any rate, the plaintiff fails to show that the charge, if erroneous, was harmful.

The evidence for the plaintiff was indefinite, even as to the amount it claimed to be due, dealing in round numbers, and saying that the balance was about fifteen hundred and odd dollars. The guarantor was not liable for any indebtedness on account, but only for drafts with bills of lading attached. But passing that point, and irrespective of the defendant's contention that the verdict was demanded by the evidence because of plaintiff's failure to prove that it had sued Smith to insolvency, we find no error in the rulings or charge of the court.

The evidence for the defendant was amply sufficient to warrant the verdict, and the judgment is affirmed. All the Justices concur.

GIFT OF LAND—POSSESSION BY DONEE—CONVEYANCE BY DONOR—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS.

1. Where a father in possession of land under a bond for titles, a part of the purchase money being paid, makes a parol gift of the land to a son, and the latter goes into possession, and, on the faith of the gift, makes valuable improvements on the land, and subsequently the father acquires the legal title by a conveyance from the maker of the bond for titles, the title thus acquired by the father passes, by the statute of uses, into the son, and inures to his benefit, in preference to one to whom the father conveyed after he had acquired the legal title.

2. Under such a state of facts, when the son has been ousted from the possession he is entitled to maintain an equitable petition for specific performance by the father, and to have the deeds made by the father canceled, after proving that the purchasers bought with notice of the son's equity, as evidenced by his possession.

Action by W. T. Smedley against W. M. Hadaway and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Payne & Tye, Longley & Longley, and J. A. Noyes, for plaintiffs in error. T. A. Atkinson and D. J. Gaffney, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. The record discloses that in February, 1883, J. M. Smedley purchased a certain tract of land from Houston for $2,050. He was unable to pay the whole of the purchase money, and made an arrangement with Ferrell whereby the latter was to advance about $770, the balance, and the deed from Houston was to be made to Ferrell. Ferrell, under the same arrangement, made Smedley a bond for titles. Immediately after this arrangement was made, J. M. Smedley made a parol gift of a part of the land to his son W. T. Smedley. The son, acting on the faith of this gift, went into possession in the same year, and made valuable improvements on the land; erecting tenant houses, barns, and stables. Through the years 1884, 1885, and 1886 the son resided upon the land, exercising acts of control and ownership. On February 24, 1886, the father having paid Ferrell the balance of the purchase money on the land, Ferrell made him a deed in accordance with the bond for titles. Owing large sums of money to other persons, the father applied to Ferrell and Longley for a loan and agreed to make them a deed to all of his lands, consisting of more than 1,200 acres, as security. Ferrell and Longley went upon the land, examined it, and concluded to make the loan. They did so, and on February 25, 1886, the day after Smedley had received the title from Ferrell, Smedley secured the loan of about $7,000 by making Ferrell and Longley a deed to all of his lands, including that which he had given to his son. Later in the same year Longley sold his interest in the land to Ferrell, and conveyed this interest by deed. Smedley, being unable to pay Ferrell, commenced negotiations with the Equitable Mortgage Company for a loan which would enable him to pay Ferrell. In his application to the mortgage company he stated under oath that the land which he proposed to convey to it had been in his possession and the possession of those under whom he claimed for more than 35 years, and that his title had never been in dispute. Freeman represented the mortgage company in investigating the titles and the value of the land. After about two months, during which he went upon the land and examined it, Freeman recommended that the loan be made, and in February, 1889, the negotiations were concluded; the company advancing the money to Smedley, and taking a security deed from him, dated February 14, 1889. Ferrell reconveyed to Smedley by a deed dated February 18th of the same year. The evidence tends to show that, while these deeds were of different dates, they were delivered simultaneously and as part of one transaction. In August, 1896, the Equitable Mortgage Company conveyed the land to the Equitable Securities Company, and the latter, on November 1, 1899, conveyed to Hadaway the premises now in dispute; being a part of the plantation conveyed by Smedley to the mortgage company. From 1883, shortly after the parol gift from the father to the son, the latter remained in actual, open, and notorious possession of the land until the purchase by Hadaway; and Hadaway purchased with full knowledge of the possession of the son. Hadaway and the son having conflicting claims, the son gave up the premises to Hadaway, and brought his equitable petition against his father for specific performance of the parol contract, and for decree that the father is to make him a deed in accordance with the gift, and also against the Equitable Securities Company and Hadaway to cancel the deeds held by them as clouds upon his title. In his petition he stated, in substance, the facts recited above. The defendants denied generally the allegations in the petition, and claimed that the Equitable Securities Company and Hadaway were innocent purchasers for value, without notice of the gift from the father to the son, and that the father had no right to make the gift while he held under bond for titles, without the legal title. On the trial of the case the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff—that the father should make title to the land, and the deeds to the other defendants be canceled. Decree was entered in accordance with the verdict. The defendants moved for a new trial. Their motion was overruled, and they excepted.

1. Several of the grounds of the motion for new trial make complaint of charges of the court and refusals to charge. The principles of the charges of which complaint is made are contained in the headnotes. The judge charged these principles, and refused to charge to the contrary. He charged, in substance, that the father, holding the land under bond for titles, with only a part of the purchase money paid, might make a parol gift to the son, and that, if the father subsequently acquired the legal title, it would inure to the benefit of the son. He also charged that, if the son was in possession of the land at the time the father conveyed it to other persons, this possession, if open and notorious and in his own right, was notice to the world of any claim or right the son had in the land. We think the first proposition is well established by the decisions of this and other courts. When a person is in possession of land, having an equity therein, but not the title, and he sells to another, if he subsequently acquires the title it immediately passes, by the statute of uses, into the vendee. It does not stop in the vendor, but passes through him into his vendee, and this is true although the seller may afterward sell and convey to another and different person. This other person would get no title, because his vendor had none to convey; the statute of uses having taken it from him as soon as he acquired it, and put it in the person to whom he had first sold. The same doctrine, in our opinion, applies when a father holding land under a bond for titles, with part of the purchase money paid, transfers it to his son by parol gift, and the son, on the faith of the gift, enters upon the land and makes valuable improvements. The father, holding under bond for titles, with part of the purchase money paid, has an equitable interest in the land. As between the father and son, the gift is complete as soon as the son enters and improves, and the father has then no right to revoke the gift or to sell the land to another. In the case of Henderson v. Hackney, 23 Ga. 383, 68 Am. Dec. 529, it appeared that one Nicks drew a lot of land. Before the grant issued to him, and before he paid the grant fee, he sold and transferred his equity to one Henderson. Nicks afterwards paid the grant fee, and the grant issued to him. He thereupon sold the land to Holcombe, under whom Hackney claimed. This court held, as stated in the second headnote, that "after the draw, and before the grant, the equitable title is in the drawer, and the legal title is in the state for the use of the drawer on his payment of the grant fee. This equitable title is transferable. When transferred, the legal title in the state becomes a legal title for the use of the transferee on the payment of the grant fee. Consequently, on the issuing of the grant to the drawer, the legal title passes through him, without stop into the transferee, by virtue of the statute of uses." This case was cited and approved in Walker v. Wells, 25 Ga. 143, 71 Am. Dec. 164. See, also, the reasoning in Dudley's Lessee v. Bradshaw, 29 Ga. 17; Thursby v. Myers, 57 Ga. 156 (5). In the case of Parker v. Jones, 57 Ga. 205, Jackson, J., in discussing this same question, said: "If a vendor convey land to a purchaser before he acquire title himself, and he subsequently acquire the title, does such title inure to the benefit of the vendee, as against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees? We think it does, and such subsequent mortgagee and those holding under him by subsequent conveyances hold subordinate to the title which vested in the first vendee the moment the vendor himself got it." See, also, Pridgen v. Green, 80 Ga. 738, 7 S. E. 97. Under these decisions, we hold that Smedley, the father, having paid the larger part of the purchase money, and being in possession of the land under bond for titles, had an equity in the land; that this equity was transferable; and that, the father having given a part of the land to his son, and the latter having, on faith of the gift, taken possession of the land and made thereon valuable improvements, when the father acquired the legal title it inured to the son, and was good as against the father, and against those who subsequently purchased from the father with notice of the son's interest.

2. Complaint is also made in the motion for new trial that the judge erred in charging that "possession of land is notice of whatever right or title the occupant has, to anybody. Well, if * * * at the time Messrs. Ferrell and Longley took a deed from Smedley to this property, this plaintiff was in possession of it—actual possession of it, so it could be seen by any one that he was in possession of it, controlling it, managing it, and in possession of it—then I charge you that fact is equivalent to notice, and they would have got no title from Smedley that would be good as against the title of the plaintiff in this case." This charge seems to have been based upon the Code of 1895, § 3931. If it had been a new principle announced for the first time in that Code, it might not have applied to some of the transactions in this case, but it is not a new principle, and has always been the law in this state, as will be seen by reference to the opinion of Bleckley, C. J., in Broome v. Davis, 87 Ga. 587, 13 S. E. 749, from which this section of the Code was taken. That case has been uniformly followed since by all the cases which discuss this question. The principal complaint of the court's charge was, however, that it did not apply to the facts of this case; that there was no evidence showing that the purchasers from the father had actual notice of the son's equity, or that the son had such possession and for such length of time as to put them upon inquiry. The record discloses that the son took possession of the land shortly after the parol gift, in 1883; that he erected houses and barns upon the place, and resided there most of the time. He cultivated the place by himself and tenants. It is true that, between the time of finishing the cultivation of the crops until the time to commence gathering them, he, being a single man, lived at the home of his father, which was upon another and separate tract of land. For the most of the year he resided upon the place, and exercised acts of ownership and control. The purchasers, in examining the land (and the record shows that Ferrell and Longley examined the land before advancing money upon it), seeing the evidences of the son's possession, should have inquired of the son or of his tenants whether they claimed the land under the father, or in some other right. Had they made such inquiry, particularly of the son, they would probably have learned of the son's claims to the premises. Had the son told them that he had no interest in the premises, then, of course, he would have been estopped, as against them, if he had knowledge or notice of their purpose in making the inquiry. We think it is the duty of a purchaser of land, when he examines the premises and finds them in possession of others than the holder of the legal title, to make inquiry as to the right or interest of the occupants. If the tract he wishes to purchase includes a portion not contiguous to the main tract, and he finds such separated portion in possession of others than the person with whom he is dealing, he should investigate and ascertain upon what right or claim such possession is based. The evidence in this case discloses that the 100 acres of land now in dispute did not originally belong to the plantation of the elder Smedley, and it is separated therefrom by intervening lands of other persons. When Ferrell and Longley went over the place to see whether they should advance money upon it, and they found this 100 acres, separate from the home of the father, in the possession of the son, they should have inquired into the interest or claim of the son. The same rule applies to the purchase of the Equitable Mortgage Company. Its agent took two months to examine the property and the titles. The possession of the son, with his tenants and houses and barns, should at least have put the agent upon inquiry as to the right of the son to occupy and control the place.

But it is argued that Ferrell conveyed the land to the father on February 24, 1886, and the father made a conveyance, including this same land, to Ferrell and Longley, on February 25, 1886, and that therefore there was but one day intervening, which was not sufficient to put Ferrell and Longley upon notice of the son's rights; that the purchasers should have had reasonable time within which to make their investigation. If one purchases land from another, or takes it as security for a loan, when he knows or ought to know that still another is in possession of it, the doctrine of reasonable time does not apply. The possession is enough to put him upon notice, and he should make inquiry before he purchases or makes the loan. He need not make the purchase or loan until he is fully satisfied as to the title. If he acts within one day, and thus takes but a short time for pursuing his inquiries, he cannot afterward avoid the effect of the notice by claiming that he did not allow himself a reasonable time for investigation. Carr v. Hilton, 1 Curt. 390, Fed. Cas. No. 2,437, cited in 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 585, related to an entirely different state of facts, and is not applicable to a case like the present. The loan by the Equitable Mortgage Company was made after two months for investigation, and during all of this time the son continued in possession of the land. The doctrines applied to the loan by Ferrell and Longley apply with even greater force to the loan by the mortgage company. Freeman, its agent, went upon the land to examine it, and must have had notice as to the son's possession and occupancy. The Equitable Securities Company, the assignee and transferee of the Equitable Mortgage Company, had all the notice that can be given by long-continued possession of land, for it bought the property after the son had been in possession some 13 years.

It may be well to observe that the able and learned judge who tried this case in the court below charged the jury fully as to the principle announced in Achey v. Coleman, 92 Ga. 745, 19 S. E. 710, that where land is conveyed to a person who simultaneously conveys it to another as security for a loan, the two conveyances being parts of one transaction, the title passes through the borrower without being affected, as against the lender, by any claims which would have attached, had the title remained in the borrower. The jury found that the conveyance of Ferrell to the father and the conveyances of the latter to Ferrell and Longley were separate and independent transactions, and, there being evidence to support this finding, there was no error in refusing a new trial.

The motion for new trial also complained of a certain charge as being without evidence upon which to base it. This charge was more hurtful to the plaintiff than to the defendants. It was not of such character as to have affected the result, especially as it was cured by a statement made further on in the charge.

There was also a complaint that the judge failed to so restrict certain evidence that it should affect J. M. Smedley only, ruling it out as to the other defendants; but, under the note of the court to the motion, it is clear that the evidence was so restricted, and there was no error in the action of the judge with respect to this evidence.

BAUM CO.

EXECUTION—LEVY—CLAIM OF THIRD PARTY—VERDICT—NEW TRIAL.

1. Where a fl. fa. is levied upon a sawmill and fixtures, also 4,000 feet of boards or planks of given measurements, and also 126 sticks of pine timber in a named swamp, and at the trial of a claim interposed to all the judge charges the jury that there is no dispute that the 4,000 feet of lumber of described measurements is subject to the fl. fa., and the jury returns a verdict finding the sawmill and fixtures not subject, but that the lumber is subject, there is no finding as to the sticks of timber, and that part of the issue still remains to be tried.

2. When, in such case, the claimant makes a motion for a new trial, in which there is no complaint of the verdict for ambiguity, and it does not appear that any objection was made to the reception of the verdict, the judgment refusing a new trial must be affirmed, as the issue as to the sticks of timber was not passed upon by the jury, and the only other disputed issue was determined in favor of the plaintiff in error.

GLAZE v. MILLS.

INJURY TO EMPLOYE—INSTRUCTIONS—CON-TRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. The plaintiff in the court below alleged that her injuries were received "without any fault on her part." She sought to recover full damages, and did not request a charge upon the law of contributory negligence and apportionment of damages. It was accordingly not error requiring the grant of a new trial for the court to charge the jury that, if they believed that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the defendant's negligence, as alleged, she would be entitled to recover, "provided that the plain-tiff's negligence did not contribute to the injury." Pierce v. Atlanta Cotton Mills, 4 S. E. 381, 79 Ga. 782; Hill v. Callahan, 8 S. E. 730, 82 Ga. 109; Ingram v. Hilton & Dodge Lumber Co., 33 S. E. 961, 108 Ga. 197 (6). Especially is this true where it appears that elsewhere in his charge the judge correctly instructed the jury as to the degree of diligence required of one situated as the plaintiff claimed to have been at the time she was injured.

2. The other charges complained of were correct in the abstract, and, there being no complaint in the motion for a new trial that any of them were not adjusted to the facts of the case, no reason is pointed out why the giving of them affords cause for granting a new trial. Central Ry. Co. v. Goodson, 45 S. E. 680, 118 Ga. —; Binion v. Ga. So. & Fla. Ry. Co., 45 S. E. 276, 118 Ga. 282.

3. The evidence warranted a finding for the defendant, and it was not error to overrule the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, based on the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence.

Claim case by S. J. Winkles against William Johnson and others. Verdict for defendants. From an order granting a new trial, they bring error. Affirmed.

Griffith & Weatherly, for plaintiffs in error. W. R. Hutcheson, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. This was the first grant of a new trial in a claim case in which the property was found subject. The plaintiffs in execution insist that the verdict was demanded, because their evidence made a prima facie case, by showing possession in the defendant in execution since the judgment, and the uncontradicted evidence showed that, if the claimant had title at all, he acquired it after the levy. This may be conceded, but there was a direct conflict in the evidence as to whether the defendant had been in possession of the property since the judgment. A witness for the plaintiffs testified that he had, but there was evidence for the claimant authorizing a finding that he had not. The claimant testified that the mule levied on had never belonged to Neil, the defendant in execution, but was owned by one Riddlespurger. He then testified: "The day the mule was levied on, Will Riddlespurger was in Cedartown with the mule. The deputy sheriff did not see the mule the day it was levied on." And also that "Will Riddlespurger had the mule in his possession all the time from the time the mule was purchased until it was taken possession of by the bailiff, the officer from whom I got the mule." The purchase referred to took place before the levy of the execution involved in this case, and the possession by the bailiff was by virtue of the levy of another execution made after the levy to which the claim was filed. It thus appears that there was ample evidence to warrant a finding that the presumption of title in the plaintiffs in execution arising from evidence of possession in the defendant since the judgment had been rebutted. The jury would therefore have been authorized to find that the plaintiffs had failed to make out their case. The well-settled rule that the first grant of a new trial will not be interfered with, unless the verdict was demanded by the evidence, is applicable. It is not necessary to determine now what disposition should be made by the sheriff of the property in controversy in the event a verdict should be rendered finding the property not subject on a similar state of facts as that disclosed by the present record.

EQUITY LIFE ASS'N v. GAMMON.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES—ACTION—VENUE—RESIDENCE—AGENT APPOINTMENT BY INSURANCE COMMISSIONER—REMAND—AMENDMENT.

1. The venue of suits against foreign insurance companies maintaining an agency in this state is fixed by Civ. Code 1895, § 2145, in the county where such agency is located, or where the agency was located at the time the contract was made or the cause of action accrued.

2. Where the contract was made in this state, but the company maintained no agency here, the suit may be brought in any county where the company may be found.

3. A foreign insurance company which fails to maintain an agency does not, by appointing, or having the Commissioner of Insurance to appoint, an agent upon whom service may be perfected, under Civ. Code 1895, § 2057, acquire a fixed residence in the county of such agent's residence.

4. Where the contract was made in Carroll county, and a suit was there brought, and the agent, who resided in Floyd, acknowledged service, the court of Carroll county had jurisdiction to try the cause.

5. Where a foreign insurance company maintained no place of doing business, but appointed an agent, under Civ. Code 1895, § 2057, and such agent absented himself from the state, the Insurance Commissioner could appoint a successor, with authority to acknowledge and receive service of process in behalf of such company in all proceedings that might be instituted against it, on contracts here made, in any court in this state.

6. The power of the Commissioner to appoint successors to the agent originally named, and the authority of the latter to acknowledge and receive service, continues so long as there is any necessity to sue the company for breach of contracts made in this state.

7. A judgment overruling a demurrer having been reversed by the Supreme Court, the losing party gave notice to the trial judge of an intention to present an amendment to the petition. When the remittitur was presented, the court refused to make it the judgment of the lower court before a day named; stating that he had granted the losing party until that time within which to prepare and present the proposed amendment. It is not made to appear wherein the prevailing party was damaged, and this court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in such matters.

Error from City Court of Carrollton; W. O. Hodnett, Judge.

Action by M. A. Gammon against the Equity Life Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

For opinion on former appeal, see 44 S. E. 978.

Mrs. Gammon sued the Equity Life Association in Carroll county on a policy issued in said county on the life of her husband, alleging in the original petition that, while the defendant had been doing business in Georgia, it "now has no public place for doing business in this state, and has no person in office in this state upon whom service of process can be perfected"; that it had not appointed an agent to receive service of process, or upon whom process could be served; and that the Insurance Commissioner had appointed John C. Printup, of Floyd county, under the provisions of Civ. Code, 1895, §§ 2057, 2058. The Supreme Court having ruled that, the Commissioner having no authority to appoint an agent in the first instance, the service was nugatory, plaintiff's counsel gave notice of an intention to amend the petition before the remittitur was filed; and, when counsel for the successful company presented an order making the judgment of the Supreme Court the judgment of the city court of Carrollton, the judge declined, stating that he had notified counsel for Mrs. Gammon that he would allow him until a date named to file the amendment, to which counsel for the insurance company filed exceptions pendente lite. Later, and within the time fixed by the court's permission, plaintiff amended her petition by striking the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of the original petition, in which the failure to appoint an agent had been set out, and therein alleged that defendant transacted business in this state, but had no agency or public place of transacting its business, and now has no officer in this state upon whom service of process can be perfected; that when, in 1890, the company first sought to transact business in Georgia, it filed with the Insurance Commissioner a written power of attorney authorizing B. E. Proctor, of Chat-ham county, to acknowledge and receive service of process upon any proceedings that might be instituted against it in any court of this state, and that the authority of Proctor should continue until revoked, when another person might be appointed as such attorney; that subsequent to Proctor's appointment he absented himself from the state, whereupon the Insurance Commissioner appointed John C. Printup, of Floyd county, as his successor, as a person upon whom service of process might be made. This appointment was made prior to the filing of this suit. It appears from the record that process issued October 22, 1902, and that Printup, as attorney appointed by the Insurance Commissioner, acknowledged service and waived copy October 24, 1902. To the petition as amended the company demurred on the grounds that the declaration does not set out any facts authorizing any court of Carroll county to take jurisdiction, for that it sets out that the only agent of the defendant upon whom service can be perfected is a resident of Floyd county, and that the papers, on their face, show that Printup, in violation of the authority vested in him, acknowledged service.

R. D. Jackson, S. E. Grow, and Brown & Roop, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. When the case was here before, it was decided that service upon Printup was not service upon the company; that if the company did not in the first instance designate an agent under Civ. Code 1895, § 2057, it was a misdemeanor for its agents to transact business in Georgia; that the statute nowhere authorized the Commissioner of Insurance in the first instance to appoint an agent to receive service, although he had the power to name a successor to one already legally appointed, whenever the latter absented himself from the state. The amendment cures the defect, the allegation being that the company, when it first began to do business, had designated Proctor to receive service; that Proctor had absented himself from the state; and that, in conformity with the statute, Printup had been duly appointed as his successor. It does not appear whether the appointment by the Commissioner was made before or after the company's withdrawal from the state, nor when it ceased to do business in Georgia. Nor are these things material, even under Cady v. Associated Colonies (O. C.) 119 Fed. 420 (5); Friedman v. Empire Life Ins. Co. (O. C.) 101 Fed. 535; and other decisions holding that the company must be doing business in the state, as a condition precedent to authorize the power of appointment by the Commissioner, or to make valid the service on the agent. While there is no allegation on the subject, the company is presumably collecting or receiving premiums on its outstanding Georgia policies. At any rate, it has business of a most important character, in carrying out the contracts made, and in defending suits here instituted for the alleged breach thereof; and the power of appointment in the Commissioner, and the authority of the agent thereunder, continue as long as there is any necessity to perfect service in suits for the violation of contracts made in this state. Civ. Code 1895, § 2058; Mutual Ass'n v. Phelps, 23 Sup. Ct. 707, 47 L. Ed. 987; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Spratling, 172 U. S. 603, 19 Sup. Ct. 308, 43 L. Ed. 569. There was no special demurrer on this point; the only issue being whether the agent had exceeded his authority in making an acknowledgment, and whether the suit should proceed in Carroll or Floyd county. While it is alleged that the contract was made in Carroll, it appears that the company now maintains no agency in this state.

But it does not follow that, because there is no agency, there can be no suit. So to hold would be to enable the company to take advantage of its own wrong. The statute was never intended to authorize a foreign corporation to make contracts, and then, by discontinuing business, to escape liability to suit here on such contracts. It was permitted to solicit business on condition that it would appoint some agent upon whom service could be made, and upon the further condition that, if that agent absented himself, the Insurance Commissioner could designate some one as his successor.

The contract having been made here, and the company being suable in this state, the only question to be determined is where that suit shall be brought. There being no agency, and therefore no venue fixed under Civ. Code 1895, § 2145, the company is to be treated as a nonresident, and suable here wherever it can be found. Compare Civ. Code 1895, § 4954; National Bank v. Southern Co., 55 Ga. 390; City Fire Ins. Co. v. Carrugi, 41 Ga. 660; Williams v. E. T. V. & Ga. R. Co., 90 Ga. 520, 16 S. E. 303. It is found wherever service can be perfected on its authorized attorney, and this is wholly independent of such attorney's residence. The statute declares that the agent may acknowledge service of process in behalf of such company in all proceedings that may be instituted against such company "in any court in this state," not in any court of the county in which he resides. When Printup acknowledged service of a suit in Carroll county, there is enough on the record to show that the company was found in that county. In Stone v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 78 Mo. 653, under a statute with provisions practically identical with those contained in Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2058, 2059, a suit was brought against a nonresident company in Linn county. The writ of summons was directed to the sheriff of St. Louis, which by a statute is placed upon the same footing as a county, and there served upon the agent designated by the statute. It was ruled that "suits against foreign insurance companies are not required to be brought in the county in which the agent appointed * * * to receive service of process resides. They may be brought in any county in the state, and, if the agent lives in another county, the writ is to be directed to the sheriff of the latter county." Hough, C. J., said: "The sheriff of Linn county has no general power to serve process beyond the limits of his county, and there is no special provision in cases like the present authorizing the sheriff to serve process in any other county. As the section quoted authorizes process issued by any court in the state to be served upon the agent or attorney of the foreign insurance company appointed to receive service, such agent may, of course, be served whenever found in this state." Compare Civ. Code 1895, § 4989; Mitchell v. S. W. R. R., 75 Ga. 404. The case of N. Y., etc., R. R. v. Estill, 147 U. S. 591, 13 Sup. Ct. 444, 37 L. Ed. 292, is much in point, for suit was brought against a foreign corporation in Saline county, and process served upon an agent in St. Louis by the sheriff of St. Louis. It was held that the service was good, "and that the defendant was within the provisions of the Missouri statute which made nonresidents suable in any county of the state"; the ruling in the Stone Case being cited and followed. So, in People v. Justices (Com. Pl.) 11 N. Y. Supp. 773, it appeared that a foreign corporation was liable to suit in the state of New York. Action was brought against it in the city court of New York, and service made upon the Superintendent of Insurance, who had an office in Albany. The court said (Daly, J.): "Ordinarily a summons in an action in the city court of New York cannot be served without the city of New York, but an exception was evidently intended by the Legislature in the case of actions against foreign insurance corporations; for the city court is given jurisdiction of such actions, and the Legislature has provided that process against such corporations may be served upon the Superintendent of Insurance. This officer has his office in Albany, and there the process must be served upon him. We must conclude, therefore, the Legislature intended city court process to be served upon him there." And in Boyer v. Northern Pacific Ry. Co. (Idaho) 66 Pac. 826, it was held that a foreign corporation does not acquire a fixed residence in the state by designating an agent upon whom process may be served, under the provisions of section 2635 of the Revised Statutes of that state, which requires the company to designate such agent.

In the multiplication of corporations, and the increase of their business beyond the limits of the parent state, conditions arose which demanded a modification of the old ruling that, as they could not migrate, neither could they be sued, except where incorporated. It was a mere fiction that they could not migrate, for in fact they did business, entered into contracts, made profits, maintained agencies, and had agents in foreign states. They were there present in the person of the agent, and, if there for the purpose of doing business, they were also there present in his person for the purpose of being sued. In going into the foreign state, for the purpose of doing business, it at the same time submitted itself to the jurisdiction of its courts in suits arising out of contracts made in the course of such business. There is, then, no question of jurisdiction, but only one of venue and service, to be determined by the laws of the state applicable to those subjects. They can be sued in the counties in which they maintain agencies, or, if none, then in any county where they may be found in the person of the agent. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4954, 1899. If a foreign insurance company maintains an agency, Civ. Code 1895, § 2145, requires that suit be brought in the county in which such agency is located; but where there is no agency it sets the matter at large, and the courts of any county in which the company may be found, or in which service may be lawfully perfected, have the power to determine the liability of the company on the contracts here made. If the case is not to be governed by section 2145, it falls under the broad provisions of section 2057, requiring the company in the first instance to appoint, and authorizing the Commissioner in the second instance to name a successor "to acknowledge or receive service of process, and upon whom process may be served, for and in behalf of such company, in all proceedings against such company in any court of this state, or any court of the United States in this state, and consenting that service of process upon any agent or attorney appointed under the provisions of this section shall be taken and held to be as valid as if served upon the company." Section 2058, in providing for the appointment of a successor, declares that the appointment "shall be as valid as if made by the company," and that service of process as aforesaid, issued by any such courts as aforesaid upon any such attorney appointed by the company or by the Insurance Commissioner, shall be valid and binding, and be deemed personal service upon such company so long as it shall have any obligations or liabilities outstanding in this state, although such company may have withdrawn, been excluded from, or ceased to do business in this state."

Ordinarily no notice need be given the opposite party upon taking an order making a remittitur from this court the judgment of the lower court. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5597, 5598. But where the judge, before the presentation of the order, is notified of an intention by the losing party to offer an amendment, the prevailing party is entitled to be heard on the question as to whether it shall be allowed. The time when this shall be determined is in the discretion of the presiding judge, and, unless some legal damage results from the delay, or there is some abuse of discretion, this court will not interfere. There may be cases in which the trial judge ought to make the remittitur the judgment of the lower court without delay, or with little delay. Where plaintiffs in error have been restrained of their liberty, and, as a result of the reversal, are entitled to a discharge, or where property has been placed in the hands of a receiver, or injunctions have been granted, or it has been decided that the court below erred in refusing to appoint a receiver or grant an injunction, the remittitur should be promptly made the judgment of the lower court. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5597, 5598. The present case presented no such facts calling for immediate action.

MACON, D. & S. R. CO. v. HIGHTOWER.

RAILROADS—KILLING STOCK—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. There being some conflict in the evidence as to whether the engineer on the locomotive which struck and killed the animal, for the value of which suit was brought, exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to prevent striking it, and the jury having returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for its proved value, there was no error committed in refusing to sanction the petition for certiorari; the only assignment of error therein being that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence.

PASCHAL v. HUTCHINSON et al.

SUPERIOR COURT—JURISDICTION—LOST HOMESTEAD PAPERS—ESTABLISHMENT.

1. No jurisdiction is conferred upon the superior court by the Civil Code of 1895, § 4745 et seq., to establish copies of a lost schedule and plat of a homestead proceeding which had never been recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court as required by law. These sections relate solely to the establishment of lost private papers, and the homestead and plat do not become private papers until they have been recorded as required by law.

Error from Superior Court, Putnam County; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Action by B. I. Paschal, trustee, against R. W. Hutchinson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. T. Davidson, for plaintiff in error. Warner & Preston, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. When this case was here before (116 Ga. 736, 42 S. E. 1010), it was held that, after the schedule and plat of a homestead have been recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court as required by law, they, as muniments of title, become the property of the applicant and beneficiaries of the homestead, and are in no sense to be considered as office papers either of the superior court or the court of ordinary; that the applicant and beneficiaries have the same interest in these papers as they would in a deed under which they claim title; and that the superior court has jurisdiction to establish copies of such papers after they have been recorded. When the case came on to be heard a second time, the petition was so amended as to allege that the schedule and plat of the homestead had never been recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court. To the petition as amended the defendants demurred upon the ground that, as the papers had never been recorded as required by law, the superior court had no jurisdiction to establish copies of the lost papers. This demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted.

When all the papers which are required by law to make a complete homestead or exemption under the provisions of the Constitution have been filed with the ordinary, and every act necessary to the setting apart of the homestead has been done, the law required the ordinary to hand "the same" to the clerk of the superior court, who is required to record "the same" in a book to be kept for that purpose in his office. Civ. Code 1895, § 2835. It is argued that this law does not require the record of the application, but only of the schedule and plat. Even if the word "schedule" was not intended by the General Assembly to embrace all of the proceedings in connection with the homestead except the plat, we think the words "the same," wherever they occur in the section, refer to the entire proceedings, including the application. It certainly was not the intention of the General Assembly that simply a fragment of the homestead proceedings should be recorded. It is now the settled law of this state that, after the homestead proceedings have been recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court, they become the private papers of those interested in the homestead estate. Paschal v. Turner, 116 Ga. 736, 42 S. E. 1010, and citations. In Dunagan v. Stadler, 101 Ga. 477, 29 S. E. 440, it was held that the ordinary, in entertaining applications for homesteads allowed by the Constitution, and passing upon questions raised, and in finally acting upon the applications, acts in a judicial capacity, and constitutes a court. It would seem, therefore, that, as long as there is any duty to be performed by the ordinary in connection with such an application, the papers connected therewith are office papers of a court; and the question to be determined is at what stage in the proceeding required by law to set apart a homestead do these papers cease to be office papers of the court, and become the private property of those interested in the homestead?

As the law requires the ordinary, after his approval of the homestead papers, to hand the same to the clerk of the superior court, and under the terms of the statute the clerk is required to record the same, it would seem to follow that these papers do not lose their character as office papers until every duty required by law of a public officer in connection therewith has been performed. Neither the applicant nor the beneficiaries would have a right to demand these papers until both the ordinary and the clerk have performed all their duties in connection therewith. The law requires the ordinary, sitting as a court, to pass judicially upon the question as to whether a homestead should be allowed, and requires the clerk to record this judgment of the ordinary, in order that the public may be notified of the change that has been brought about in the title to the property involved. The public is interested in the due regularity of the proceedings before the ordinary, as well as the due record of the entire proceeding in a book regularly kept for that purpose in the office of the clerk of the superior court. As long as the public has any interest in the matter, the papers cannot become mere private papers. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the homestead papers do not become muniments of title of those interested in the homestead until they have been duly recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court. As those interested in the homestead would have no right to demand at this stage of the case the possession of the papers, to be held as muniments of title, the superior court would be without jurisdiction to establish them as such at any stage of the proceeding prior to the final record in the clerk's office. While this point was not directly ruled when the case was here before, the conclusion now reached was to be inferred from the ruling then made. So long as the papers continue office papers of the homestead court presided over by the ordinary, that court, in the exercise of its inherent power, may establish copies of the same whenever lost. See 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 559. If, after the ordinary has indorsed his approval upon the schedule and plat, and handed the same to the clerk, the papers can no longer be considered office papers of the homestead court presided over by the ordinary, it may be that the superior court, in the exercise of its chancery powers, upon a regular petition and process, would have authority to establish the papers. See, in this connection, Bisp. Prin. Eq. § 177; Griffin v. Fries, 23 Fla. 173, 2 South. 266, 11 Am. St. Rep. 351; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 555; 13 Enc. P. & P. 351. But upon this question we now express no opinion. The present application was not an appeal to the chancery powers of the superior court, but was under the provisions of the statute of 1856 (Acts 1855-56, p. 238), embodied in the Civil Code of 1895, § 4745. The case made by the petition not being for the establishment of private papers, the application was not within the terms of that section, which relates solely to the establishment of lost private papers.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—SUBLETTING—RATIFICATION—DISTRAINT.

1. Where the owner of land rents it to a tenant, and the latter sublets it, the landlord has a right to elect to treat the subtenant as his own tenant. If he does so, and distrains against the subtenant, he cannot do so for more than the contract price of rental agreed upon between himself and the original tenant. If the original tenant agreed to pay the landlord a part of the rent in money or in a portion of the crop, and part in certain improvements on the premises, the landlord may distrain for the value of the improvements, as well as for the money or the portion of the crop; but, in order to recover the value of the improvements, the same must be alleged in the affidavit.

Error from City Court of Dublin; J. S. Adams, Judge.

Action by Mrs. James Whitehead and another against T. B. Fountain. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Jas. A. Thomas, for plaintiff in error. Phil. P. Johnston and Peyton L. Wade, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Mrs. Shewmake died, leaving certain lands, in which, under a will, she had a life estate. In 1899, through her agent, she had rented a house and eight acres of this land to Robinson; the agreed annual rental being 213 pounds of lint cotton, for which Robinson gave his note each year. Robinson also contracted with the agent to clear up a four-horse farm by January 1, 1903, and until that date he was to have the use of this cleared land in consideration of his clearing it. Robinson in 1900 and 1901 had cleared about 70 acres of the land, and, as a four-horse farm embraced about 120 acres, he had still 50 acres to clear. In 1902 Robinson rented the land which he had cleared to Fountain. What rental Fountain agreed to pay Robinson, does not clearly appear. Mrs. Shewmake's death was in 1901, and the lands were divided among her children according to the terms of the will creating the life estate. In the division the lands rented to Robinson, including the land which he was to clear, fell to Mrs. Whitehead and Mrs. Johnston. In September, 1902, they, through their agent, having previously demanded rent of Fountain, had a distress warrant issued against him; claiming that he, as their tenant, was indebted to them for rent in the amount of 2,500 pounds of lint cotton, of the value of $200. This distress warrant was levied upon the crops of Fountain grown upon the land. Neither in the affidavit nor in the distress warrant was reference made to the contract to clear the land. Fountain filed a counter affidavit alleging that the sum distrained for was not due, and that he was not, and had never been, tenant of the plaintiffs. The papers were returned to the city court of Dublin, and at the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $200, with interest and costs. Fountain moved for a new trial. The motion was overruled, and he excepted.

The view we take of the case renders it unnecessary to discuss all of the grounds made in the motion for new trial. One of them was that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence. We think the court erred in not granting a new trial upon this ground. The evidence shows that Robinson rented a house and 8 acres of land for a certain amount of cotton, and that he was to clear 120 acres of other land, which he was to use until January, 1903, free of rent. In 1902 he rented to Fountain a portion of the land which he had cleared—some 70 acres. It thus appears that Robinson was not indebted for any rent upon this portion of the land. He had paid the rent for this much of the land (if the contract was one of rental at all) by clearing it, and it was his right to cultivate it, if he wished to do so. Had he cultivated it himself, it is clear that plaintiffs could not have collected rent from him for this 70 acres. He chose, however, to rent it to Fountain, instead of cultivating it himself, and the plaintiffs were no more entitled to collect rent from Fountain than they would have been from Robinson. It is true that Robinson agreed to clear up 120 acres, and that of this he failed to clear up some 50 acres. This was a violation of his contract, for which we think Fountain was not liable. Nor could Fountain be held liable as a subtenant whom the landlord had elected to treat as tenant. This is true for at least two reasons: (1) The rent was not due until 1903; and (2) the affidavit upon which the distress warrant was based did not mention the failure to clear up the land, and the value of clearing it. In Wilkins v. Talliafero, 52 Ga. 208, the case relied upon by the defendants in error, the landlord was allowed to distrain for failure to "fix" a kitchen; proper affidavit being made as to the value or cost of such repairs. In this case there was no allegation as to the value of clearing the land, and the landlord could not recover. In view of the affidavit made in this case, evidence as to the value of clearing the land was irrelevant and inadmissible, for in no view of the case was the value of the land for rent in issue.

COURTS—JURISDICTION—RESIDENT AND NON-RESIDENT DEFENDANTS.

1. Suit was brought in a certain county against F., a resident of the county, and S., a resident of another county, by a married woman, alleging that the petitioner had bought certain land situated in the county wherein the suit was brought from one G., and had partially paid for it; that S. had paid the balance of the purchase money for her, and had taken a conveyance from G., giving petitioner a bond for titles, agreeing to convey the land upon the payment of the amount advanced and certain other amounts, which really represented indebtedness of petitioner's husband to S.; that petitioner had fully paid all that was her own debt, and was not bound for the debts of her husband; that she had left the land, and F. and S., with full knowledge of the facts, had gone into possession, F. holding as the tenant of S. The petition prayed that the title to the land be decreed to be in petitioner, that she recover against F. and S. for the mesne profits, that S. be decreed to execute to her a deed to the land, and that certain notes given S. for the debts of petitioner's husband be delivered up and canceled. Held, following the rulings in the cases of Clayton v. Stetson, 28 S. E. 983, 101 Ga. 634, Vizard v. Moody, 41 S. E. 997, 115 Ga. 491, and Townsend v. Brinson, 43 S. E. 748, 117 Ga. 375, that, no substantial equitable relief being prayed against F., the resident defendant, the court had no jurisdiction to grant the equitable relief prayed against S., the non-resident, and the judge did not err in sustaining his demurrer based upon that ground.

RAILROADS—INJURY AT CROSSING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Though a traveler upon a public highway, in approaching a railroad crossing, may not observe that amount of care and diligence which would be exercised under like circumstances by an ordinarily prudent person, he is not necessarily precluded from recovering for injuries to his person or property, received on the crossing, if, after it is apparent that the engineer of the railroad company is disobeying the provisions of section 2222 of the Civil Code, which require the blowing of the whistle and the checking of the train on approaching public crossings, he exercises ordinary care and diligence in endeavoring to escape the consequences of the company's negligence. Comer v. Barfield, 31 S. E. 89, 102 Ga. 485. Applying this principle to the evidence submitted by the plaintiff in the present case, the court did not err in refusing to grant a nonsuit.

2. In an action for damages against a railroad company for injuries sustained by reason of the negligent running of the defendant's locomotive and train of cars, wherein damages are claimed for physical pain and suffering, and also for inability to labor occasioned by such injuries, as well as for the cost of medicine and other expenses, it is erroneous for the court to charge, without qualification, that "in every tort there may be aggravating circumstances, either in the act or in the intention, and in that event the jury may give additional damages, either to deter the wrongdoer from repeating the trespass, or as compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff. In some torts the entire injury is to the peace and happiness of the plaintiff. In such cases no measure of damages can be prescribed, except the enlightened conscience of the jury." *Southern Ry. SMITH v. SMITH.

DIVORCE—CRUELTY—EVIDENCE—DISQUALIFICATION OF JUROR.

1. In the trial of an action for divorce, brought by a husband against his wife on the ground of alleged cruel treatment, it is not error to reject evidence that she constantly quarreled with, abused, and insulted her husband, and, by slandering him to her neighbors, injuriously affected his practice as a physician, and that she also spoke insultingly and abusively of his children and a former wife, their mother.

2. Nor is it error, in the trial of such a case, to reject evidence that the wife was an habitual user of morphine, and almost all of the time under its intoxicating influence.

3. A juror is not disqualified by reason of the fact that he is the brother of the wife of defendant's brother, who actively assisted in the defense of the divorce suit.

4. The evidence amply warranted the jury's finding, and there was no abuse of discretion in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Upson County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by S. H. Smith against L. F. Smith for divorce. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. Y. Allen, for plaintiff in error. Worrell & Riddgill, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Smith filed a petition praying for a total divorce from his wife on the ground of cruel treatment. She answered, denying the material allegations of the petition, and praying that a divorce be denied plaintiff, but granted to her, on the same ground as that upon which the plaintiff's petition was based. The jury returned a verdict finding that neither party was entitled to a divorce. The wife acquiesced in the verdict, but the husband filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he brought the case to this court.

1. The great majority of the grounds of the motion complain of the rejection of evidence to the effect that the wife constantly quarreled with, abused, and insulted her husband, and, by slandering him to her neighbors, injuriously affected his practice as a physician, and also spoke insultingly and abusively of his children and his first wife, their mother. In Ring v. Ring, 118 Ga. 183, 44 S. E. 861, it was ruled that cruel treatment, to be a ground for divorce, "is the willful infliction of pain, bodily or mental, upon the complaining party, such as reasonably justifies an apprehension of danger to life, limb, or health." Under the operation of this wholesome rule, none of the evidence rejected would have authorized the granting of a divorce to the plaintiff. All of the evidence rejected was irrelevant and inadmissible.

2. Complaint is also made that the court rejected evidence to the effect that the wife was an "habitual morphine eater, and almost all of the time under its intoxicating influence." In Ring v. Ring, supra, it was expressly ruled that the habitual and intemperate use of morphine would not, alone, constitute such cruel treatment as to authorize a divorce on that ground. It was therefore entirely proper to reject this evidence, as it furnished no ground for a divorce, and could only prejudice the defendant before the jury.

3. A new trial was also asked on the ground that one of the jurors was the brother of the wife of defendant's brother, who actively assisted in the defense. This did not disqualify the juror. Central Railroad Co. v. Roberts, 91 Ga. 513, 18 S. E. 315; Keener v. State, 97 Ga. 388, 24 S. E. 23.

4. The finding of the jury was amply supported by the evidence, and there was no abuse of discretion in refusing a new trial.

DANIEL v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO.

WRIT OF ERROR — DISMISSAL — WRONGFUL DEATH — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. While the practice is deprecated, it is not a ground to dismiss a writ of error that the portions of the record material to a clear understanding of the issues involved are brought to this court in the bill of exceptions under the certificate of the trial judge, instead of being specified in the bill of exceptions and sent up as a separate transcript under the certificate of the clerk of the court below. Simmons, O. J., dissenting.

2. Under the evidence for the plaintiff, her husband, for whose homicide she sued, could, by the exercise of the skill and diligence to protect himself required by law, have avoided the injuries which caused his death. A judgment of nonsuit was therefore proper.

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by L. A. Daniel against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Turner & Adams and E. W. Butler, for plaintiff in error. Dessau, Harris & Harris, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. Upon the call of this case in this court the defendant in error moved to dismiss the writ of error, the grounds insisted upon being (1) that the plaintiff in error has attempted to embody the record in the bill of exceptions, contrary to law; (2) that there is no transcript of the record ordered sent up, which is contrary to law; (3) that the judge, in certifying the bill of exceptions, does not certify that no transcript is necessary. Prior to the act of the General Assembly "prescribing the manner of taking cases to the Supreme Court" (Acts 1889, p. 114), this motion would have been good. But following the several decisions of this court construing the act in question, and also the act approved December 22, 1892 (Acts 1892, p. 113), which had the same general purposes in view, we are satisfied that to dismiss this writ of error on the grounds set forth in the motion would be not only to violate the letter, but to destroy the spirit, of both these acts. The act of 1889 provides a plain and distinct manner for bringing cases to this court, even giving a form for the certificate of the trial judge. Under the terms of that act it seems to us that the better practice would be to specify such parts of the record as may be necessary for an understanding of the questions which it is sought to have reviewed, and have the same sent to this court under the certificate of the clerk of the court below. This, indeed, is the almost universal practice of the bar of the state at this time. But, while this is true, we cannot hold that it is illegal to set out in the bill of exceptions the material parts of the pleadings and of the evidence introduced on the trial, with a recital that at the conclusion of the evidence introduced for the plaintiff the court, on motion, granted a nonsuit, and dismissed plaintiff's case; the bill of exceptions then assigning error in due form upon the order of the court granting a nonsuit. What more do we need for a clear understanding of the error complained of? The trial court certifies that the bill of exceptions "contains all of the record and all of the evidence material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of," and he also certifies in terms to the truth of every allegation of fact made in the bill of exceptions. The plaintiff in error sets out his petition, that we may see on what he relied for a recovery, and the answer of the defendant, showing to what extent the petition was admitted and wherein it was denied. Then follows a brief of the evidence introduced on the trial. Thus, under the certificate of the judge, we are easily enabled to determine whether, by admission or proof, or admission and proof, the plaintiff's case as laid is made out. If, in a given case, more of the record is needed than is set out in the bill of exceptions or specified therein, it is made the duty of this court to send to the clerk of the court below, and have it duly transmitted. We are prohibited from dismissing any writ of error, if the record contains enough to enable us to decide the questions raised, or if we can by our own efforts secure enough to enable us to understand them. Such was the construction placed upon Civ. Code, § 5569, by Justice Lumpkin, in the case of Gregory v. Daniel, 93 Ga. 795, 20 S. E. 656, in which case no part of the record whatever was specified in the bill of exceptions.

Speaking for myself, an examination of the act of 1889 leads me to the conclusion that it was not the legislative intention that parts of the record other than the brief of the evidence (which might or might not be so brought) be put into the bill of exceptions, but rather that it was in contemplation that such parts of the record as were material should be specified in the bill of exceptions, and sent as a transcript by the clerk below to this court. But we are thoroughly committed to the proposition that record matter other than the brief of evidence may be set out in the bill of exceptions and certified to by the judge, and that when such is done the same matter is not to be brought up in a transcript of the record certified by the clerk. In the case of Brittain v. Griggs, 88 Ga. 232, 14 S. E. 609, the bill of exceptions contained a statement that the motion for a new trial was overruled, and by fair implication disclosed the fact that certain specific grounds which were set forth in the bill of exceptions were contained in the motion. This court refused to dismiss the writ of error. In the case of Burkhalter v. Oliver, 88 Ga. 473, 14 S. E. 704, which was heard at the same term, the bill of exceptions contained a statement that a verdict was rendered in a certain amount against the plaintiff in error, and that a motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and error was assigned on the refusal of the court to grant a new trial on each ground of the motion, the language of each ground being quoted in the assignments of error. A motion was made to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that the verdict and the motion for a new trial were not specified as parts of the record to be sent up, and were not embraced in the transcript of the record before this court. In the opinion (page 477, 88 Ga., page 705, 14 S. E.) Chief Justice Bleckley said: "That certain facts, such as the amount of a verdict and the grounds of a motion for a new trial, appear of record, will not hinder the same facts from being stated in the bill of exceptions and verified by the certificate of the judge. True, this could not be done, under the prior law, and may not be the best practice under the act of 1889, but there is certainly nothing in that act which prohibits it, and the general spirit and policy of the act is to have no more of the record brought up than is necessary." See, also, Hawkins v. Americus, 102 Ga. 790, 30 S. E. 519, where it is laid down that a writ of error will not be dismissed because no part of the record is specified, the bill of exceptions containing enough to enable this court to ascertain the real questions in the case. In Scott v. Whipple, 116 Ga. 214, 42 S. E. 519, it was said that "no bill of exceptions can be dismissed on account of the negligence of the plaintiff in error in failing to incorporate or specify evidence or record which is material to his case." See, also, Ahrens Mfg. Co. v. Patton Sash Co., 94 Ga. 247, 21 S. E. 523; Continental Ins. Co. v. Wickham, 110 Ga. 129, 35 S. E. 237. In Lester v. Equitable Co., 92 Ga. 576, 17 S. E. 675, the writ of error was dismissed, because the plaintiffs in error not only "failed to brief the evidence as required by law," but "incorporated needlessly in the bill of exceptions all of the pleadings, thus aggravating the very evil which the act of 1889 for bringing cases to this court was in a large measure intended to prevent." In Delk v. Pickens, 92 Ga. 576, 17 S. E. 862, the writ of error was dismissed because the plaintiff in error copied in full in the bill of exceptions the material portions of the record, and also specified the same to be brought up in the record, "in violation of both the letter and the spirit of the act of 1889, prescribing the manner in which cases shall be brought to this court, by duplicating, instead of abbreviating, the record." It will be seen that the two last cases were dismissed for bringing too much, rather than too little, to this court. In the present bill of exceptions we have everything that is necessary to a clear understanding of the alleged errors complained of, the certificate of the trial judge verifying the truth of every statement of fact recited and the correctness of every paper set forth. The judge still further certifies that the bill of exceptions contains all of the record and all of the evidence necessary to a clear understanding of the case. While, as before stated, we deprecate the practice of bringing matters of record up in this way, we cannot hold that it is illegal, and the motion to dismiss the writ of error is therefore overruled.

2. The burden was upon the plaintiff to show a lack of ordinary care on the part of the company, and also to show that at the time he was killed the deceased was in the exercise of due diligence to protect himself. It appears that the deceased was digging under an embankment, and that those in charge of the work sent men to the top of the embankment to drive wedges in the earth to prize it loose. This, however, was done in full view of the deceased, and all that was necessary for him to ascertain that the wedges were being driven was for him to "look up and see them." A witness for the plaintiff, who was working within three feet of the deceased, testified that he knew at the time that the wedges were being driven, that the object in driving them was to make the dirt cave in, and that the men went up on the embankment for that purpose. He further testified that the deceased had an equal opportunity with himself of knowing these facts, that both of them were present when the men were ordered to drive the wedges, and that the order was given in a tone loud enough for the deceased to hear it. We think, without saying more, that this case falls squarely within the ruling of this court in Ga. R. Co. v. Ivey, 73 Ga. 499; Reid v. Central R. Co., 81 Ga. 694, 8 S. E. 629; Georgia R. Co. v. Nelms, 83 Ga. 70, 9 S. E. 1049, 20 Am. St. Rep. 308; Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Jackson, 113 Ga. 355, 38 S. E. 820; and Atlantic & B. Co. v. Reynolds, 117 Ga. 47, 43 S. E. 456. The plaintiff's husband assumed the ordinary risks of his employment, and was bound to exercise his own skill and diligence to protect himself. The deceased was chargeable with knowledge of the physical fact that in undermining dirt, when the support is removed, the dirt will either topple over or cave in. At the time of the injuries which caused his death he was digging under an embankment, while others, in plain view of him, were driving in wedges to force away the overhanging earth. The plaintiff's own evidence, in our opinion, clearly demonstrates that the deceased could, had he used the skill and diligence required of him by law to protect himself, have avoided the injuries which caused his death; and the grant of a nonsuit was therefore proper. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

STANDARD WAGON CO. OF GEORGIA v. D. P. FEW & CO.

PARTNERSHIP—LIABILITIES—PURCHASE BY PARTNER—NOTICE—SCOPE OF BUSINESS.

1. A partnership is not liable on a note given by one of the partners for the purchase of goods bought and used for his own private benefit, when such note is still in the hands of the vendor, and the purchase of such goods was not authorized or ratified by the other partners, and was an act neither actually nor apparently within the scope or ordinary course of the partnership business.

2. One dealing with a partnership is chargeable with notice of the character of the partnership business as conducted; and if a person take from one of the partners a note signed by him in the firm name as payment for goods supplied such partner, the payee is bound to know whether the transaction is within the apparent scope of such business.

3. It follows that, where a suit against a partnership on a promissory note signed by one of the partners is defended by the copartners on the ground that the note was given for the purchase of goods for their partner's own private use, and was not the act of the partnership, and on the trial there is evidence that the partner signing the note gave it for the purchase of goods for his own use which were not used for the benefit of the firm, and that the transaction was not within the real or apparent scope of the partnership business, and was not authorized or ratified by the other partners, it was error to charge that the payee could recover if he had no notice that the act was beyond the scope of the business, could not have known it by the use of ordinary care, and honestly believed he was dealing with the firm in a partnership transaction.

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by the Standard Wagon Company of Georgia against D. P. Few & Co. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial, it brings error. Affirmed.

George & Anderson, for plaintiff in error. E. W. Butler, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Suit was brought in a justice's court by the Standard Wagon Company of Georgia against Few & Co., a partnership, upon a promissory note. On appeal to the superior court the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The trial judge granted a motion for a new trial. Upon the second trial the jury again found for the plaintiff. Upon motion this verdict was also set aside, and a new trial granted. To this judgment the plaintiff excepted. From the record it appears that the note sued on was signed by one Jackson, a member of the defendant partnership, in the name of the firm. The defendants, the other partners, in their answer admitted the signing of the note by Jackson in the name of the firm, but alleged that the note was given for the purchase of goods for Jackson's own private use, and was not the act of the partnership. From the evidence it appeared that the note was given the plaintiff by Jackson for the purchase price of a phaeton. The decided preponderance of the evidence—if, indeed, there was any to the contrary—showed that this phaeton was never used or handled by the partnership, and that the partnership received no benefit therefrom. It was shown that the partnership was a trading concern doing a general mercantile business and dealing in general supplies, mowing machines, hay rakes, and harvesters. Neither before nor after the time of the purchase of this phaeton did the partnership deal in any vehicles of any kind. Jackson was the managing partner. The partnership agreements did not contemplate a dealing in vehicles, the defendants did not hold themselves out as dealers in vehicles, and the partnership books did not contain any entry of this transaction. The defendants did not know of the purchase of the phaeton or the giving of the note therefor, and did not authorize or ratify the same.

The motion for new trial contained a number of grounds, but the judge granted the new trial upon two of them only. One of these it is unnecessary here to mention. The other was that the court had erred in charging the jury as follows: "If the signing of the note was done by a member of the firm, and the plaintiff had no notice that the act was not within the legitimate business of the firm, and could not have known it by the exercise of ordinary care, and plaintiff honestly believed it was dealing with the firm in a partnership transaction, the defendants would be liable in this case." If there was any error in this charge, then the trial judge did not err in granting a new trial. Partners have, of course, the right to bind each other by contracts made with third persons who have no notice of any special restrictions of the partnership powers, provided the transaction is within the general scope of the partnership business. Nor is the copartner relieved from liability on a contract made by his partner because of a limitation in the partnership agreements unknown to the other party, when the act or transaction is within the apparent scope of the business. If persons hold themselves out as general partners, each is bound by the transactions of the other within the real or apparent scope of the business in which they are engaged, or within the scope of other like enterprises in the same community. In order to bind one by the acts of another, however, some real or apparent authority must appear. "The liability of one partner for acts and contracts done and made by his copartners without his actual knowledge or assent is a question of agency. If the authority is denied by the actual agreement between the partners, with notice to the party who claims under it, there is no partnership obligation. If the contract of partnership is silent, or the party with whom the dealing has taken place has no notice of its limitations, the authority for each transaction may be implied from the nature of the business according to the usual and ordinary course in which it is carried on by those engaged in it in the locality which is its seat, or as reasonably necessary or fit for its successful prosecution. If it cannot be found in that, it may still be inferred from the actual, though exceptional, course and conduct of the business of the partnership itself as personally carried on with the knowledge, actual or presumed, of the partner sought to be charged." Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 505, 4 Sup. Ct. 163, 28 L. Ed. 225. "When the business of a partnership is defined, known, or declared, and the company do not appear to the world in any other light than the one exhibited, one of the partners cannot make a valid partnership engagement except on partnership account. There must be at least some evidence of previous authority beyond the mere circumstance of partnership to make such a contract binding. If the public have the usual means of knowledge given them, and no acts have been done or suffered by the partnership to mislead them, every man is presumed to know the extent of the partnership with whose members he deals; and when a person takes a partnership engagement, without the consent or authority of the firm, for a matter that has no reference to the business of the firm, and is not within the scope of its authority or its regular course of dealing, he is, in judgment of law, guilty of a fraud." 3 Kent's Com. (14th Ed.) *43; Venable v. Levick, 2 Head, 351; Dickinson v. Valpy, 10 B. & C. 128, 21 Eng. Com. Law, 68. "If a partner does an act for a purpose apparently not connected with the firm's ordinary course of business, he is not acting in pursuance of any apparent authority, and the firm will not be bound unless the partner in fact had authority. If, for instance, a partner pledges the credit of the firm for a purpose apparently not connected with its ordinary course of business—e. g., for the purpose, to the knowledge of the creditor, of paying his private debts (Leverson v. Lane [1862] 13 C. B. N. S. 278; In re Riches [1864] 4 De G., J. & S. 581; Snaith v. Burridge [1812] 4 Taunt. 684)—the firm is not bound unless he is in fact specially authorized by the other partners (Part. Act 1890, § 7). The onus of proving such authority is on the creditor, and it is not sufficient for him to prove that he honestly believed there was such authority (Id., and Kendal v. Wood [1871] L. R. 6 Ex. 243), unless the other partners are by their conduct estopped from denying the authority (Id.)." 9 Enc. Laws of Eng. 461. The creditor cannot shield himself behind his ignorance of the authority of the partner with whom he deals, even though he may have exercised ordinary care to ascertain it. He must, in order to bind the partnership, either show express authority or facts from which the law will imply authority. If he cannot show either, he cannot hold the partnership. He must, at his peril, in dealing with a single partner, ascertain the actual or apparent authority of such partner. In other words, when he deals with a member of a partnership in a matter as to which such member has no express authority, he is chargeable with notice of the apparent character and scope of the partnership business. It was therefore error to charge that the test of liability of the partnership was the honest and reasonable belief of the plaintiff. As was said by Lush, J., in Kendal v. Wood, L. R. 6 Ex. 254, "The mistaken belief that the one partner had that authority cannot prejudice the right of the other, if the other did nothing to induce such a belief."

We express no opinion as to the evidence in this case, or as to what the verdict of the jury should be. The trial judge granted a new trial because he thought that the case had been submitted to the jury under incorrect instructions. We agree with him in this view, and therefore affirm his judgment granting a new trial.

CRIBB v. PARKER, Judge.

INSANITY—INQUISITION AFTER CONVICTION—REPEAL OF STATUTE—EFFECT—PENDING CASES—SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE—MANDAMUS.

1. Pen. Code 1895, § 1047, as amended by the act of December 21, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 41; Van Epps' Code, § 6757), was repealed by the act of August 17, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 77), providing for the abolition of trials or inquisitions after conviction as to the sanity of persons accused of capital offenses.

2. The third section of the repealing act, which provided that that act "shall not apply to any pending case," has application only to inquisitions of insanity pending under Act 1897, p. 42.

3. After the date of the passage of the repealing act a judge of the superior court had no jurisdiction to entertain an original application for an inquisition of insanity under Act 1897, p. 41, or to grant an order suspending the sentence in the case.

4. Even if the refusal of a judge to entertain such an application is such a decision as would authorize the applicant to tender a bill of exceptions complaining thereof, the judge, when signing such a bill of exceptions, has no authority to grant an order suspending the sentence merely because the bill of exceptions has been signed.

5. Even if this court has jurisdiction by mandamus in any case to compel a judge of the trial court to grant an order suspending the sentence in a criminal case, for the reason that the granting of such an order is a necessary part of the bill of exceptions, this court has no jurisdiction to issue the writ of mandamus for such purpose in a case where, at the time the judge signs the bill of exceptions, he has no jurisdiction over the sentence sought to be suspended. Haskens v. State, 40 S. E. 997, 114 Ga. 837.

STATE v. BOGGAN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1903.)

HOMICIDE—MURDER IN THE FIRST DEGREE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—INSTRUCTIONS—PREJUDICIAL ERROR—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATION—NEW TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF JURY—PRESUMPTION—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

1. In a prosecution for homicide, declarations of deceased that defendant shot him were competent as dying declarations, where it was shown that deceased was informed the morning after the homicide that the wound would probably prove fatal, and just before making the statements on the following morning he stated that he was getting weaker, believed he was going to die, and that the doctors had so informed him.

2. In a prosecution for homicide, evidence examined, and held sufficient to authorize a conviction of murder in the first degree.

3. In a prosecution for homicide, defendant could not complain of a refusal to instruct that he could not be convicted of manslaughter, where there was uncontradicted evidence, except as to his identity, of murder in the first degree.

4. Where it is shown in a prosecution for homicide that there was opportunity to influence the jury, but not that the jury was actually influenced, the granting of a new trial is in the discretion of the trial judge.

5. The presumption is in favor of the integrity of a verdict, and the burden is on the assailant thereof to show that the jurors were improperly influenced, or that their conduct was such that, as a matter of law, there was "no trial."

6. In a prosecution for homicide, it was shown on motion for a new trial that the jury was quartered in a hotel adjoining the alley in which the killing occurred, and that on two occasions the jury were conducted through the alley to the privy. In reference to these facts, the court found that while the jury could and did see the circumstances as to light, etc., surrounding the killing, they made no mention of any such things, and did not remark thereon in their deliberations or anywhere else. Held, that the court's findings would be construed to indicate that the jury were not influenced by what they saw, and its refusal to set aside the verdict would not be disturbed.

Montgomery, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Superior Court, Anson County; C. M. Cooke, Judge.

Will Boggan was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the instructions of the trial court:

"(1) All murders which shall be perpetrated by means of poison, lying in wait, imprisonment, starving, torture, or by another kind of willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, or which shall be committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate any arson, rape, robbery, burglary, or other felony, shall be deemed to be murder in the first degree, and shall be punished with death. All other kinds of murder shall be deemed murder in the second degree. Any other wrongful killing of a human being is manslaughter.

"(2) Murder in the second degree is the willful and unlawful killing of a human being with malice.

"(3) But to make the killing murder in the first degree, it must not only be done with malice, but, unless perpetrated by means of poison, lying in wait, imprisonment, starving, or torture, or committed in the perpetration or the attempt to perpetrate some arson, rape, robbery, burglary, or some other felony, it must be committed with deliberation and premeditation.

"(4) General malice is wickedness; a disposition to do wrong; a diabolical heart, regardless of social duty, and fatally bent on mischief. Particular malice means ill will; a grudge; a desire to be revenged on a particular person. Malice, also, in respect of the rule for the proof of its existence, is either implied or expressed. Implied malice is when the law presumes its existence. The law presumes malice from the use of a deadly weapon, and, when it is admitted or proved that the slaying was with a deadly weapon, the burden is upon the accused to satisfy the jury, not beyond a reasonable doubt, but to satisfy them of the existence of facts and circumstances in mitigation, and sufficient to reduce the offense below murder in the second degree. Mere words, however opprobrious and insulting, are not legal provocation for the use of a deadly weapon, and cannot be allowed as sufficient to reduce the offense below murder in the second degree, when the killing is with a deadly weapon.

"(5) A deliberate and premeditated killing can only be where there is a murderous intent and purpose in the heart, formed before, and not simultaneously with, the killing, and a steadfast resolve and deep-rooted purpose to kill the deceased, after carefully considering the consequences.

"(6) Dying declarations of the facts of the killing and of the person who did it are competent, but should be received with caution.

"(7) Of every fact material and essential to the guilt of the prisoner of any one of the offenses the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, and, upon a consideration of the whole evidence, the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty, before they could find him guilty of any one of the offenses.

"(8) The court instructs you that in this case the defendant is guilty of at least murder in the second degree, or nothing. It will be your duty to consider first if he be guilty of the homicide, and then whether it be murder in the first or second degree.

"(9) Upon the question of identity, the court instructs you that the state must satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is the man who fired the fatal shot that killed John Sullivan, and if the state has failed to satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is the man who fired the fatal shot, or if, after considering and weighing all the evidence, your minds are left in painful doubt and uncertainty upon that point, it would be your duty to acquit the defendant; and upon this question it will be your duty to consider all the evidence offered by the state, including the dying declarations of the deceased that the defendant was the man who shot him, as testified by the witness Crawford, the widow and brothers of the deceased, if you shall find the facts testified to be true; and the evidence of the witnesses Starnes and Morgan that they saw the man shoot the deceased; that, while they did not know the name of the defendant, they knew the man, and did recognize him as soon as they saw him, and that it was the defendant; and also their evidence that they recognized his voice the first time they heard it afterwards as the voice of the man who shot the deceased; if you shall find the facts testified to by them to be true; and also the evidence in corroboration of the said Starnes and Morgan, if those witnesses who testified to hearing the said Starnes and Morgan say, after the shooting, and before they saw the said defendant, thereafter, that they did not know the name of the man who did the shooting; that they would know him if they should see him again; if you shall find the said facts to be true. You will also consider the evidence of the witness Starnes that the man who shot the deceased had on a short, light-colored overcoat, and a brown derby hat, and of Morgan that he had on a light-colored overcoat, and the evidence of the witnesses who testified to seeing the defendant that night, and that he had on a light-colored overcoat and a brown derby hat, if you should find these facts to be true; and you will also consider the evidence of the witnesses of the general bad character of the defendant. And you will also consider the evidence of the witnesses who testified to seeing the defendant, on the night the deceased was shot, at a point on the street not far from where the shooting occurred, with a pistol in his hands, and the evidence of the witnesses that the defendant and the deceased were quarreling, that night and not far from the place of the shooting, and not long before the shooting occurred—provided you shall find the facts to be true; and upon this question you will consider all the evidence that is in favor of the defendant, including the fact that the shooting occurred in the night time in the alley; that neither Starnes nor Morgan knew the man by name, and their failure to tell who it was that did the shooting immediately after the shooting, and the testimony of these witnesses who testified that Starnes and Morgan stated soon after the shooting that they did not know the man who shot Sullivan; the evidence of the witnesses who testified that Will Boggan did not wear a light-colored overcoat, and did not own one, and that he did not have a brown-colored derby hat. You will also consider the evidence of the defendant himself that he was not the man who shot the deceased; that he was not at the place where he was shot, but that he had left town before it occurred, and had gone by his home, and shortly afterwards had gone, in company with Monroe Ledbetter, Jean Tysen, Thomas Boggan, Frank Sturdivant, Walter Howell, Garfield Howell, and Jesse Willoughby, to a point in some woods more than a mile from town, and where he and they had remained playing cards until a late hour in the night; and also the evidence of Monroe Ledbetter that he went with the defendant from town before the shooting occurred, and was with him on the way to and over in the woods until a late hour in the night; and also the testimony of Frank Sturdivant, Jean Tysen, Garfield Howell, and Thomas Boggan that they got up with the defendant and Monroe Ledbetter, and accompanied them to the woods for the purpose of playing cards, and that they remained there with the defendant until a late hour of the night; and the testimony of Cornelia Ledbetter and Nellie Boggan to the fact that Boggan and Ledbetter were at their respective homes between nine and ten o'clock, and left with their lanterns; and the evidence that the defendant, after his return from the woods, on being informed by his wife that the officer had been at his home to arrest him on the charge of shooting the deceased, came at once to town, and sought the officer, and inquired the cause of his arrest; and you will also consider the evidence as to the good character of Monroe Ledbetter, Jean Tysen, Tom Boggan, and Frank Sturdivant, and Anna Johnson, Cornelia Ledbetter, and Nellie Boggan, and of the bad character of Judge Starnes. You will also consider the evidence of the witness who testified to measuring the rubber overshoe that defendant had on, and then applying the measure to tracks made by some one wearing apparently rubber shoes, going away from the place of the killing, and that the measure of the tracks was one-eighth inch shorter than the measure of the other soles. The court does not claim to have herein called your attention to all the evidence in the case, but you will consider all the evidence, and allow to it such weight as you may find it entitled to.

"(10) If you shall find beyond a reasonable doubt, after considering all the evidence in the case, that the defendant fired the shot that killed the deceased, and if you shall further find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, moved by feeling of revenge and ill will towards the deceased, had, after considering carefully the consequences, coolly and deliberately formed the murderous purpose against the deceased, and, with the steadfast resolve and intent to kill the deceased, and with deliberation and premeditation, fired the said shot, then you will find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree; but, if you shall not be so satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, you will find the defendant not guilty of murder in the first degree. And upon the question of premeditation and deliberation the court instructs you that the killing with the pistol, while it is a presumption of malice, would not be so of deliberation and premeditation, and would not be evidence thereof. You will, upon this question of premeditation and deliberation, consider the evidence offered by the state of threats made by the defendant against the deceased, as testified to by the witnesses A. J. Johnson and Booker Little, and the evidence that the man who shot the deceased was standing close by the side of the wall on one side of the alley, along which the deceased was going, if you shall find that the defendant was the man who was standing by the side of said wall, and was the man who shot the deceased, and that, upon the deceased addressing and saluting him by using the word 'Hello,' he cursed him. But you will not consider upon the question for the state any expressions of the defendant tending to show ill will or bad temper generally. You will consider for the defendant the denial of the defendant that he made the threats testified to by the witnesses, and all the other evidence in the case that may be in his favor.

"(11) If you should find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant fired the shot that killed the deceased, but that the killing was not deliberated and premeditated, then you will find the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree; but, if you are not so satisfied, you will find the defendant not guilty. And upon this question you will consider all the evidence to which I have called your attention, and all the other evidence in the case.

"(12) As to the testimony of Will Boggan, the defendant, the court instructs you that it is your duty to weigh and scrutinize his evidence carefully, on account of his interest in the result of the trial, but if, after doing so, you are satisfied he has told the truth, you will allow the same weight to his testimony that you would to any other credible witness."

H. H. McLendon, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CONNOR, J. The prisoner was convicted of murder in the first degree, and from the judgment of the court appealed. The facts material to the decision of the exceptions set out in the record and case on appeal are as follows: On the night of February 28, 1903, the deceased met Morgan and Starnes near the Klondyke Hotel, in the town of Wadesboro. They went into and down an alley between the hotel and store of one Williams for the horse and buggy of the deceased. There was testimony on the part of the state tending to show that, as the three persons went down the alley, the prisoner was standing up beside a wall, and deceased spoke to him in a friendly manner; the prisoner responding, "Hello, you damn son of a b——." Deceased said, "I do not like to take that off of no man," and made an attempt to turn around. The other two persons with him prevented him from doing so, and the three started on down the alley. Prisoner followed them. One of the witnesses swore that he saw a pistol in prisoner's hand; that he turned deceased loose, and started around the corner by the store; that he looked back, and saw prisoner with pistol in his hand, arm outstretched, presenting it toward deceased, and he said, "I will break it off in you, you d—— son of a b——;" that he then saw the pistol fire. The prisoner turned and ran up the alleyway. Witness went to deceased and asked him if he was hit, and he said, "That negro has killed me." The witness said: "Boggan followed Sullivan, after using the words, ten or fifteen feet, before he shot. He was about four or five feet from Sullivan when he shot him." The witness Starnes further testified: "I looked back, and saw the negro following. I turned and told him to go back. He said, 'I'll be d—— if I do.' Just about that time Sullivan stepped around me and said, 'I do not like to take that.' The negro said, 'I gave it to you, and I'll be d—— if I take it back. Before I will, I will break it off in you.' Sullivan pulled off his right glove, and went to put it in his pocket, and as he did so the negro shot him." There was other testimony in regard to the identity of the prisoner. The prisoner set up an alibi, and introduced testimony tending to sustain his contention that he was at another place at the time of the homicide. The deceased was shot on Saturday night, and died the following Tuesday. Dr. Bennett and Dr. Ashe saw him on Sunday morning. "He was then rational and very much composed." Doctors told him that the wound would very probably prove fatal. They extended some hope to him by means of an operation that might save him. They told him that they were preparing for a statement he might make to the magistrate. Prisoner objected to this testimony. Objection overruled. No statement by the prisoner was introduced. Julius Sullivan, a brother of the deceased, was introduced, and testified that he saw the deceased about 3:30 o'clock Monday morning. To an inquiry as to his condition, deceased said: "I am in a bad fix." About 9 o'clock that morning deceased sent for witness, and said: "Well, I am about to leave you all. I hate to leave my little children." Witness then asked him if he knew who shot him. He said: "Yes; I know who shot me. Will Boggan shot me. I have been knowing him all my life." Witness duly objected and excepted to the admission of this testimony. Daniel Crawford also testified to similar declarations of deceased made about the middle of Monday afternoon. Before making the statement as to who shot him, deceased said: "I am getting weaker. I believe I am going to die." Witness said he hoped not. Deceased said: "Yes; he thought he was bound to die. 'The doctors thought he could not possibly get well.'" To all of which prisoner duly excepted.

The declarations of the deceased were clearly competent. Every condition upon which dying declarations are made competent were shown to exist. The ruling of his honor is sustained by a long and uniform current of decisions of this court. State v. Dixon, 131 N. C. 808, 42 S. E. 944. We have examined the other exceptions to the admission of testimony. We concur with his honor in respect to them.

The prisoner requested his honor to charge the jury "that upon the evidence the jury cannot find a verdict of murder in the first degree." This was declined, and prisoner excepted. His honor could not properly have given the instruction. According to the decisions of this court, there was ample evidence, if believed by the jury, to show premeditation. Similar instructions were asked in regard to verdict of murder in the second degree and manslaughter, and declined. The ruling upon the first prayer disposes of these. His honor might well have given the instruction as to manslaughter, but, of course, the prisoner cannot complain of his failure to do so. In no possible point of view could they find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter. His honor's charge, set out in full, is clear, exhaustive, and absolutely fair to the prisoner. If there was any error, the state alone had a right to complain. The real contest in the case centered upon the question of the identification of the prisoner. If the testimony of the only witnesses to the homicide is true, it was an unprovoked, heartless murder. There is no contradictory evidence in respect to the way in which the deceased was killed.

We have examined the exception to the reply made by his honor to the question propounded by the jury after an hour's deliberation, and find no error therein.

The last exception urged by the prisoner's able and faithful counsel relates to the conduct of the jury. In respect thereto his honor finds the following facts: "The jury, pending the trial, were quartered in the Klondyke Hotel by the officer, and kept together there at night, and when not attending upon the sessions of the court. That the alley in which the shooting occurred was right on one side of the hotel, and was the nearest way from the hotel to the privy, and that on two occasions the jury were carried by the officer through the alley to reach the privy for the calls of nature. The first time was on the night after the jury was impaneled, and before any evidence was introduced. The next time was on yesterday, in the daytime, pending the argument. The court finds that the jury, nor did any of them, at any other time visit or go through the alley, and that there were not any remarks made by any one of the jury, nor by the officer attending them, as to the condition or appearance of the alley, and that the jury could see and did see the alley from time to time as they passed along by it going to and returning from the sessions of the court, but no remarks were made by them, or any of them, as to the conditions of the alley, or appearances therein. That the jury, from the hotel windows, could see and did see the alley and street along which the accused was alleged to have gone after the shooting. The court further finds that the jury could and did see the electric lights, and could and did see to what extent they lighted up the alley and the streets and points at which it was testified the accused was on the night of the killing, but there was no mention of any of these conditions, nor remarks made by the members of the jury to each other, nor to any one else, nor by the officer, nor any discussion by them of any of these conditions, or the appearance of the place of the shooting, nor any of the environments." The prisoner, upon these findings of fact, moved the court to set aside the verdict. Motion denied. Prisoner excepted. In respect to motions to set aside the verdict of the jury for misconduct, the rule which controls this court is thus stated by Pearson, C. J., in State v. Tilghman, 33 N. C. 513 (page 553): "If the circumstances are such as merely to put suspicion on the verdict, by showing, not that there was, but that there might have been, an undue influence brought to bear on the jury, because there was opportunity and a chance for it, it is a matter within the discretion of the presiding judge. But if the fact be that undue influence was brought to bear on the jury, as if they were fed at the charge of the prosecutor or prisoner, or if they be solicited and advised how their verdict should be, or if they have other evidence than that which was offered, in all such cases there has been, in contemplation of law, no trial, and this court, as a matter of law, will direct a trial to be had." This court held in State v. Crane, 110 N. C. 530, 15 S. E. 231: "When it appears only that there was an opportunity whereby to influence the jury, but not that the jury was influenced—merely opportunity and chance for it—a new trial is in the discretion of the presiding judge." State v. Miller, 18 N. C. 500. In State v. Gould, 90 N. C. 658 (a capital felony), Mr. Justice Ashe says: "And even if the circumstances had been such [which was not the case here] as to show that there was an opportunity and chance for exerting an influence upon them, it would have been matter of discretion with the presiding judge whether he would have granted a new trial." In this case his honor, while properly declining to have an affidavit from one of the jurors for the purpose of impeaching the verdict, states that he examined each of the jurors verbally in the presence of the prisoner and his counsel, and the record shows that the jury was polled. The presumption is, in favor of the integrity of the jury and their verdict, that they tried the case upon the law and evidence. If it is sought to impeach the verdict, the burden is upon the prisoner to show either that they were improperly influenced, or that their conduct was such that, as a matter of law, there had been "no trial." We construe the findings and action of his honor to mean that the jury were not influenced in arriving at their verdict by what they saw in regard to the alley and its surroundings. We do not entertain a doubt but that the learned, just, and fearless judge who heard the case and passed upon the motion would have promptly set the verdict aside, regardless of all other considerations than his sense of duty, if he had even doubted its integrity. We should not hesitate to declare the law as contended by the prisoner, regardless of this consideration, if we so found it to be. Formerly juries were selected from the vicinage, because of their supposed familiarity with the parties, witnesses, and surroundings. It would be impracticable to shut a jury up in a room without light, air, or exercise during a long trial—as in this case, eight days—to prevent the possibility of their seeing, in passing to and from the courthouse or attending a call of nature, something which might affect their minds. Many suggestions readily occur to the mind of conditions and circumstances which might affect the minds of jurors, which it would be impracticable to make the basis for setting their verdicts aside. The law and its administration are for the practical affairs of life. While it seeks to protect the innocent, and surround the accused in the day of his trial with all of the safeguards which experience, humanity, and justice demand, it seeks also to deal with men and things in a practical way.

We have given the prisoner's cause a careful, anxious consideration. A jury of his country has found him guilty of an unprovoked murder of a citizen of the state. We find no error in the action of the court. He has been tried according to the "law of the land." The judgment must be affirmed.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). I dissent from that part of the opinion of the court in which it is held that his honor committed no error in refusing to grant to the prisoner a new trial on the ground that the jury were on several occasions allowed to visit the locality where the homicide occurred. A most material question of the trial was the identification of the prisoner. Without the aid of the dying declarations of the deceased, the jury would have had difficulty in making that identification. The homicide occurred at night in an alley of the town of Wadesboro. Some of the witnesses testified that the light in the alley from an electric light was insufficient to disclose the identity of the prisoner. Others said that the light was sufficient for that purpose. The jury were allowed, without an order of the court, and without the knowledge of the prisoner, to observe many times the effect of the light upon the point where the homicide occurred. I am not seeking to disturb the rule, so often laid down by this court, that it is not sufficient to set aside a verdict that a juror might have been influenced by separation from the others of the jury, or by communications held with others outside, but that there must be evidence that the juror was influenced in his verdict by such conduct. But I do intend to enter my dissent against the conviction of any person of a capital felony in a case where evidence other than that offered on trial in an open court has been received by the jury, as was done in this case. In State v. Tilghman, 38 N. C., at page 553, Pearson, J., said for the court: "We take this plain proposition: If the circumstances are such as merely put suspicion on the verdict by showing, not that there was, but that there might have been, undue influence brought to bear on the jury, because there was opportunity and a chance for it, it is a matter within the discretion of the presiding judge. But if the fact be that undue influence was brought to bear on the jury, as if they were fed at the charge of the prosecutor or the prisoner, or if they be solicited and advised how their verdict should be, or if they have other evidence than that which was offered on the trial [italics mine], in all such cases there has, in contemplation of law, been no trial; and this court, as a matter of law, will direct a trial to be had, whether the former proceeding purports to have acquitted or convicted the prisoner." It matters not what you may call the observations of the jurors of the place where the homicide was committed, or for whatever purpose the jury visited that locality; the fact is the effect of those lights upon the points in that alley which were made important by the testimony was evidence, and it was, in the nature of things, bound to have influenced the jury in fixing the identification of the prisoner. No person can say that the lights which the jurors saw on the nights when they were in or near the alley were the same lights which were there the night of the homicide. And it will not do to say that the prisoner could have shown that the lights were not the same. The answer to that is that he did not know the jurors had been there making observations. That information came after the trial was over.

FLESHMAN v. McWHORTER, Judge, et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 21, 1903.)

MANDAMUS TO JUDGE—DISCRETION—CONTROL—INADEQUATE REMEDY—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—RIGHT OF APPEAL.

1. In awarding or refusing costs under section 6 of chapter 138 of the Code of 1899, the judge of a circuit court acts judicially, and the writ of mandamus does not lie to control his discretion.

2. Failure of the law to give a right of appeal, where a party feels that he has been injured by a decision, affords no ground for an application for the writ of mandamus.

3. There is no absolute right in a suitor to have a decision against him reviewed, which must be respected in making laws; and, in the absence of a constitutional inhibition, it is within the power of the Legislature to prescribe the cases and the courts in which parties shall be entitled to appellate remedies.

4. One trial, without review, fulfills the maxim that there is a remedy for every wrong. Allowing appeals and writs of error in some cases only permits the remedy to be further pursued in them than in those as to which such provisions are not made.

Petition of B. M. Fleshman for writ of mandamus to J. M. McWhorter, judge of the circuit court of Greenbrier county, and others. Writ refused.

Williams & Dice, for petitioner. Preston & Wallace, for respondents.

POFFENBARGER, J. D. M. Fleshman asks that a peremptory writ of mandamus issue against Hon. J. M. McWhorter, judge of the circuit court of Greenbrier county, requiring him to enter a judgment for costs in favor of petitioner in an action of trespass on the case in which he was plaintiff and D. F. Hedrick was defendant, and in which the plaintiff recovered a judgment for $1. The action was for breaking, entering, and trespassing upon the plaintiff's close. No other cause of action is set out in the declaration, and the plea was, "Not guilty." But it is claimed by the petitioner that the action was brought for the purpose of determining in this indirect way a controversy between the plaintiff and defendant concerning a right of way over the plaintiff's land. They own adjoining tracts of land, the titles to which were derived from a common source—David Hedrick—who conveyed the land now owned by the plaintiff to S. A. Hedrick in 1875, who in 1896 conveyed to the plaintiff. David Hedrick conveyed to the defendant his land in 1901. An old pathway led across the lands of both parties, and the defendant claimed a right of way through the plaintiff's land along said pathway by prescription or long user thereof; claiming that it had been so used for 60 years or more. Plaintiff had forbidden the defendant to use the pathway, and obstructed it by increasing the height of the fence and in other ways; but afterwards the defendant had entered and torn away the obstructions, and continued to use it against the will of the plaintiff. These facts appear from an agreed statement of facts incorporated in a bill of exceptions, and exhibited with the petition, together with the pleadings and orders in the case. Upon the trial there was a verdict for the plaintiff, with damages assessed at $1, for which sum the court entered a judgment, but refused to give judgment for plaintiff's costs, amounting to $64.30, and also to certify that the object of the action was to try a right other than the mere right to damages for the trespass complained of.

The trial judge and the attorneys for the defendant were of the opinion that judgment for costs in the action is forbidden by section 6 of chapter 138 of the Code of 1899, reading as follows: "In any personal action not on contract, which might be brought and prosecuted to judgment in a justice's court, if a verdict be found for the plaintiff, on an issue or otherwise, for less damages than fifty dollars, he shall not recover, in respect to such verdict, any costs, unless the court enter of record that the object of the action was to try a right besides the mere right to recover damages for the trespass or grievance in respect of which the action was brought, or that the said trespass or grievance was willful or malicious." The attorneys for the plaintiff insist that the action was one which could not have been brought and prosecuted to judgment in a justice's court, as it involved the title to real estate; that there was a plain duty resting upon the judge to enter the certificate, even if the case did fall within that statute; and that the plaintiff has no remedy for his costs, unless it be by mandamus.

The rendition of a judgment of any kind is the exercise of a judicial function and power. Mandamus will not lie to control the exercise of the discretion of any court, board, or officer when the act complained of is either judicial or quasi judicial in its nature. State v. County Court, 33 W. Va. 589, 11 S. E. 72. An inferior tribunal may be compelled to act in such cases, if it neglects or refuses to do so, but mandamus is not a remedy by which it can be compelled to enter any particular judgment or to act in any particular manner. By this writ the inferior court, board, or officer can only be compelled to move, but not to move in any particular way. Its discretion cannot be controlled. Miller v. County Court, 34 W. Va. 285, 12 S. E. 702; State v. Herrald, 36 W. Va. 721, 15 S. E. 974; Marcum v. Commissioners, 42 W. Va. 263, 26 S. E. 281, 36 L. R. A. 296. These authorities, as well as many others, further hold that if such court, board, or officer is acting in respect to the matter which is the subject of complaint, or has acted upon it, mandamus does not lie at all. If the court is proceeding to act, and commits an error, or has completed its function, and erred in doing so, the remedy, if any, is by some form of appellate procedure. Though these general principles are decisive of the case, the following authorities more directly in point are cited: In Jansen v. Davison, 2 Johns. Cas. 72, there was a recovery of a sum less than $25, and the court refused a judgment for costs. Thereupon a mandamus was asked for, and the superior court refused it, saying: "The court below have exercised their judgment on the question of costs. If they were wrong, it was an error of judgment, merely, and the proper remedy is by a writ of error." In Chase v. Canal Co., 10 Pick. 244, costs were refused in a condemnation proceeding, a writ of mandamus was applied for, and the court refused it, without expressing any opinion as to whether the petitioners were entitled to costs, because the commissioners against whom this remedy was sought had acted in a judicial capacity upon a question properly submitted to their judgment. In State v. Judge, 3 Wis. 809, the court held that, if the judge or court errs in the taxation or award of costs, a mandamus is not the proper remedy to correct the error. In the opinion, the court said: "To direct in this way the judge to decide the questions involved would be a gross perversion of the proper office of a writ of mandamus." To the same effect is Ex parte Nelson, 1 Cow. 417, where a writ of mandamus was applied for to compel the common pleas court to enter a judgment for costs. Savage, C. J., said: "A mandamus is proper where a party has a legal right, and there is no other appropriate legal remedy, and where, in justice, there ought to be one; but where a discretion is vested in any inferior jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction has been exercised, a mandamus will not be granted, because this court cannot control and ought not to coerce that discretion." The same principle is applied in People v. New York C. P., 19 Wend. 113. In Ex parte Many, 14 How. 24, 14 L. Ed. 311, the Supreme Court of the United States refused a mandamus to compel the circuit court to tax and enter in the blank left in its order the amount of the costs. Chief Justice Taney said: "This court might unquestionably issue a mandamus to the court below to proceed to judgment. But in this case the court has proceeded to judgment upon the question submitted for its decision. And whether that judgment be erroneous or not, this court has no jurisdiction to re-examine it in a proceeding by mandamus." See, also, Merrill on Mandamus, §§ 187, 201; High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, §§ 159, 182, 193.

That the function performed by the court in passing upon the question of costs in the case out of which this proceeding has grown is judicial is perfectly clear. The authorities cited show that in awarding costs the court acts judicially. Hence, if the right to costs were clear and indisputable, and the court had refused a judgment therefor, mandamus would not lie. In this case the court was called upon not only for a judgment for costs, but also for an entry upon the record of a certificate to the effect that a right besides the mere right to recover damages had been involved in the action. The entry of such certificate calls upon the court for the exercise of judgment, and the application of legal principles to the pleadings and evidence in order to determine the nature of the controversy. In some cases the nature of the right involved is apparent, requiring no consideration whatever; and it might be said that in entering the certificate the court acts ministerially, but it does not. Where the action is brought upon a bond, and there is no defense, the duty of the court is plain; but in pronouncing judgment it acts judicially, nevertheless.

Counsel for the petitioner urges in support of this application the want of any other remedy. As applicable to this phase of the case, the following is quoted from Spelling on Extraordinary Remedies, at section 1373: "It does not necessarily follow that because the law, by ordinary methods of procedure, does not afford an adequate remedy, relief will be given by mandamus. There are many cases of wrong, and consequent damage to the party, resulting from omitted duty, wherein the law affords no redress in the usual forms, and where yet the courts refuse to grant relief by mandamus. Though a party may fancy himself injured by a decision of an inferior court upon a matter where the law gives no right of appeal, yet this circumstance alone does not entitle him to relief by mandamus. The desirability of having the matter finally settled in the first instance may have been the prevailing motive of the Legislature in withholding the right of appeal." On an application for a writ of prohibition, this court has applied the principle; holding that the writ does not lie for error committed, or about to be committed, by a circuit court, in respect to a matter which is clearly within its jurisdiction, notwithstanding the lack of a remedy by appeal. Sperry v. Sanders, 50 W. Va. 70, 74, 40 S. E. 327. Failure to give an appeal or writ of error in every case is not the result of oversight in the people in the adoption of the Constitution, nor of the Legislature in making laws under it. On the contrary, there is a deliberate purpose to set limits upon litigation, after one trial in a court having jurisdiction, and put an end to controversy. Though writs of error came into use, as common-law remedies, more than seven centuries ago, there is no absolute right in a suitor to have a decision reviewed, which must be respected in making laws; and, in the absence of some constitutional inhibition, it is within the power of the Legislature to prescribe the cases in which, and the courts to which, parties shall be entitled to bring a cause for review. 2 Cyc. 507.

While the law is supposed to give a remedy for every wrong, this relates to the wrong constituting the cause of action, not mere errors in procedure. The people, in framing the Constitution, and the Legislature, in passing statutes, have full and complete discretion and power to determine whether a review shall be allowed, and, if none is provided for, the courts have no power to give it. The law gives one trial on every cause of action. As to some, the judgments and decrees of the trial court may be reviewed; as to others, they may not. There is a remedy for every wrong, but in some cases it is more ample, and may be pursued farther, than in others. There is no appeal from the judgment of a justice when the amount in controversy does not exceed $15, exclusive of interests and costs; nor any appellate jurisdiction in this court, in controversies pecuniary in character, when the amount does not exceed $100, exclusive of costs. Hardships result in a few instances, but the courts can give no relief. Against these the lawmakers have set the benefits of fixing bounds to litigation, and said that, upon the whole, the public good is subserved, notwithstanding occasional instances of injustice. The courts cannot entertain complaints founded upon a supposed lack of wisdom or propriety in the exercise of the powers vested in lawmaking bodies.

The principles and authorities above referred to forbid the awarding of the peremptory writ. It must be refused, the alternative writ quashed, and the petition dismissed.

MERRINER v. MERRINER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 21, 1903.)

INJUNCTION—SUFFICIENCY OF BILL.

1. A general allegation that the defendant is interfering with the plaintiff "in the matter of farming, cultivating, or tilling a farm on which plaintiff resides" presents no sufficient grounds for an injunction.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wetzel County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Action by David Merriner against Matthew H. Merriner and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. P. Jacobs and E. B. Snodgrass, for appellant. McIntire & McIntire and M. R. Morris, for appellees.

DENT, J. David Merriner appeals from an order of the circuit court of Wetzel county, entered on the 28th day of March, 1902, dissolving an injunction obtained by him against his father, Matthew H. Merriner. The facts, as shown by the bill and exhibits, are that David Merriner holds in trust for himself and father a certain tract of land, known as the "Beck Farm." By the deed conveying title to him, a life estate and right of possession are vested in the father. The son says "that, under an agreement between himself and father, he is entitled to possession of the farm for cultivation and tilling"; that his said father "has become disagreeable, and ill-tempered, so that it is impossible to deal with him or to come to any amicable adjustment between themselves; that he continually interferes with your orator in his management of said farm; that, while your orator holds said property in trust for himself and said Matthew H. Merriner, the said Matthew H. Merriner has so continuously interfered with his rights and duties in the performance of his trust that it has become impossible for him longer to discharge his trust, on account of the interference and hostility of the said Matthew H. Merriner." The only trust the plaintiff shows he holds, by his bill, is the legal title to the lands jointly for the benefit of himself and father, while his father, under the deeds, is entitled to a life estate in and the possession of such lands, and the plaintiff occupies them by virtue of an alleged agreement with his father, and therefore as his tenant, and not as his trustee. It is his tenancy that is interfered with, and not his trusteeship. He prays that his father "may be inhibited, restrained, and enjoined from interfering with" him "in the matter of farming, cultivating, or tilling the said farm on which he now resides until" the matter between them may be settled. The circuit court awarded a preliminary injunction, and then dissolved it on motion of the father.

The bill presents no sufficient grounds for injunction. It wholly fails to show or allege any irreparable damage either committed or threatened. Becker v. McGraw, 48 W. Va. 539, 37 S. E. 532; Greathouse v. Greathouse, 46 W. Va. 21, 32 S. E. 994. If the plaintiff has any sufficient grounds for injunction, he fails to set it out in his bill.

The order of dissolution is affirmed.

FISHER v. FISHER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 14, 1903.)

DIVORCE—ABANDONMENT—INSANITY OF DEFENDANT.

1. A decree of divorce for willful abandonment and desertion for three years will be granted the plaintiff, where it appears that the defendant was guilty of such desertion and abandonment for three years while he was of sound mind, although subsequently he became insane, and at the time of the commencement of the suit and the granting of the decree he was a lunatic.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monongalia County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Suit by Lucy A. Fisher against Joseph William Fisher. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Moreland & Glasscock, for appellant.

McWHORTER, P. This is a suit for divorce brought by Lucy A. Fisher against her husband, Joseph William Fisher, in the circuit court of Monongalia county. The plaintiff filed her bill alleging her marriage with the defendant on the 25th of November, 1893; that a son was born to them on the 8th of October, 1894, who was with the plaintiff, and whom she had always maintained and supported; that plaintiff was born in Monongalia county, and had always resided therein, which was also the case as to the defendant, and that they had last cohabited in that county; that plaintiff had always been a faithful and dutiful wife to her said husband, but that he had always been cruel and inhuman in his treatment towards her, and in May, 1898, had wholly and willfully abandoned and deserted her, and had ever since abandoned and deserted her; that within the then last four or five months defendant had been adjudged insane, and committed to the Hospital for the Insane, in Lewis county, where he still was, and would likely remain for and during the remainder of his lifetime; and alleged that such willful abandonment and desertion on his part was committed and was continued for more than three years while he was sane, and long before any signs of insanity; that he had no property, personal or real, so far as she knew; and prayed she might be allowed to file her bill, and that said Joseph W. Fisher be made defendant thereto; that a guardian ad litem be appointed to defend his interests, and that plaintiff be granted a divorce; and that she be given the custody, care, maintenance, and education of her said child; and for general relief. R. H. Brown was duly appointed guardian ad litem of the defendant, and filed his answer to the bill. Plaintiff filed with her bill duly certified copies of the marriage license, and of the minister's return certifying the marriage, from the records of the circuit court of Garrett county, Md., wherein the marriage was consummated, duly authenticated. Depositions were taken upon due notice, and in the presence of the guardian ad litem—the depositions of Lucy A. Fisher, Estella Myers, Marion A. Laughlin, and I. M. McGallagher—which depositions were filed and read in the cause, and sustained the allegations of plaintiff's bill. And on the 14th day of June, 1902, the following decree was rendered: "This cause came on this day to be heard upon the bill of complaint of the plaintiff and the exhibit filed therewith, process duly served upon the defendant, and the answer of R. H. Brown, guardian ad litem for the defendant, the general replication of the plaintiff thereto, and depositions taken on behalf of the plaintiff in the presence of the guardian ad litem, and was argued by counsel, and it appearing to the court that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief prayed for, it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the bill be dismissed." From this decree the plaintiff appealed, insisting that the court erred in holding and adjudging that plaintiff was not entitled to the relief prayed for and in dismissing her bill, and in not granting her the relief asked.

The only question presented for consideration in this cause is whether the plaintiff can be divorced from her insane husband for an act committed by him before his insanity. The only ground conceivable upon which the court refused relief to the plaintiff is that the suit could not be prosecuted because of the insanity of the defendant, but late authorities seem to unanimously hold that that is no ground for refusing relief. Section 5, c. 64, Code 1899, provides that "where either party willfully abandons or deserts the other for three years a divorce may be decreed to the party abandoned." In 34 L. R. A. 186, in the notes, it is said: "The rule was adopted by some of the early English cases that an action for divorce could not be allowed to proceed against an insane person. See Bawden v. Bawden, Mordaunt v. Mordaunt, and King v. King, supra, 11a. But these cases were either reversed or overruled, and the practice would now seem to be universal to permit the action to proceed under proper restriction, leaving the defense to the guardian, committee, or the next friend of the lunatic respondent. Thus an action for a divorce or separation is a civil action, and not a criminal suit or proceeding which cannot be instituted or carried on while the accused is a lunatic. Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe, 43 L. J. Mat. N. S. 49, 30 L. T. N. S. 649, 22 Week. Rep. 12, L. R. 2 H. L. (Sc.) 374." And in Rathbun v. Rathbun, 40 How. Prac. 328, it is held: "A decree of divorce for adultery will be granted to the plaintiff where it appears that the defendant committed the act of adultery while he was of sound mind, although subsequently he became insane, and was for several years previous to, and at the time of, the commencement of the action and the granting of the decree, a lunatic." And in Douglass v. Douglass, 81 Iowa, 421, it is held: "Where the husband deserted his wife while sane, he could not excuse his subsequent absence for the statutory period by showing that he became insane." And in 5 A. & E. E. L. (1st Ed.) 770: "The fact that a party, after being guilty of conduct entitling the other party to a divorce, becomes insane, should not bar such other party's remedy; and the court which takes care of the public interest will likewise protect the insane defendant from fraud and abuse, but must grant the divorce if the case is clearly made out. The insane defendant may appear and defend by guardian or committee." And cases there cited. See, also, Cook v. Cook, 53 Barb. 180.

The evidence in the case at bar clearly establishes the fact of marriage and of desertion and continued desertion for more than three years on the part of the defendant prior to his insanity. The plaintiff was entitled to the relief prayed for. Therefore the decree of the circuit court must be reversed, and, this court proceeding to render such decree as the circuit court should have rendered, it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between the plaintiff and the defendant be, and the same are, forever dissolved, and the custody of the child given to plaintiff, as prayed for in her bill, and that the plaintiff recover of the defendant her costs, as well in the circuit court as the costs of the appeal in this court.

MARTIN v. MARTIN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 5, 1903.)

MARRIAGES—ANNULMENT—PUBLIC POLICY.

1. Under sections 1-4, c. 64, Code 1899, all unlawful marriages are made voidable by decree of a court of chancery.

2. Incestuous marriages will be annulled by such court at the instance of either party although the applicant may have knowingly, willfully, and wickedly entered into the same.

3. The continuance of such marriage is contrary to good morals and public policy.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by S. J. Martin against Sarah Martin. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. B. Maxwell, for appellant. Harding & Harding, for appellee.

DENT, J. S. J. Martin complains of a decree of the circuit court of Randolph county, rendered on the 16th day of October, 1902, in his suit against his wife, Sarah Martin, in these words, "Upon consideration whereof, and without passing upon said demurrer, the court is of the opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to be heard in a court of chancery, and therefore the relief prayed for in his bill is denied him." Thereupon the court dismissed his bill. He appeals.

It is hardly necessary to notice the question of jurisdiction raised. This was fully settled in the case of Hitchcox v. Hitchcox, 2 W. Va. 435, and the court sees no good reason to depart therefrom. It is a chancery cause, determined by the circuit court, involving the personal rights of the parties.

The bill was filed for the purpose of annulling the marriage between himself and the defendant, consummated in the state of Pennsylvania, because they, being related by blood as nephew and aunt, went to the latter state to evade the laws of this state, with the intention of returning here to reside. The defendant demurred to the bill, and filed her answer, admitting the marriage and relationship, but denied they went to Pennsylvania for the purpose of evading the laws of this state and returning here to live. She also admitted that they had lived together for 18 years, had a son 10 years old, and had recently mutually agreed to separate. She denied, however, the right of plaintiff to have the marriage annulled. The plaintiff replied generally. On consideration the court reached the above conclusion that a court of equity ought not to entertain a litigant who vaunted his own iniquity, and made that his sole ground of the decree asked from it. In England and many of the United States marriages between relations of the forbidden degrees are void. 19 Am. & En. En. Law, 1175. In this state, by statutory enactment, they are only voidable. Sections 1-4, c. 64, Code 1899; 19 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 1210; Stewart v. Vandervort, 84 W. Va. 524, 12 S. E. 736, 12 L. R. A. 50. They remain valid, to some extent at least, until annulled by a decree of court. If the parties could continue the marriage relationship without violating the criminal laws of the state, then the court might be justified in refusing to entertain the plaintiff's bill. But when the law forbids the continuance of their marriage relation, notwithstanding its inception may have been a misdemeanor, it is the duty of both parties to make restitution by having the marriage annulled promptly. Their hands may be unclean, but it is the duty of a court of equity to permit them to clean them when it can do so, and not permit such uncleanness to continue as a stench in the nostrils of the people. 19 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 1212; Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 18 Am. Rep. 509; State v. Brown, 47 Ohio St. 102, 23 N. E. 747; 21 Am. St. Rep. 790; 16 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 134. While the rule is that equity will not entertain persons with unclean hands, yet there are just exceptions thereto, and the statutes of this state on marriage and divorce have mercifully provided that those who unwittingly enter into a marriage that leads to the continual violation of law, notwithstanding their original sin, may have such relation annulled, so that they may go and sin no more. Such transgressors should get from before the public gaze as quickly as possible.

The decree is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded to the circuit court, with directions to enter a decree annulling the marriage heretofore entered into between the parties, and also determining to whom the custody of the child should be given, and to further proceed therein according to the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Nov. 7, 1903.)

SALE OF TIMBER RIGHTS—SUFFICIENCY OF CONTRACT—TRESPASS—INJUNCTION.

1. It is not necessary for the vendees of certain timber rights to sign and acknowledge the contract conveying the same to them, to render them legally bound. Acceptance and operation thereunder binds them to all its conditions and stipulations.

2. On a bill filed to stay irreparable trespass, a court of equity will not on evidence, in the absence of allegations or pleading putting the same in issue, enforce the forfeiture of a contract relied on by the defendants, when such forfeiture is founded on unsettled questions of law and facts, and such contract, together with the plaintiff's evidence, fully negatives the allegations of irreparable damage contained in the bill.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Preston County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by the Merchants' Coal Company against Allen E. Billmeyer and others. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. J. Crogan, for appellant. J. A. Brown and R. H. Gordon, for appellees.

DENT, J. The Merchants' Coal Company, plaintiff, appeals from a decree of the circuit court of Preston county rendered on the 3d day of April, 1901, dissolving its injunction and dismissing its bill filed against Allen E. Billmeyer and others. The plaintiff's bill alleges that the defendants, Allen E. Billmeyer, Frank Billmeyer, John D. Billmeyer, and Andrew H. Billmeyer, were engaged in trespassing on a certain large tract of land belonging to plaintiff, and valuable solely for its timber, and were unlawfully cutting and removing such timber, and thereby irreparably damaging the plaintiff. A temporary injunction was awarded against the defendants. They appeared and filed their answer, admitting the principal allegations of the bill, but setting up their right to the timber by virtue of the following contract with the plaintiff, to wit:

"This agreement, made this 27th day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine, between the Merchants Coal Company, of Baltimore city, a body corporate, of the first part, and Allen E. Billmeyer, Frank Billmeyer, of Orleans Cross Roads, in the State of West Virginia, and Andrew H. Billmeyer and John D. Billmeyer of Little Orleans, in the State of Maryland, trading as the Billmeyer Lumber Company, of the second part; whereas, the party of the first part has upon the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth agreed to sell to the said parties of the second part, trading as aforesaid, all the sound and merchantable timber contained on a certain tract of land situate along the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, at a point near Tunnelton, in West Virginia (known as the 'Hammond' tract), containing about twelve hundred acres, witnesseth:

"That in consideration of the sum of one dollar and the premises the said party of the first part does sell unto the said parties of the second part, trading as aforesaid, all of said timber, and the said parties of the second part do hereby purchase, at the price and upon the terms and conditions as follows:

"1st. All timber to be cut into saw logs from twelve to sixteen feet long and to square eight inches at the top end or larger, or at the option of the purchaser less than eight inches can be included. All the logs to be scaled by what is known as 'Doyle's Rule,' by a person or persons agreed upon by the respective parties hereto.

"2d. All timber and logs cut and scaled hereunder, in each and every month, shall be paid for on the twentieth day of each and every succeeding month at the rate of five dollars per thousand feet, 'B. M.' for all the white and red oak and poplar, and three dollars and fifty cents per thousand feet, 'B. M.,' for all other merchantable and salable timber, the party of the first part to have the right to cut and pull the bark from all the chestnut oak or rock oak in springs of 1900 and 1901.

"3d. The said parties of the second part are to have free right of way for access to any part of said land and through said land for the purpose of cutting, manufacturing and shipping said lumber, timber or bark.

"4th. It is understood and agreed that if at any time the measurement or scale should be unsatisfactory to either of the respective parties hereto, the said party of the first part shall have the right to appoint a disinterested party or parties to do the work of scaling, provided that said party or parties will work at the mill at anything the said party of the second part may direct. In which case said party or parties are to be paid equally for said scaling by the parties hereto, but the other work so done by said party or parties shall be paid for exclusively by the said parties of the second part.

"5th. It is understood and agreed that the said parties of the second part shall commence operations hereunder on or before November 1st, 1899, and the said parties of the second part do hereby agree and bind themselves to cut and move at least three hundred thousand feet per year, and that said parties of the second part do further bind themselves to cut and remove from said tract of land within four years from November 1st, 1899, all merchantable or salable timber thereon.

"6th. The said parties of the second part to have the right during the continuance of this contract to cut any timber unfit for merchantable lumber for cross-ties, for which they shall pay to the party of the first part eight cents per tie upon the twentieth day of the month next succeeding that in which the ties are cut.

"7th. It is further understood and agreed that if the said parties of the second part should fail to carry out and comply faithfully with all the terms and conditions of this agreement and should fail for the period of five days to make the payments hereunder, as herein prescribed, then the said party of the first part shall have the right at its option to declare this agreement null and void, and shall be entitled in case it should elect to annul this agreement to receive immediately all money that has accrued for all timber cut hereunder.

"And the said party of the first part does hereby constitute and appoint D. Meredith Reese as its attorney, to acknowledge on its behalf this agreement.

"In testimony whereof, the said party of the first part has caused its president to subscribe his name and affix its seal hereto, and the parties of the second part hereunto have subscribed their names and affixed their seals.

"Thos. T. Boswell, [Seal.]

"President,

"Frank Billmeyer, [Seal.]

"John Billmeyer, [Seal.]

"Andrew H. Billmeyer, [Seal.]

"Allen E. Billmeyer, [Seal.]

"Trading as the Billmeyer Lumber Company.

"Test:

"Wilmer Emory."

"State of Maryland, Baltimore City, to-wit: On the third day of October, 1899, before me, the subscriber, a notary public of the State of Maryland, in and for Baltimore city aforesaid, personally appeared D. Meredith Reese, the attorney named and appointed in the foregoing agreement, to acknowledge said agreement to be the act of the said Merchants Coal Company.

"Witness my hand and notarial seal.

"Wilmer Emory, Notary Public. [L. S.]"

"State of Maryland, Allegheny County, to-wit: On the 27th day of October, in the year 1899, before me, the subscriber, a justice of the peace of the State of Maryland, in and for said county, personally appeared Allen E. Billmeyer, Frank Billmeyer, Andrew H. Billmeyer, and John D. Billmeyer, trading as the Billmeyer Lumber Company, and acknowledged the foregoing agreement to be their respective act.

"P. H. Fletcher, J. P."

To this the plaintiff replied generally, thus putting in issue the validity of the contract alone.

In its proof the plaintiff admits the making of the contract on its part, but insists it was not completed by reason of the failure or refusal of Allen E. Billmeyer, one of the defendants, to sign the same, and that therefore it was never legally binding. To sustain this contention, the plaintiff further introduced in evidence the following option, telegrams, and letters:

"Cumberland, Md., Queen City Hotel, Sept. 28th, 1899.

"I hereby agree to sell to the Billmeyer Lumber Company, of Orleans Cross Roads, W. Va., all the sound merchantable timber contained on a certain tract of land situate on the Baltimore and Ohio R. R., at a point near Tunnelton, W. Va., containing about twelve hundred acres, all the timber to be cut in saw logs, from 12 to 16 feet long, and to be squared eight inches at the top end and larger, or at the option of the purchaser, timber less than eight inches can be included. All logs to be scaled by what is known as 'Doyle's Rule,' by some person or persons who may be agreed upon by both buyer and seller, and to be paid for on the twentieth of each month for all logs cut and scaled during the previous month, at the rate of five dollars per thousand feet, 'B. M.,' for all the white and red oak and poplar, and three dollars and fifty cents per thousand feet, B. M., for all other merchantable or salable lumber, reserving the right to cut down and peel on all the chestnut or rock oak, which would be done in the springs of 1900 and 1901; also give free right of way and access to any part of said land and through said land for the purpose of manufacturing and shipping said lumber or timber. This option or offer to be accepted on or before eight o'clock p. m., on Thursday, September 28th, 1899, by telegram or letter. If at any time the scale or measurement would be unsatisfactory the seller would have the right to appoint some disinterested party to do the work of scaling, provided that same man would work on mill at any thing the buyer may direct, in which case said man is to be paid equally by both buyer and seller. Operations to commence on said timber on or before November 1st, 1899, and to remove at least 300,000 feet per year, and all timber to be removed within four years from November 1st, 1899. Said tract is known as the 'Hammond Tract.' If offer is accepted, contract to be written which would be legally binding between both parties. Any timber considered unfit for merchantable lumber, and that would be fit for cross-ties, the price to be eight cents per tie. This is only binding provided W. H. Watkins, Tunnelton, W. Va., can give a clear title for his interest.

"Orleans Road, W. Va., 10-27-1899. Mr. Thomas Boswell, Baltimore, Md.: Dear Sir—We write you to-day in regard to the Tunnelton timber tract. Our Mr. Andrew and John and A. E. Billmeyer were up to see the timber, and just came home to-day. Also signed agreement which we mail to you. Mr. A. E. Billmeyer would not sign the agreement, as he says that he is not connected with the Billmeyer Lumber Company any more but you said when I was down at Baltimore it made no difference; it would be all right with us three. A. E. B., he has been deranged ever since he went to have the agreement written, and unfit to do any business. May be we will have to send him for treatment. We will make agreements to go ahead to manufacture the lumber. We are very sorry this thing has happened. They cut one tree and had it scaled by Mr. Watkins, and it scaled 109 feet. Hoping every thing is satisfactory to you. If you get any letters from A. E. Billmeyer pay no attention to them, as he is most liable to say anything. You know how he was when he was to Baltimore. We remain yours truly, Billmeyer Lumber Co., Frank Billmeyer."

"Oct. 30th, 1899. Mess. Billmeyer Lumber Co., Orleans Cross Roads, W. Va.: Gentlemen—Your favor of the 27th and agreement to hand. On account of the turn things have taken we will have to demand a bond from you for the value of the timber, say $10,000. Unless this is arranged by the fifth of November (Nov. 5th) we shall have to call the deal off. Yours very truly, T. T. Boswell, (S.)"

"Oct. 26th, 1899. Billmeyer Lumber Co., Orleans Cross Roads, W. Va.—What do you intend to do about the timber? Answer. Merchants Coal Co."

"Orleans Road, W. Va., 11-4-1899. Mr. Thos. Boswell, President Merchants Coal Company, Baltimore, Md.—Your letter of 30th ult. at hand. In reply would say, we expect to cut the timber regardless of the bond which you require. Mr. Gordon, of Cumberland, says if Mr. A. E. Billmeyer is insane, as he is pronounced, would not sign the agreement, would not make any change to the Co. Hoping every thing will be satisfactory to you, we will do as we agreed; you may depend upon that. We are yours truly, Billmeyer Lumber Co., Frank Billmeyer."

"Received at Baltimore, Md. No. 2 Donnell Building, Oct. 9th, 1899. Dated Orleans Road, W. Va., 9. To Thomas T. Boswell, 33 S. Gay St.—A. E. Billmeyer has not come home. Know any thing about where he is? Answer. Frank Billmeyer."

Gay St., Baltimore, Md.: Sir—In answer to yours of recent date permit me to say that I would not sign the agreement and the other members signed it against my wishes. I am the general manager of the Billmeyer L. Co. and it was me that wrote the conditions of the deal and I will hold you to said conditions exactly as written therein. I will see that our part is fulfilled to the very letter, and will hold your company responsible for your part of it. I will not give any bond as that was not mentioned in the original bargain. We have commenced operations all right and will cut and ship 300,000 feet or more within the next year. Awaiting your reply, I am, Yours truly, Allen E. Billmeyer."

"Nov. 14th, 1899. Mess. Billmeyer Lumber Co., Orleans Cross Roads, W. Our Mr. A. E. Billmeyer will now sign the agreements, being restored to his usual good health. Please return the agreement you hold for his signature at the earliest date possible, and oblige, Yours truly, Billmeyer Lumber Co., A. E. B."

The defendant introduced no evidence.

On the bill, answer, and general replication, the case is plainly for the defendants, as the contract proves itself, the making thereof not being denied by affidavit.

The only question, therefore, is, does the proof sustain the plaintiff's bill? Without any pleading to this effect the plaintiff claims that its contract has been avoided, first, because not signed by one of the defendants, who refused to sign the same, no doubt, because it departed materially from the original accepted proposition of sale, in that it reserved to the plaintiff an almost unlimited right of forfeiture. It was wholly unnecessary for the defendants to sign or acknowledge such contract, unless for the purpose of compelling them to submit to its departure from the original proposition. Nor was it necessary for any of them to sign and acknowledge it for this purpose, but the mere acceptance thereof and acting thereunder would bind them to its provisions. West Virginia, C. & P. R. R. Co. v. McIntire, 44 W. Va. 210, 28 S. E. 696. Signature and acknowledgment on the part of the defendants were extralegal requirements, not rendering the contract any more binding than acceptance otherwise. Nor had the plaintiff any right to demand of the defendants a bond, for they are not shown to have been insolvent, and such requirement is not included in the original proposition. All the defendants, including Allen E., accepted the contract in so far as it corresponded with the original proposition, and even he afterwards waived his objections and agreed to it. This they had a right to do, and this substituted the final contract, with its departures therefrom, for the original accepted proposition. The provision in the original proposition, to wit, "If offer accepted contract to be written which would be legally binding between both parties," did not authorize the use therein of the forfeiture clause, nor the requirement of a bond without the consent of the defendants. The conclusion, therefore, must be that the contract relied on by the defendants was a binding contract between the plaintiff and defendants from the beginning, in so far as it adhered to the original proposition.

Second, because of the forfeiture of the contract by reason of the failure of the defendants to begin operation thereunder in time. Under this head plaintiff insists that because the defendants failed to commence operations on or before the 1st of November, 1899, as stipulated, it had the right to and did annul the contract and make a new contract, similar in effect, with Henry J. Wilmoth. As Wilmoth is not a party thereto, his rights are in no manner involved in this suit, nor can they be considered in the determination hereof. The plaintiff, to sustain its contention under this head, introduces in evidence the following correspondence between it and the defendants, to wit:

"March 1st, 1900. Mess. Billmeyer Lumber Co., Orleans Cross Roads, W. Va.: Gentlemen—Your favor of the 28th to hand and noted. We beg to state that this property has been disposed of to Mr. Wilmoth, of Meyersdale, Pennsylvania, who has made payments and will commence operations about April 1st. This was done as you did not comply with our agreement. Yours very truly, Merchants Coal Company, Boswell."

"Orleans Cross Roads, W. Va., July 21st, 1900. Mr. Thos. T. Boswell, Pres. Merchants Coal Co., Baltimore, Md.: Dear Sir—Mr. A. H. Billmeyer and Frank Billmeyer are now at Tunnelton, W. Va., at work on the Hammond timber tract. They have commenced cutting logs and will be ready for a scaler on Monday, July 30th, at which time we will commence sawing lumber. Please advise us as to who you may want to do the scaling, or if we shall pick a man to be on hand at the time named. We expect to cut from 300 to 400 thousand feet of the chestnut timber at once, and have leased the W. H. Watkins mill to do the sawing. Please advise us promptly as to the scaler, as we do not want to be delayed on that account. Yours truly, Billmeyer Lumber Co."

"July 23d, 1900. Mess. Billmeyer Lumber Co., Orleans Cross Roads, W. Va.: Dear Sirs—Your favor of 21st to hand and noted. You did not carry out your agreement, consequently we have sold the timber to H. J. Wilmoth, Meyersdale, Pa., and do not know you in this matter. I have instructed our superintendent at Tunnelton when your parties commence cutting to have them arrested for trespassing. If they insist on cutting we have them prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law. Yours very truly, Merchants Coal Company, Boswell."

It is not clear from the plaintiff's evidence but that the delay to commence operations was caused, to some extent at least, by the plaintiff's failure to adhere strictly to its original proposition, and in unnecessarily requiring the defendants to sign and acknowledge a contract legally binding on them without such signatures and acknowledgments, and also in demanding a bond of them before they should begin operations or the contract be binding. All these extralegal requirements necessarily tend to produce confusion, uncertainty, and delay. The provision in the original proposition is in these words: "Operations to commence on said timber on or before November 1st, 1899, and to remove at least 300,000 feet per year and all timber to be removed within four years from November 1st, 1899." Under this provision the failure to begin in time would not be sufficient to cause a forfeiture of the contract, although the defendants might be liable for all damages occasioned thereby. A removal of 300,000 feet within the remainder of the year would no doubt be deemed a full satisfaction thereof and compliance therewith. Substantially, although more at length, the same provision is contained in the final contract, but the plaintiff had inserted a forfeiture clause, to wit: "It is further understood and agreed that if the said parties of the second part should fail to carry out and comply faithfully with all the terms and conditions of this agreement * * * then the said party of the first part shall have the right at its option to declare this agreement null and void." It is under this provision that the plaintiff claims to have the right to declare the contract null and void because the defendants failed to commence operations on or before the 1st day of November, 1899, although the plaintiff was at the time hindering operations under the contract by reason of its extralegal requirements. If the plaintiff had filed a bill to have the contract canceled by reason of its forfeiture as a cloud on its title, the matter might have been properly presented and considered by a court of equity. But on evidence alone, without allegations or pleadings, or an opportunity for defendants to explain their delay, in a matter purely pecuniary and subject to satisfaction in damages, it is asking too much of a court of equity to treat the solemn contract of the parties as a nullity, in short, to enforce the forfeiture thereof against the defendants. If the contract was clearly void, and irreparable damage might be done, equity might possibly interfere. But where it is a matter of the lapse of time, not plainly of the essence of the contract, and the question of irreparable damages or insolvency is not involved, and any damages the plaintiff may have sustained are susceptible of pecuniary adjustment, equity will not interfere in doubtful cases, but will leave the parties to their legal remedies.

On the question of the forfeiture of their contract by reason of unreasonable delay in beginning operations thereunder, without fault of the plaintiff, the defendants have the right to be impleaded and heard either at law or in equity, and such question cannot be justly determined from the evidence on the one side alone, in the absence of proper allegations or pleadings. The bill seeks to enjoin an irreparable trespass. This ground is abandoned. But by the proof the plaintiff attempts to establish a forfeiture of its contract under which the defendants justify, thus raising doubtful questions both of law and fact, and changing the nature of the case to be decided. Plaintiff might have presented this whole matter in its bill, but it did not do so, and it must endure the consequences of such failure. It is well settled that where the plaintiff's rights depend on disputed questions of fact, or on disputed questions of law which have not been adjusted by a court of law, an injunction will be refused, although a court of equity may be satisfied as to what is the correct conclusion of the law on the facts. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 358, 359, 360; 10 Enc. Pleading & Practice, 1095.

For these reasons, the decree is affirmed.

SPERRY v. SWIGER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1903.)

DOWER—ACTION TO RECOVER—LIMITATIONS—WIDOW IN POSSESSION.

1. The statutory bar to a widow's remedies for recovery of dower is 10 years from the death of her husband, when her right to sue accrues. But where the widow is in possession, and taking rents and profits in common with the heirs, the statute does not run against her dower right while so in possession.

2. Where a will devises land to the widow of the testator to hold under her control and management until testator's youngest child attains majority, with direction to apply its rents and profits to the support of minor children until of age, and the widow is in possession under such will, the statute of limitations does not run against her dower right while so in possession.

3. To bar a widow's dower right for failure to renounce her husband's will, the will must make a provision for her use and benefit, and must be intended by the testator to be in lieu of dower.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Bill by M. G. Sperry against Mary O. Swiger and others. Decree for defendant Cunningham, and plaintiff and defendant Swiger appeal. Affirmed.

M. G. Sperry and E. G. Smith, for appellant. T. N. Parks, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. Franklin Cunningham died owning a tract of land, leaving a will containing this provision: "I give, devise and bequeath to my wife, Susan L. Cunningham, all my estate both real and personal or mixed of which I shall die seised and possessed or to which I shall be entitled at my decease, * * * to have and to hold the same to her control and management until my youngest child shall arrive at twenty-one years of age, it is further provided in this my will that the property herein devised and bequeathed my wife, Susan L. Cunningham, shall by the rents and profits of said property be applied as a support and home for my minor children until they arrive at twenty-one years of age." M. G. Sperry brought a suit in equity in Harrison county against Susan L. Cunningham, widow of said decedent, and his heirs, to partition the land; denying in his bill that said widow had any dower right; claiming that, as she had not renounced the will, she was for that reason barred of dower, and that she was also barred of dower for the further reason that more than 10 years had passed since the death of her husband, and that she was barred by limitation. She had been in possession 11 years after the death of her husband before the suit. The youngest child had attained majority. The court decreed dower to her, and Sperry and Mary C. Swiger, one of the heirs, appeal.

Is Mrs. Cunningham entitled to dower? This depends upon several questions. Does the general statute of limitations, "No person shall make an entry on, or bring an action to recover, any land, but within ten years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or to bring such action shall have first accrued to himself or to some person through whom he claims" (Code 1899, c. 104, § 1), apply to dower right? If we follow the cases of Morris v. Roseberry, 46 W. Va. 24, 32 S. E. 1019, and Smith v. Wehrle, 41 W. Va. 270, 23 S. E. 712, holding that "the statutory bar to a widow's remedies for the recovery of her dower is the lapse of ten years from the death of her husband, when her right to sue accrues," we must say that a dower right is barred by that statute. But it is said that Smith v. Wehrle is too broad in its syllabus; that those cases cannot apply to a contest between a widow and heirs, but only to one claiming by conveyance from the heirs, or sale under a deed of trust given by the husband, or sale under decree where there is adverse possession by color of title. In Smith v. Wehrle the case was between the widow and a purchaser at a sale under a deed of trust given by the husband, and it seems plain that the statute would in such case bar dower. In Morris v. Roseberry, however, the case was between the widow and one of the heirs who obtained a tax deed. It was held that the dower was barred. We may say this was a hostile claim under a tax deed, but, as this tax deed inured to the benefit of the heirs, we may regard the case as holding that as between the widow and heirs the statute applies. It followed the syllabus in Smith v. Wehrle. The argumentation in the latter case goes to apply the statute as well in a contest between the widow and heirs as to one between her and alienees of the heirs. Is the syllabus in those cases too broad? Are they wrong? I assented to them because I thought them sound law. I still think so. The possession of the heirs is not the possession of the widow, like coparceners or tenants in common, nor is there privity between them: "Nor does she, as tenant in dower, hold her estate of the heir or tenant who set it out to her, but of her deceased husband, or, rather, by appointment of law. The law, moreover, does not consider that there is any privity of estate between the dowress and the reversitioner of her lands." 1 Washb. R. Prop. § 486. We will find cases holding that the statute does not bar dower, but it will seem that in most of those such decisions are upon statutes taken from the English Act 21 Jac. 1, which bars only where there is a right of entry, and as a widow, until assignment of dower, has no estate or right of entry, the statute was held not to apply to her. So some are on statutes taken from 32 Henry VIII, requiring seisin in the person to be barred, and a widow had no seisin. 2 Scrib. on Dower, §§ 12, 17; Barnard v. Edwards, 17 Am. Dec. 403; Moore v. Frost, 3 N. H. 126; Parker v. Obear, 7 Metc. 24. But no seisin or right of entry in case of dower is required by our statute above quoted. Though a widow has no seisin, right of entry, or vested estate before assignment of dower, yet our Code 1899, c. 65, § 10, says that a widow entitled to dower "may recover said dower and damage for its being withheld by such remedy at law as would lie on behalf of a tenant for life having a right of entry or by bill in equity." This gives her right to sue at once upon the husband's death. There may be a few states not having statutes imported from England, but general statutes that hold them not applicable to dower, but the bulk of decisions hold that general statutes of limitations limiting suits generally for recovery of possession of land apply to dower. In Conover v. Wright, 47 Am. Dec. 213, the New Jersey court said of an act "that every real, possessory, ancestral or mixed or other action for land * * * shall be brought within 20 years after the right or title thereto shall accrue," that "it, in very terms, applies to all actions for the recovery of land, and it is difficult to see how it can fail to apply to an action for dower. It bars not the right of entry, merely, but any action brought for recovery of land. Land is sought to be recovered in this action, and the widow's title becomes absolute on the death of the husband." In Procter v. Bigelow, 38 Mich. 232, the statute was: "No person shall commence an action for the recovery of lands, nor make entry thereon, unless within 20 years after the right to make such entry or bring such action first accrued." The court said: "If Mrs. Bigelow could have brought an action of ejectment in 1851 [it is not pretended that she could not have done so], she comes within the plain terms of the statute. We are not called upon to discuss the propriety of the old decisions, which certainly strained the law very much to favor dower. The forms of remedy under which that overnice casuistry was adopted have been changed into a single and universal remedy, which will not permit any different treatment of suitors. All must be governed by the same regulations." I cite the following further cases to show that the general statutes of limitation for actions for land apply to dower: Beebe v. Lyle, 73 Mich. 114, 40 N. W. 944; Robinson v. Ware, 94 Mo. 673, 8 S. W. 153; Beard v. Hale, 95 Mo. 18, 8 S. W. 156; Branch v. Cole, 18 Fla. 363; Care v. Keller, 77 Pa. 490; Durham v. Angier, 20 Me. 242; Berrien v. Conover, 16 N. J. Law, 107; Larrowe v. Bean, 10 Ohio, 498; Phares v. Walters, 6 Iowa, 106; Lide v. Reynolds, 1 Brev. 78; 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 205; Westbrook v.

Hawkins, 59 Miss. 498; Owen v. Peacock, 38 Ill. 33. In Jones v. Powell, 6 Johns. Ch. 194, Chancellor Kent said that, even under a statute like the English act, "no action for the recovery of any land," etc., "shall be maintained," etc., "unless on seisin or possession," etc., "either of the plaintiff or of his ancestor," "the general and sweeping language of this act, no less than the sound policy of it, would dictate the application of it to dower as well as to any real action." He held that limitation would bar the common-law writ of dower unde nihil habet. Many cases in South Carolina so hold. Ramsay v. Dozier, 1 Tread. Const. 76, and other cases cited in 2 Scrib. Dower, 576. In 2 Scrib. 578, after stating that there is some conflict, the author says: "The general doctrine in regard to limitation of actions is that the cause of action or suit arises as soon as the party has a right to apply to the proper tribunal for relief. In many states the widow has right by law to proceed for the recovery and assignment of her dower immediately upon the death of her husband. [Such is the West Virginia act.] It is immaterial to her whether the heir or a stranger asserting an adverse title, is in possession. Her right of action is as perfect and complete against the one as the other. In this respect there is an essential difference between the case of a dowress and a party having title to land. Until the possession of the latter is disturbed or invaded, no cause of action arises in his favor, and consequently until that time the statute cannot commence to run against him. But as the widow can assert her claim and bring her action at once, it would seem, upon the principle above laid down, that it should be considered as coming within the operation of the statute." It is not a question of adverse possession—not a question whether the heirs deny or admit the dower right. She can sue regardless of this. If they do not assign dower, which the law says they must do without demand, they unlawfully withhold dower, in the eye of the law. Our Code 1899, c. 65, § 8, says: "Until her dower is assigned the widow shall be entitled to demand of the heirs or devisees one third part of the issues and profits of the other real estate which was devised or descended to them, of which she is dowable, and in the meantime may hold, occupy and enjoy the mansion house and curtilage without charge." Being in possession of the mansion and curtilage, of course, the statute does not run against her as to them. Westbrook v. Hawkins, 59 Miss. 499. This implies that the possession is adverse as to other land. But this statute excludes her from possession of the balance of the land until dower is assigned. It is in the possession of the heirs. Of course, she is not co-tenant with them, like a coparcener. All she has is a money demand for a part of the issues of the other land. Where one gets all the profits or issues of land, he is, in equity, owner; but the dowress is not, under this statute, co-tenant, so as to enable her to say that the heirs must bring home notice of hostile claim, for, to be co-tenant, one must have right to joint possession with another. The cases of Smith v. Wehrle and Morrison v. Roseberry seem to be well grounded, in their most general sense, on authority. They have stood some years, are a rule of property, and, even if there were some doubt of their correctness, should not be disturbed. I have no doubt as to them. Why should a claim of dower not fall under the statute? Shall mere sympathy exclude it? You bar other claims to land. You bar a married woman as to her separate estate. The heirs do not hold in trust for her. Their rights are hostile, antagonistic. If the widow is in actual possession along with the heirs, taking rents and profits, or sharing them with the heirs, her right is not barred. Hastings v. Mace, 157 Mass. 502, 32 N. E. 668, cited in 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 205.

Another question. Mrs. Cunningham was in possession of the whole tract. Does this prevent the bar of the statute? As just stated, if a widow is in possession along with heirs, sharing in the issues and profits of the land, the statute does not run against her dower while so in possession. It is said that this possession by Mrs. Cunningham does not save her from the statute, as she was in possession, not in right of her dower, but as trustee for her children, bound to give them all the issues of the land, and that her possession as trustee was their possession, and that she recognized a trust for them in antagonism to her right; but I think the true theory is this: She was in the mansion by right, and the statute could not bar her as to that. She need not sue for it, as she already had it; and, as to the residue of the land, she could subtract from its rents and profits one-third, notwithstanding the trust, and a court of equity would not charge her as trustee with that third. Thus, while the law is that when there is a right of action the statute runs, yet here she need bring no suit, as she already had what a suit would give—actual possession and rents and profits.

Do the provisions of the will bar Mrs. Cunningham of dower, under section 11, c. 78, Code 1899, she not having renounced the will? By the letter of that statute, to bar dower by reason of acceptance of the provision made in a will for a widow, there must be in the will a provision made for her benefit. Moreover, that provision must appear to have been intended by the testator to be in lieu of dower. Shuman v. Shuman, 9 W. Va. 50; Cunningham v. Cunningham, 30 W. Va. 599, 604, 5 S. E. 139. This will gives nothing to the widow. It takes all away from her. Surely we cannot say that her husband intended to deprive her of dower.

Therefore we affirm the decree.

RONK v. HIGGINBOTHAM et al.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 21, 1903.)EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE—DEED BY COMMISSIONER.

1. In an action of ejectment, unless both plaintiff and defendant claim title from a common source, the plaintiff must connect himself by an unbroken chain of title with the state or commonwealth.

2. Point 3 in Wilson v. Braden et al., 36 S. E. 367, 48 W. Va. 196, approved and applied.

3. Points 5 and 6 in Coal Co. v. Howell, 15 S. E. 214, 38 W. Va. 490, approved and applied. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Lincoln County; El. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Action by H. D. Ronk against A. E. Higginbotham and Newton Carrier. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

D. E. Wilkinson and W. S. Laidley, for plaintiffs in error. A. F. Morris, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. On the 28th day of November, 1899, H. D. Ronk, the defendant in error, filed his declaration in ejectment, in the circuit court of Lincoln county, against A. E. Higginbotham and Newton Carrier, defendants below and plaintiffs in error, alleging that plaintiff, on the 15th day of January, 1899, "was possessed of an estate in fee absolute of a certain tract or parcel of land, lying and being in the said county of Lincoln, containing 294 acres, more or less," and bounded as follows: "Situate on Island creek, a tributary of Coal river, beginning at a stake in a line of the John Kidd survey of 63 acres on Board Tree Branch," etc.; to which declaration the defendants entered their plea of not guilty, and issue was thereon joined; and, at the November Term, 1901, a jury being waived by the parties, the court heard the evidence in lieu of a jury, found for the plaintiff, and gave judgment in his favor, against the defendants, for the tract of land as described, with one cent damages for the detention thereof, and his costs in said action expended. Plaintiffs in error excepted to said finding and judgment of the court, and moved the court to set the same aside and to render judgment in their favor in said action, but the court overruled the motion. Whereupon plaintiffs in error tendered their bill of exceptions to the ruling and judgment of the court aforesaid, which bill was signed and sealed by the court, and made part of the record. On the trial of the action, the plaintiff, to maintain the issue on his part, introduced certain evidence, all of which was objected to by defendants; and the defendants, to maintain the issue on their part, also introduced certain other evidence. The whole of said evidence, adduced and considered by the court, is certified in bills of exception, and made parts of the record.

Plaintiff put in evidence a patent from the commonwealth of Virginia to Webb Tomlinson, bearing date on the 25th day of September, 1795, reciting "that by virtue of a land office treasury warrant number nine hundred and ten, issued the first day of December, 1794, there is granted by the said commonwealth unto Webb Tomlinson a certain tract or parcel of land containing ten thousand acres by survey bearing date the second day of January, 1795, lying and being in the county of Kanawha, on the waters of Davis creek, and bounded as follows, to wit: Beginning at two white oaks, corner to said Tomlinson's survey of 10,000 acres, number eight, and running south eighty degrees west 2,000 poles to a white oak, S. 10 E. 800 poles to a black oak, N. 80 E. 2,000 poles to two white oaks, N. 10 west 800 poles to the beginning"; and also introduced a decree of the circuit superior court of law and chancery of Kanawha county, state of Virginia, made on the 24th day of October, 1840, reciting that "James M. Laidley and Thomas L. A. Mathews, commissioners of delinquent and forfeited lands in and for Kanawha county, this day made report, in pursuance of the several acts of assembly relating to delinquent and forfeited lands, to the circuit superior court of law and chancery for said county, of a tract of 10,000 acres of land lying and being in this county on the waters of Davis creek and Coal river, the lines, boundaries, and abutments of which said tract or parcel of land are fully set out and described in the report of the commissioners, and more particularly shown and illustrated by a plat, accompanying and making a part of said report, made from a recent survey by the commissioners, and which tract or parcel of 10,000 acres of land was granted by the commonwealth of Virginia unto said Webb Tomlinson by patent bearing date the 25th day of September, 1795," etc. The decree also directs a sale of said land by said commissioners on terms prescribed therein.

Plaintiff then introduced in evidence another decree of said court, made on the 17th day of May, 1841, in words and purport as follows: "James M. Laidley and Thomas S. A. Mathews, commissioners of delinquent and forfeited lands in and for the county of Kanawha, this day made report that in pursuance of a decretal order made in relation to the parcel of 10,000 acres of land forfeited in the name of Webb Tomlinson, and pronounced at the October term, 1840, they proceeded to make sale of the same, having divided it into two separate lots. * * * That said parcel of land, containing, by recent survey, 10,000 acres, sold in lots or divisions as aforesaid, produced the aggregate sum of $151.25; * * * and the said report not being excepted to, on examination and consideration thereof, is approved and confirmed. * * * It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed, on the payment of the purchasers of the deferred installments, that the commissioners, by apt and proper deed or deeds, convey to him said land purchased by him as aforesaid, in pursuance of the acts of assembly in relation thereto," etc. Next follows a deed made by James M. Laidley and Thomas S. A. Mathews, commissioners of delinquent and forfeited lands, to Joel Shrewsberry, Jr., bearing date on the 5th day of May, 1841, reciting a decree made by said court "at the fall term of said court in 1840," and that they "did offer at public sale at the door of the courthouse aforesaid, on the — day of December, 1840, among others, the tract or parcel of land hereinafter described; and at the public sale the said Joel Shrewsberry, Jr., the party of the second part, being the highest bidder, became the purchaser of lot or tract No. 2, containing four thousand two hundred acres, more or less, being part of a tract or parcel of land of ten thousand acres lying and being in the county of Kanawha, on the waters of Davis creek, granted by the commonwealth letters patent bearing date the 25th of September, 1795, to Webb Tomlinson, and forfeited and sold in same name, as more fully and at large appears by the reports, decretal orders, and other proceedings in relation thereto and now remaining in the said circuit superior court, reference thereunto being had; and which said lot or tract No. 2, part of the said tract of ten thousand acres, is situated on the west side of Coal river, in the county aforesaid, and more fully set out and described as lot No. 2 in the plat and report of the commissioners filed with and made part of the proceeding aforesaid; which said lot No. 2 is bounded as follows: Beginning at a post, corner to No. 1 on the bank of Coal river," etc. Said deed appears to have been acknowledged by said commissioners on the 7th day of May, 1841, and admitted to record the same day. By their deed, bearing date on the 5th day of May, 1841, and acknowledged on the 11th day of May, 1841, said Shrewsberry and his wife conveyed said land, by the description last aforesaid, to Joseph H. Harvey, with covenants of special warranty, for the consideration of $1. Said Joseph H. Harvey and his wife, by their deed bearing date on the 21st day of November, 1870, conveyed said land to William S. Wilson by the same description, and, as stated in the deed, "being the same tract conveyed by Joel Shrewsberry and wife to Joseph H. Harvey, by deed bearing date on the 5th day of May, 1841." William S. Wilson and his wife, by their deed bearing date on the 5th day of September, 1873, for the consideration of $1, conveyed said land to Robert T. Harvey and Thomas H. Harvey, by the description aforesaid, but excepting certain portions thereof which had theretofore been sold. Next, in the order as mentioned, come the following deeds, showing that Robert T. Harvey and wife, and Thomas H. Harvey, by deed bearing date on the 6th day of January, 1874, for the consideration of $1, conveyed to Alfred Sperry, Ethello W. Hale, and Willard P. Sperry the following described tract of land, lying and being in the county of Lincoln, and bounded as follows: "Beginning at a Sycamore on Coal River, containing about 1,100 acres," etc.; that Ira P. Sperry, S. J. Ritchie, and Willis Sperry, and their wives, by deed bearing date on the 11th day of August, 1888, conveyed to George F. Miller and B. F. Enslow the said tract of 1,100 acres, by the description last aforesaid; and that George F. Miller and B. F. Enslow, and their wives, by deed bearing date on the 9th day of July, 1895, conveyed to the plaintiff, H. D. Ronk, "all their right, title and interest in and to the land, owned by them on the waters of Coal river and Island creek in Lincoln county, West Virginia, consisting of four tracts." All are described by metes and bounds. The first contains 294 acres, and is the land in controversy.

A. C. Hilbert, a surveyor who had surveyed the land in controversy, testified that he had surveyed it at the instance of said H. D. Ronk by the deed to him from Miller and Enslow. He had made a plat of his survey of the land, which covered the said 294 acres. The plat was introduced with the evidence. Thos. J. Mathews, who testified that he had been a surveyor about 48 years, was examined as follows: "Have you surveyed that portion of Webb Tomlinson's survey introduced here in evidence, lying on the west side of Coal river? Ans. Yes, sir. Q. Please state whether the land conveyed in the deed from James M. Laidley and Thomas L. A. Mathews to Joel Shrewsberry, introduced in evidence here, covers the same land as the patent to Webb Tomlinson's land that lies on the west side of Coal river? Ans. I don't know as I ever saw the patent. I have run out the land by the deed. Q. I hand you the patent to Webb Tomlinson for 10,000 acres. Please state whether the land mentioned in that patent covers the land mentioned in the deed to Joel Shrewsberry? Ans. It has the same corners and distances." Witness further stated that he was acquainted with the 4,200-acre tract, a part of the Webb Tomlinson survey that lies on the west side of Coal river; that he had surveyed it; run out of it the prior claims, and divided it into lots for the Harveys, or Enslow and Miller; that he was familiar with a lot of that land purchased by Ronk, the plaintiff; and that the land claimed by plaintiff, and described in his declaration, is part of said 4,200 acres.

H. D. Ronk, the plaintiff, testified that the land in controversy lies in Lincoln county, on the waters of Island creek, on the west side of Coal river, and that defendants were in possession of it at the commencement of this action. Thereupon the plaintiff rested his case.

The defendants then introduced a patent from the commonwealth of Virginia to Daniel Shaver, bearing date on the 27th day of September, 1796, which recites that by virtue of a land office treasury warrant No. 8,819, issued on the 2d day of April, 1872, there is granted by the said commonwealth unto Daniel Shaver a certain tract of land, containing 256 acres by survey bearing date the 7th day of May, 1791, lying and being in the county of Kanawha, on Island creek, a branch of Coal river. This was followed by various deeds down to defendants (under which they claim the land in controversy), with other evidence tending to prove adversary possession of the land, and payment of the taxes thereon for the required number of years under the statute.

Plaintiffs in error contend that the judgment and rulings of the court below are erroneous, because the plaintiff failed to identify and establish his title to the real estate described in his declaration, and also failed to trace his title either to a common source or to the commonwealth, and because the court refused to set aside its said judgment and render judgment in favor of the defendants. In an action of ejectment the general rule is that a plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of defendants' title, and that before the plaintiff can recover he must identify the land claimed, so far as the exterior boundaries are concerned. Coal Co. v. Howell, 88 W. Va. 490, 15 S. E. 214; Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 763. Plaintiff introduced no survey of the 10,000 acres of which said 294 acres is claimed to be a part. We are not informed by any evidence where the exterior boundaries of the 10,000 acres are. It is not shown that the land in controversy was ever included in the county of Kanawha. The deed of said commissioners, purporting to convey said 4,200 acres to Shrewsberry, is not accompanied by any of the reports, decretal orders, or other proceedings, or with the plat and report stated to have been filed with, and made part of, said proceeding, which are referred to in said deed, except the decretal order of October 24, 1840, hereinbefore mentioned. It will be observed that the decree of the 17th day of May, 1841, confirming the sale of 10,000 acres sold by said commissioners, was made and entered 12 days after said deed was made to Shrewsberry. This deed having been acknowledged by said commissioners on the 7th day of May, 1841, and admitted to record the same day, as the certificate of the clerk of the county court of said county, appended thereto, shows, could not have been and was not authorized by said decretal order of May 17, 1841, which order does not mention Shrewsberry or any other person by name as purchaser of said 4,200 acres. There is no other decree in the record conferring authority to execute said deed. In the case of Walton v. Hale, 9 Grat. 197, 198, the court says: "But in this case it seems to me the caveator has utterly failed in connecting himself with the Ruston and Blanchard title. The commissioner to make sales under the delinquent land laws, under which these proceedings were had, has no interest in the subject of sale. He acts like a commissioner to make sales under a decree of the chancery court, and is clothed with a mere naked authority. Having no interest in the land conveyed, the deed of the commissioner could avail nothing where his authority to make it did not appear, unless there had been such a long acquiescence and possession under the deed as to justify a presumption in favor of the deed, as was the case in Robnett v. Preston's Heirs, 4 Grat. 141. In this case no such presumption can be raised. The caveator has rested his right upon the deed and the proceedings which led to it. In such a case, and as against a stranger setting up an adverse claim to the title asserted, the recitals in the deed are no evidence. Carver v. Jackson, 4 Pet. 1, 83 [7 L. Ed. 761]; Wiley v. Givens, 6 Grat. 277. In the case of Masters v. Varner's Ex'rs, 5 Grat. 168 [50 Am. Dec. 114], a decree of the chancery court and the marshal's deed were offered in evidence. The decree did not describe the specific land directed to be conveyed, but it was described with sufficient certainty in the deed. The court held that the recitals in the marshal's deed were no evidence, as against a third person asserting an adverse claim, of the authority of the marshal to convey the specific tract, and that, as the decree left it uncertain, it was necessary to produce the whole record, or so much thereof as would show that the land conveyed was the land embraced in the suit, before the deed could be used as evidence. In the case under consideration, the report of sales set out that Raper, Graham, and Allison were the purchasers. By the eighth section of the act of March 30, 1837, it was the duty of the court to direct the commissioner to convey to the purchasers upon the payment of the purchase money; and the ninth section of the act of 15th March, 1838, declares that the purchaser shall, on application to the commissioner, be entitled to his deed upon the payment of the purchase money. By each act the authority of the commissioner is limited to a conveyance to the purchasers. The deed in this case is to a stranger, if regard be had to the record of the proceedings which are relied on as authorizing the commissioner to convey. The name of Walton nowhere appears as purchaser, or as having any interest in the subject." In Wilson v. Braden, 48 W. Va. 196, 200, 36 S. E. 368, this court said: "In this record is a deed made by Camp, as commissioner under a decree of a Virginia court, conveying land to Donaldson as trustee. If Donaldson had any title, he got it by this deed; but not a letter of authority in Camp to make this deed is shown. The decree giving Camp power to convey does not appear; not an item of the Virginia record was produced. This was essential to give any effect whatever to that deed. You must give in evidence, as a general rule, in such case, the whole record; but surely enough to show that the party holding the title to the land and the land were before the court; that that land was decreed to be sold, and was sold, and the sale confirmed and authority given by decree to the commissioner to convey. That commissioner does not own the land. He has a mere naked authority, uncoupled with any personal interest. His authority to make the very deed for the very land he conveys must appear by the record. This has been so often held. Waggoner v. Wolf, 28 W. Va. 820. The recital in that deed of Camp's authority under decree is no evidence against third parties claiming adversely to it, and denying his authority to convey. Walton v. Hale, 9 Grat. 198. Yet this deed went in evidence for Braden to show title, to connect Braden with the old patent, and was used by the jury as such in connection with said instruction. That deed did not show title. It did not connect Braden with the patent of 1784." See, also, Watson v. Smith, 13 Johns. 426. For the same reasons, we say that the deed of Laidley and Mathews, as commissioners, to Shrewsberry, does not connect the plaintiff with the patent issued to Tomlinson by the commonwealth of Virginia for the 10,000 acres.

It will be further observed that Alfred Sperry, Ethello W. Hale, and Willard P. Sperry, the grantees of Robert T. Harvey and Thomas H. Harvey of the 1,100 acres, have not, so far as the record discloses, conveyed said land to any person. The description of the 1,100 acres of land contained in the said deed from S. J. Ritchie, Willis Sperry, and J. P. Sperry, and their wives, to Miller and Enslow, is similar to the description of the 1,100 acres in the deed of the Harveys to their grantees above mentioned, but there is no evidence in the case to explain how the grantors of Miller and Enslow derived their title. So far as it appears, the title to the said 1,100 acres conveyed by the Harveys is outstanding in Alfred Sperry, Ethello W. Hale, and Willard P. Sperry. This is fatal to plaintiff's case. In Coal Co. v. Howell, 38 W. Va. 506, 15 S. E. 221, the court says: "And the reason for it is that the defendant in possession, and the prima facie owner, is not required to give up the possession until the true owner demands it. And the doctrine of setting up a subsisting outstanding title in a stranger rests upon the same foundation." "Where a plaintiff relies on documentary proof of title, a complete title must be shown; and, if a material link be wanting, his documentary proof should be excluded from the jury." Jenkins v. Noel, 3 Stew. 60. In this case there are two material links lacking. Besides, the plaintiff has not sufficiently identified the 10,000-acre tract of land, of which said 294 acres in controversy is claimed to be a part. Neither has he shown an unbroken chain of title thereto from the commonwealth of Virginia to himself. But, on the contrary, so far as the record discloses, the title to said 294 acres was, at the commencement of plaintiff's action, and still is, in the grantees of Robert T. and Thomas H. Harvey.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the circuit court aforesaid is erroneous, and must be reversed and set aside, and a judgment rendered by this court for the defendants.

ARMSTRONG v. TAYLOR COUNTY COURT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 16, 1908.)

COUNTY ROAD—DISCONTINUANCE.

1. Under section 30, c. 43, Code 1899, the county court may discontinue the portion of a county road made highly dangerous to the traveling public by the legal occupancy and use thereof by a railroad, and their discretion in so doing cannot be controlled by prohibition.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition by A. Armstrong for writ of prohibition to the county court of Taylor county and others. Writ denied.

W. Gordon Mathews, for petitioner. Walter Penderleton, B. F. Bailey, and Reece Blizard, for respondents.

McWHORTER, P. Under section 50, c. 54, Code 1899, and the sixth clause thereof, the Buchanan & Northern Railroad Company applied to the county court of Taylor county for permission to use certain portions of the public road on the west side of the Tygarts Valley river between the west end of Fetterman's Bridge and Short creek, being two certain pieces of said road described in the proceedings, which permission was granted by order of the court. The pieces of road so to be used are on narrow strips of ground lying between perpendicular bluffs and the Tygarts Valley river. The double occupancy of the same as public road and for the railroad will render them highly inconvenient and dangerous both to the public and the railroad, and, as the railroad would have the paramount right of user, the public, in the ordinary means or mode of travel, would be almost entirely excluded therefrom, except at the great risk of life and limb. Many of the citizens of the vicinity, appreciating the great danger from such use of the road, and deeming it wise to have the same discontinued as public roads, petitioned the county court, "because of the extreme danger to the traveling public," to discontinue as public roads the two pieces mentioned. In response to the said petition the county court proceeded, under section 30, c. 43, Code 1899, after giving the notice required by said section, on the 22d of September, to appoint from its own body the three members of the court a committee to view such roads, "and report in writing whether in their opinion any, and, if any, what, inconvenience would result from discontinuing the same." Which committee reported to the regular term of the said county court held on the 10th of October, 1903, recommending the discontinuance of the roads from the mouth of Short creek to the west end of the Fetterman Bridge across the Tygarts Valley river, and that a road in lieu thereof be constructed from the Northwest Turnpike across to said Short Creek road at the earliest convenience, and further reported that they had viewed the road from near the residence of C. N. Mason, the point designated in the petition, down the Tygarts Valley river to the point designated as a station, and had ascertained that said road was a post road and a route for the carrying of United States mails; recommended its discontinuance, but to be kept open for the uses and purposes of carrying the mails until another road in lieu thereof should be constructed, and reported that in their opinion travel on the two sections of road along the site of the Buchanan & Northern Railroad there would be extremely hazardous to the traveling public, and would menace the lives of those who saw fit to travel said road, and that the interests of the citizens and taxpayers of the districts in which said roads were respectively located, and the general safety of the public, would be subserved by the discontinuance of the same, and that, when the proposed roads in lieu of said discontinued sections should be established, it would not inconvenience the traveling public, but it would be a great benefit to the same, and the Buchanan & Northern Railroad Company offered to the said court the sum of $3,000 for the exclusive use and occupation of said two parts and parcels of said road for the purpose of constructing the line of said railroad; and it further appeared to the court that it was desirable and necessary to alter and change the present location of said roads in order to place the same on better ground, and better and more convenient location for the public, and that there would be no inconvenience to the public resulting from the discontinuance of the said two parts, and that the $3,000 so offered by the Buchanan & Northern Railroad Company would build and construct a county road on better ground and more desirable location for the public, and thereupon said parts of said roads were discontinued, but the said post road to be kept open for post road purposes until another road should be established by said court in lieu thereof.

Adolphus Armstrong tendered his petition, praying to be made a party defendant in opposition to the discontinuance of said roads, which was refused to be filed. Under section 30, c. 43, Code 1899, a county court is given authority to discontinue a county road, or portion thereof, whenever the interests of the public demand such discontinuance. It cannot discontinue such road for private benefit of a person or corporation, unless the uses to which such discontinued road should be put is a public use, under the sanction of the Legislature. Pence v. Bryant (decided at the present term) 46 S. E. 275. And the Buchanan & Northern Railroad Company is authorized by law to occupy the portions of the roads discontinued, having first obtained the consent of the lawful authority having control and jurisdiction thereof, under said section 50, c. 54, Code 1899. In State v. County Court, 33 W. Va. 589, 11 S. E. 72, where it is said, "Prohibition is simply the converse of mandamus, and governed by the same principles," point 4 of the syllabus holds that "mandamus cannot be permitted to usurp the place of a writ of error nor appeal, nor will it lie when there is any other adequate and complete remedy"; and point 5, "Mandamus will not lie to compel the county court, under the provisions of section 23, c. 89, Code 1899, to rebuild a county bridge which had been destroyed, when it appears that said court has, under the provisions of chapter 43, Code 1899, decided to build a bridge across the same river 110 yards from the site of the former bridge, and thereby, in effect, deciding to change the location of the former bridge." At page 595, 33 W. Va., page 74, 11 S. E., Judge Snyder, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is a well-established rule, both in mandamus and prohibition, that neither will lie where another specific and adequate remedy exists, nor to correct the errors of inferior courts in matters properly within their jurisdiction. It is a fundamental principle that neither of these writs can be allowed to usurp the functions of a writ of error or certiorari, and can never be employed as a process for the correction of errors of inferior tribunals;" and cites High on Ex. L. Rem. §§ 156, 243; State v. McAuliffe, 48 Mo. 112; McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134. Buskirk v. Judge of the Circuit Court, 7 W. Va. 91 (Syl., point 3): "Prohibition can only be interposed in a clear case of excess of jurisdiction on the part of some inferior judicial tribunal. Where the matter is clearly within the jurisdiction of the inferior court, a mere error in the proceedings may be ground of appeal or review, but not of prohibition." In Haldeman v. Davis, 28 W. Va. 324 (Syl., point 1), it is held: "Prohibition does not lie to restrain an inferior tribunal after its judgment has been given and fully executed." The county court, in case at bar, had completed the discontinuance of the said parcels of road. The only inconvenience that will result to the public is that it will cause those using the ordinary means of traveling on these discontinued roads to travel a longer distance to their places of destination, while they will avoid the danger of traveling along or immediately upon the railroad. These things the county court had the right to take into consideration in determining whether the portions of the public road should be discontinued or not. The discontinuance is a question of sound discretion with the county court, and cannot be controlled by prohibition. The fact that the railroad company is willing to pay the county court $3,000 to enable it to provide a more convenient way for the public, causing less damages, does not affect the court's discretion as to such discontinuance, but only emphasizes the fact that the railroad company is anxious to get rid of the two extremely dangerous places along the line of its road, where probably it would be otherwise necessary to keep watchmen continually to protect itself and the traveling public from otherwise unavoidable or negligent accidents, greatly endangering life and entailing great loss and expense. The apparently exclusive grant of the use and occupancy of said road can amount to nothing more than the discontinuance of the road for such use, with full notice to the public of complete abandonment. It matters not what language is used, the county court can grant to the company no right in the roads, for it possesses none. All it does or can do is to relieve the land occupied from use as public roads. This is what it is clothed with the power to do when the public necessities require its action. In so doing, it does not act in excess of its jurisdiction, and its action cannot be controlled by prohibition.

POFFENBARGER, J. (concurring). I concur in the decision in so far as it denies and refuses the writ of prohibition, but I think the proposition stated in the syllabus and announced in the opinion goes too far, and admits authority and power in the county court, in respect to the discontinuance of roads, which the statutes do not confer. The county court, under section 30 of chapter 43 of the Code of 1899, has an undoubted right to discontinue a road in the manner therein provided, but those provisions show clearly that it is a discretionary right, and one that ought to be exercised in the interest of the public. Viewers must be appointed to go upon the ground and ascertain the conditions, and then report upon the advisability of discontinuing the road. This section, impliedly at least, says a public road shall not be discontinued if inconvenience will result therefrom, for the viewers are required to report what inconvenience will so result. The Legislature rightly assumed that no county court would discontinue a road under such conditions as to prejudice the public or to put the people to inconvenience. This is a general provision, applying to ordinary cases of applications for discontinuances of public roads. There is a special provision of the statute prescribing the duties of county courts and of railroad companies when it becomes necessary or desirable for a railroad company to occupy a public road, and these provisions, having been made to govern a special case, ought to be understood and construed as the only law applicable to that case. What are those provisions?

Clause 6 of section 50 of chapter 54 of the Code of 1899 gives to a railroad company the right to construct its railroad across, along, or upon any stream of water, water course, street, highway, road, turnpike, or canal which the route of such railroad shall intersect or touch; but such corporation shall restore the stream, water course, street, highway, road, turnpike, or canal thus intersected or touched to its former state, or to such state as not unnecessarily to have impaired its usefulness, and to keep such crossing in repair. But a limitation upon this right of railroad companies is expressed in the same clause. It says that, in case of the construction of such railroad along highways, roads, turnpikes, or canals, they shall either first obtain the consent of the lawful authorities having control of the same, or condemn the same under the provisions of section 43 of said chapter. Nothing in these provisions gives to a railroad company, or authorizes the county court to give to a railroad company, under the guise of a discontinuance or otherwise, the exclusive use of any public road. They only authorize an occupation of the road consistent with the ordinary use of such roads, giving to the railroad company and the people the common use of the same road. The usefulness of the road to the public may be impaired by the operation of the road therein, but it cannot be unnecessarily impaired, nor does the statute authorize the destruction of the road as a public highway.

It is to be observed that clause 6 of section 50 of chapter 54 gives no right to a railroad company to occupy a street or road, in the construction of its railroad, without restoring the same to its former state, or to such state as not unnecessarily to have impaired its usefulness. Does a railroad company obtain any greater right by the condemnation of the use of the public highway? If it cannot agree with the county court or the municipal authorities, and is compelled to condemn the use of the public highway, then what right does it acquire? Can it deprive the people of the use of the highway? If it becomes necessary to do that, the railroad company must itself provide them with another road. This shows clearly that the county court has no right to discontinue a public road merely to allow its use by a railroad company. Section 43 of chapter 50 says any such corporation may take and hold, under any grant or ordinance made by a municipal corporation, any interest or right such municipal corporation may have in any street, alley, or public ground, and may, in exchange therefor, in whole or in part, dedicate or otherwise secure to public use another street, alley, or public ground out of real estate owned by such railroad corporation, whether acquired by purchase or condemnation; or, under an agreement with such municipal corporation, may condemn land for use as such new street, alley, or public ground in the same manner as it may condemn land for its own use. This plainly shows that, unless a public highway can be dispensed with consistently with law and the public convenience, a railroad company taking possession of it, by consent of the public authorities, or by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, must put the road in such condition as to enable the public to use it in common with the railroad company, or provide another road in lieu thereof. In taking possession of public roads, railroad companies are exercising a power conferred upon them by statute. It is not a right existing independently of the statute. Therefore they have only such rights in that respect as the statutes confer. By its terms, this section limits the right to the taking of streets, alleys, or public grounds of a municipal corporation. If a county road may be condemned to such use, express authority for such condemnation must be found elsewhere in the statute. Such authority is found in the sixth clause of section 50 of chapter 54, and says that the condemnation shall be as provided in section 48. This makes section 48 applicable to county roads as well as to streets, and therefore, when railroad companies exclude the public from the use of roads, they must provide others. The use of the word "may" in section 48, instead of "shall," signifies nothing. The legislative intent is plain. They may take roads by consent of the authorities or by condemnation, and may provide others. The two propositions are bound together and must be construed together, and they mean the same as if the Legislature had said a railroad company may take the use of a public road, but, if so, it shall provide another.

This construction of the statute imposes a duty upon any railroad company so taking to itself the exclusive use of a public highway, and the law has provided a way for compelling performance of that duty. If the railroad company neglects or fails in this respect, mandamus lies to compel it to perform its duty. Town of Mason v. Railroad Co., 51 W. Va. 183, 41 S. E. 418. So the county court has ample power in the premises. If the county court fails to perform its duty, a citizen injured by its failure has a remedy by which he may compel the county court to perform its duty. Section 45 of chapter 39 of the Code gives the writ of mandamus to enforce the performance of any legal duty resting upon a county court. Whether the county court is, in this particular case, amenable to that writ, it is not proper now to inquire.

While the county court has an undoubted right to consent to the occupation of the county roads by the railroad company, for which reason prohibition does not lie, we are not prepared to say the railroad company can exclude the public from the use of the road, even under the order of discontinuance made by the county court.

Judge MILLER has aided in the preparation of this opinion, and concurs in the views herein expressed.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF DAVIS DIST. v. HOLT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 21, 1908.)

WRIT OF PROHIBITION—WHEN AWARDED—MOTION TO DISCHARGE.

1. The writ of prohibition only properly issues to prevent unlawful judicial action by inferior tribunals exercising or assuming to exercise judicial functions. It never issues against administrative boards exercising purely administrative functions.

2. The writ of prohibition is never proper to try title to office and oust de facto officers and replace them by others claiming to be de jure officers.

3. When a circuit judge has issued a rule in prohibition directly contrary to the principles settled by this court in a former case to which he was a party, this court will not require the party making complaint to first make a motion to discharge such rule before applying to this court for relief against the same.

Application by the Board of Education of Davis District for a writ of prohibition against John H. Holt and others. Writ awarded.

Cunningham & Stallings, for petitioner. O. O. Strleby and Conley & Smith, for respondents.

DENT, J. The Board of Education of Davis District, Tucker county, asks for a writ of prohibition against John Homer Holt, judge of the circuit court of said county. This is a controversy between two sets of men claiming to be the legal board of education of Davis District in the county of Tucker. The contestants, George H. Howard and Joseph Kline, claiming to be the de jure board of education, obtained a writ of prohibition from Judge Holt against said E. K. Hovermale and R. C. McKelvey acting as the de facto board, inhibiting them from acting as such board, and said Hovermale especially from acting as president, and directing him to turn over to the alleged de jure board all the property belonging properly to the board of education of such district. In short, the prohibition awarded was a writ of ouster, turning out the de facto board and installing the alleged de jure board until the title to the office could be inquired into and determined. This is the case of Hassinger v. Holt, Judge, etc., 47 W. Va. 348, 34 S. E. 728, repeated, and a reference to the decision in that is sufficient to settle this case. This court has so often held that the writ of prohibition only lies against judicial action of an inferior tribunal exercising judicial functions. Here it is used by the circuit court to prevent a de facto board of education from exercising purely administrative functions until the official titles of the members thereof can be inquired into. Not only is it used for this purpose, but it is used to put the incumbents out and put the contestants in until the title to the office can be determined; thus making a writ of prohibition a revolutionary writ for the purpose of changing the administrative officers of the government until the title to the office can be settled. If one of the sets of claimants is entitled to the writ under the circumstances, why should not the others have it, and thus stop the functions of the office until the title thereto is settled? The wheels of the government could thereby be stopped for the want of administrative officers, and the courts would be compelled to appoint curators for or receivers of such officers, with power to discharge the duties thereof until the right of office could be finally determined. Thus the court would have to assume the administrative functions of the government. Such use of prohibition is plain usurpation of and abuse of judicial functions. Prohibition never issues to test the title to an office. Quo warranto is the proper remedy for this purpose. A de facto officer claiming to be de jure has the right to hold the office and discharge the functions thereof until his title or right thereto is determined against him by proper judicial authority. 2 Bailey on Jurisdiction, § 479; 16 En. Plead. & Prac. 1106. It is insisted that no motion was made in the circuit court to discharge the rule before application to this court for relief. This is not always necessary. Board v. Holt, 51 W. Va. 435, 41 S. E. 337. It is only required as a matter of respect and courtesy to the circuit judge. When he is acting in total disregard of the principles settled by this court in prior cases to which he was a party, such motion will be deemed unnecessary, as the circuit judge will be deemed to have acted advisedly when he issued the rule, and that a motion to discharge the same would be unavailing, and an idle requirement.

The writ of prohibition is therefore awarded.

FRYE v. MILEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 5, 1903.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—SUIT TO SET ASIDE—DISMISSAL—APPEAL—COSTS.

1. A suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance under section 2 of chapter 133 of the Code of 1899, instituted for a legal demand by a creditor at large before the debt on which it is predicated becomes due and payable, cannot be sustained. Inadvertent rulings to the contrary in Christlip v. Teter, 27 S. E. 288, 43 W. Va. 356, and Bank v. Prager, 41 S. E. 363, 50 W. Va. 680, are disapproved.

2. In such case, though the bill may be sufficient under section 1 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1899, it is proper to dismiss it on demurrer if an attachment has not been sued out under it before such dismissal.

3. But it is error to so dismiss such a bill without inserting in the decree a clause saving to the plaintiff the right to prosecute any other proper suit in respect to the matters complained of in the bill, or showing that the cause had not been decided on its merits, as such decree, without such clause, would be a bar to a subsequent suit predicated upon the same facts.

4. Where a party brings a suit in equity which cannot be entertained for want of jurisdiction, and permits such a decree to be entered, without objection, as would bar another suit for the same matter, he is not entitled to costs in the appellate court upon a reversal of the decree. In such case he is not the party substantially prevailing in the true sense of the terms.

Miller and Brannon, JJ., dissenting in part.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hardy County;
R. W. Dailey, Jr., Judge.

Bill by William H. Frye against John R. Miley and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Modified.

W. M. Gamble, for appellant. Benjamin Dailey and H. B. Gilkeson, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. William H. Frye complains of the dissolution of an injunction and dismissal of his bill by a decree of the circuit court of Hardy county. It appears from the bill that on the 18th day of February, 1902, John R. Miley executed his negotiable note for the sum of $1,517.75, payable to the order of Annie L. Miley nine months after date, with interest from date, at the Shenandoah Valley Bank of Winchester, Va., and indorsed by the said Annie L. Miley, G. W. Miley, and P. J. J. Walker, and then delivered to said Frye. The note was given for the purchase money of property purchased by said John R. Miley at a sale made by Frye. On the 22d day of September, 1902, about seven months after the date of the note, two months before its maturity Frye instituted this suit, and, at October rules following, filed his bill, setting forth in detail conveyances by John R. Miley, Annie L. Miley, George W. Miley, and P. J. J. Walker of all the real estate, and practically all the personal property, owned by each and every one of them, made between the 17th day of July, 1902, and the date of the institution of the suit; alleging all of said conveyances to have been made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the plaintiff in the collection of his said debt, and praying that each and all of them be set aside, and the real estate subjected to the payment of the debt, and that Annie L. Miley, George W. Miley, and P. J. J. Walker be restrained by injunction from transferring or assigning certain purchase-money notes given in consideration of the conveyances, and Fannie V. Pease, J. W. Miley, and William M. Snyder from paying certain notes to the parties alleged to be holders of them. The injunction was awarded on the 11th day of September, 1902, and on the 29th day of May, 1903, the bill was held insufficient on demurrer, the injunction dissolved, and the bill dismissed.

This decree is based upon the theory that a suit to set aside conveyances on the ground of fraud cannot be instituted by a creditor whose debt is not due, and on the further ground that if an attachment would in such case be maintainable, and give equity jurisdiction to charge the land with a lien in favor of the creditor, the bill does not pray an attachment, and the record does not show any affidavit therefor, nor any application to the court for an order of attachment.

Prior to the enactment in 1849 of what is now section 2 of chapter 133 of the Code of 1899 of this state, a creditor could not resort to a court of equity to impeach a conveyance for fraud without having first reduced his demand to judgment. This made it a lien upon the debtor's real estate, and, the fraudulent conveyance being an obstruction to the enforcement of the lien, equity interposed for the removal of the obstruction. When the property fraudulently conveyed and sought to be subjected was personal property, the creditor was required not only to obtain a judgment, but also to take out execution, and have it levied or returned, so as to show that he had exhausted all legal remedies. Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384, 14 Am. Dec. 786; Tate v. Liggit, 2 Leigh, 84; Kelso v. Blackburn, 3 Leigh, 300; Rhodes v. Cousins, 6 Rand. 189, 18 Am. Dec. 715; Wallace's Adm'r v. Treacle, 27 Grat. 479. In the absence of statutes conferring jurisdiction in equity at the instance of creditors at large, the general rule is that there is no such jurisdiction. There are exceptions to the rule, it is true, but this case does not fall within any of them. "Occasional exceptions may be found in some states to the rule that equity will not interfere at the instance of a simple-contract creditor. But the exceptions prove the force of the rule." Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 53. This author, in the same section, analyzes the cases which are supposed to establish these exceptions, and substantially denies their soundness. He concludes by saying, "Creditors will, as a rule, find these exceptional cases not easy to support." To the same effect, see Bump on Fraud. Conv. § 535, where it is said: "Equity has jurisdiction of fraud, but it does not collect debts. A creditor must establish his demand at law, and obtain a lien upon the property, before the transfer interferes with his rights, or he has any title to claim relief in equity. No creditor can be said to be delayed, hindered, or defrauded by any conveyance until some property out of which he has a specific right to be satisfied is withdrawn from his reach by a fraudulent conveyance." Adler v. Fenton, 24 How. (U. S.) 407, 16 L. Ed. 696; Williams v. Tipton, 5 Humph. (Tenn.) 66, 42 Am. Dec. 420; 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 468. The reasons assigned for this rule are that a court of law is the proper forum in which to establish debts; that the aid of a court of equity is given for the enforcement of a lien and the removal of obstructions in the way of execution at law; that equity will not aid any person until it is made certain that he has a claim upon the debtor; and that a creditor at large has no right to interfere with the debtor in the disposition of his property. 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. pp. 470-473.

Section 2 of chapter 133 of the Code of 1899 does away with this rule by providing that a creditor, before obtaining a judgment or decree for his claim, may institute a suit in equity to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, and in such suit have all the relief which he would be entitled to after obtaining a judgment or decree for his claim. This statute gives such creditor a lien upon the property fraudulently conveyed from the time of the commencement of the suit in equity. Wallace's Adm'r v. Treacle, 27 Grat. 479; Clarke v. Figgins, 27 W. Va. 663; Foley v. Ruley, 50 W. Va. 158, 40 S. E. 382, 55 L. R. A. 916; Sweeney v. Sugar Co., 30 W. Va. 443, 4 S. E. 431, 8 Am. St. Rep. 88; Gelser Mfg. Co. v. Chewning, 52 W. Va. 523, 44 S. E. 193. But for this statute, it is plain that no such suit could be brought. It is an enabling statute, doing away with the rule which prevented relief under certain conditions. It does away with that rule only to the extent of the right given by the statute, namely, to sue in equity to annul a fraudulent conveyance before reducing the claim to judgment. Whether such suit can be brought before the debt is due is an entirely different matter. This last question came before the Virginia Court of Appeals in Devries v. Johnston, 27 Grat. 805, and the court divided evenly upon it; Judges Moncure and Anderson standing for the affirmative of the proposition, and Christian and Staples for the negative. It is therefore no precedent, and Judge Anderson, who wrote the only opinion filed, cites no authority whatever for his position. A later Virginia case (Simon v. Ellison, 22 S. E. 860) holds that "suit attacking a conveyance as in fraud of creditors cannot be maintained by creditors whose claims are not due." It is said that this court, in Chrislip v. Teter, 43 W. Va. 356, 27 S. E. 288, has held that such suit may be maintained for a debt not due. It appears from the statement of the case that the debt was not due, and that the suit was maintained; but the point cannot be regarded as having been adjudicated in that case, for it seems never to have been brought to the attention of the court. Not a word of comment on that phase of the case is found in the opinion, and there is nothing in it to suggest that counsel relied upon it or brought it to the attention of the court. Even if it be considered as an adjudication, it is clearly the result of inadvertence, rather than consideration. Miller v. Zeigler, 44 W. Va. 484, 29 S. E. 981, 67 Am. St. Rep. 777, and Bank v. Prager & Son, 50 W. Va. 660, 41 S. E. 363, are urged and relied upon as supporting the position taken by counsel for the appellant. What has been said of the case of Chrislip v. Teter applies to that of Bank v. Prager & Son. Neither in the opinion nor in the briefs, so far as a hasty examination of the latter reveals, is there any mention of the fact that the debt of the plaintiff was not due, as a material point in the case. It cannot be regarded as a sedate and considerate decision on that point. In the other case (Miller v. Zeigler) the proceeding was by attachment, and the attachment was held good. Therefore the jurisdiction which was taken and maintained stood upon an entirely different ground from that urged in this case, and the decision and views expressed in the opinion afford no support to the position taken by the appellant here. Judge Brannon says in the opinion in that case; "But the bill, while setting up a fraudulent transfer, does so only as evidence to sustain the attachment, and does not go for the property transferred. Hence the bill could not be sustained, independently of the attachment, on that ground."

In Alabama there is a statute similar to ours, providing that a creditor who has not acquired a lien for his debt may sue in equity to set aside a fraudulent conveyance. The Supreme Court of that state, although most liberally expounding the statute against fraudulent conveyances, holds that such suit cannot be predicated upon a debt not yet due. Jones v. Massey, 79 Ala. 370; Freider v. Lienkauff, 92 Ala. 469, 8 South. 758; McGhee v. Bank, 93 Ala. 192, 9 South. 734; Gibson v. Furniture Co., 93 Ala. 579, 9 South. 370. The court said in Jones v. Massey: "The purpose and operation of the statute are to dispense with the necessity of obtaining a judgment at law, thereby establishing the justness of the demand, and to confer on a creditor without a lien the rights of a judgment creditor, so far as a judgment was essential to the jurisdiction of the court. The statute does not exempt such suit from the general rule, which prevails in equity as well as at law, that no suit can be maintained before a cause of action has accrued, and does not confer on a creditor the right to bring a bill to subject property to the payment of his debt before its maturity, and before he is authorized to maintain an action at law on the demand." In Freider v. Lienkauff the court said: "Confessedly, no suit, at law or in equity, can be maintained upon the debt which has not matured." This seems to be the construction put upon such statutes in most, if not all, the states where they exist. Thus in Maryland it is held that the jurisdiction of equity is not thereby so extended as to warrant the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the property, or an injunction to restrain the debtor from disposing of his property. Uhl v. Dillon, 10 Md. 500, 69 Am. Dec. 172; Hubbard v. Hubbard, 14 Md. 356; Balls v. Balls, 69 Md. 388, 16 Atl. 18. Of such statutes, 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr., at page 477, says: "But they do not authorize the filing of a bill before the maturity of the debt, nor do they, unless it is expressly so provided, authorize a bill to enjoin a contemplated disposition by the debtor of his property." Mr. Hogg, in his valuable work entitled "Equity Principles," at section 183, says: "But no suit can be maintained to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent unless the debt upon which the plaintiff's suit is predicated is due and payable at the time the suit is brought."

A very substantial reason suggests itself at this point for so limiting the effect of the statute. The commencement of suit under it gives a lien and priority of lien over the claims of all creditors at large subsequently suing. To hold that one whose debt is not due may acquire it confers upon him a great advantage not expressly given by the statute. It also overturns the general rule upheld by both courts of law and equity, that no suit can be maintained until a right of action accrues. Such right does not accrue until the maturity of the debt. The Legislature has seen fit to give a right of action for a debt not due, as well as a lien, under another statute (section 1 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1899), saying, "And such attachment may be sued out in a court of equity for a debt or claim, legal or equitable, whether the same be due or not." The Legislature having so far authorized a suit for a debt not due, and failed to provide for it, except by attachment, there is no ground for the presumption of an intention that such right should be further extended. In so far as the cases of Chrislip v. Tetter, 43 W. Va. 356, 27 S. E. 288, and Bank v. Prager & Son, 50 W. Va. 660, 41 S. E. 363, hold that a suit under section 2 of chapter 133 of the Code of 1899 may be maintained for a debt not due, they must be disapproved and overruled.

Much is said in the brief of counsel for the appellant on the subject of the odium of fraud in the eye of a court of equity, and the extent to which it vitiates transactions into which it enters. All this is granted, but it does not rise to the question presented here. The inquiry now is, not the extent to which equity may go in relief against fraud when the court has acquired jurisdiction, but when and how the jurisdiction may be invoked. It is a question of time, when the remedy sought may be had.

As already indicated, a creditor has a remedy against his fraudulent debtor by attachment in a suit in equity before the debt is due; and counsel for appellant here insists that the bill ought not to have been dismissed, because it shows sufficient ground for an attachment. But no attachment was ever taken out or applied for. Whether, in order to give jurisdiction in such case, the attachment must be sued out at the institution of the suit, and the bill show by proper allegations that it is a suit by attachment, it is unnecessary to say. It is certain that, in order to confer such jurisdiction, an attachment must be taken out or asked for at some stage of the proceeding. Nor is it necessary to say whether, in addition to the allegations of the bill sworn to, there must be an affidavit setting forth the grounds of the attachment. It seems, however, that there should be. Taylor's Ex'rs v. Cox, 32 W. Va. 148, 9 S. E. 70;

Cirode v. Buchanan, 22 Grat. 205. Hogg's Equity Principles, at section 37, says: It would seem, on principle, that, in all those instances wherein suit is brought to enforce a purely legal demand in equity, the bill should aver such facts as to show on its face that the law of attachment has been invoked in aid of the court's jurisdiction." But the author admits that decisions hold that the rule is not quite so strict.

There is a very short paragraph in the bill charging that all the conveyances were made for the purpose of giving preferences among the creditors of the parties to the note. In addition to this, there is an averment of the insolvency of said parties. But the bill does not indicate the existence of antecedent debts, to secure which the conveyances were made. One deed of trust is alleged to have been made to secure what may have been an antecedent debt, but it is not averred to have been antecedent, but the property thereby conveyed was 12 head of cattle, and plaintiff says in his bill he is informed that they have been driven to market and disposed of. One or two other deeds of trust are set out, reciting that the debts thereby secured were for money loaned at the time of the execution of the instruments. Most of the conveyances are, on their faces, absolute, not purporting to have been given to secure debts. It is deemed unnecessary to go through and analyze in this opinion all these conveyances, for the purpose of showing that the bill is insufficient under the preference statute. In this respect there is an absolute want of that certainty and definiteness required in such bill.

The decree complained of sustains the demurrer to the bill, dissolves the injunction, dismisses the bill, and gives the defendants their costs, without putting in any clause saving to the plaintiff the right to prosecute any other proper suit for relief in the premises. Obviously, he is entitled to relief after the maturity of the debt by just such a suit as he has brought, if the allegations of his bill be true. Moreover, if he had sued out an attachment in this suit at its inception, or at any time before it was dismissed, upon a sufficient affidavit, or possibly upon the facts set forth in his bill, verified by affidavit as it is, he might have had relief without waiting for the maturity of his debt. Then ought the court to have put into the decree a saving clause? This depends upon whether the decree would bar another suit for relief in respect to the same matters. It is a decree upon a demurrer sustained. By demurring, the defendants admitted the facts alleged in the bill. In any subsequent suit they would be estopped to deny those facts, if this decree remains unreversed. The facts are admitted in favor of the plaintiff, and do not estop him, but, upon those facts, there has been an adjudication against him; and by that adjudication, unless reversed, he is forever barred from prosecuting a suit for the same cause of action upon the same facts. Res judicata ties the hands of both parties. Buford v. Adair, 43 W. Va. 211, 27 S. E. 260, 64 Am. St. Rep. 854; Stockton v. Copeland, 30 W. Va. 674, 5 S. E. 143. In Gould v. Railroad Co., 91 U. S. 526, 533, 23 L. Ed. 416, Mr. Justice Clifford, after reviewing many authorities, lays down the following rules as deducible from them: "(1) That a judgment rendered upon demurrer to the declaration or to a material pleading, setting forth the facts, is equally conclusive of the matters confessed by the demurrer as a verdict finding the same facts would be, since the matters in controversy are established in the former case, as well as in the latter, by matter of record; and the rule is that facts thus established can never be contested between the same parties, or those in privity with them. (2) That if judgment is rendered for the defendant on demurrer to the declaration, or to a material pleading in chief, the plaintiff can never after maintain against the same defendant, or his privies, any similar or concurrent action for the same cause upon the same grounds as were disclosed in the first declaration, for the reason that the judgment upon such a demurrer determines the merits of the cause, and a final judgment deciding the right must put an end to the dispute, else the litigation would be endless. (3) But it is equally well settled that if the plaintiff fails on demurrer in his first action, from the omission of an essential allegation in his declaration which is fully supplied in the second suit, the judgment in the first suit is no bar to the second, although the respective actions were instituted to enforce the same right, for the reason that the merits of the cause, as disclosed in the second declaration, were not heard and decided in the first action." The syllabus of this case reads as follows: "If judgment is rendered for the defendant on demurrer to the declaration, or to a material pleading in chief, the plaintiff can never after maintain against the same defendant or his privies any similar or concurrent action for the same cause upon the same grounds as were disclosed in the first declaration; but if the plaintiff fails on demurrer in his first action, from the omission of an essential allegation in his declaration which is supplied in the second suit, the judgment in the first suit is not a bar to the second." As to when a judgment upon a demurrer is a bar to a subsequent suit, see Bissell v. Spring Valley Township, 124 U. S. 225, 8 Sup. Ct. 495, 31 L. Ed. 411; McLaughlin v. Doane, 40 Kan. 392, 19 Pac. 853, 10 Am. St. Rep. 210; Insurance Co. v. Smith, 117 Mo. 261, 297, 22 S. W. 623; Keater & Skinner v. Hock, Musser & Co., 16 Iowa, 23; Terry and others v. Hammonds et al., 47 Cal. 32; Robinson v. Howard, 5 Cal. 428; Estep v. Larsh, 21 Ind. 190; Wilson v. Ray, 24 Ind. 156; Campbell v. Hunt, 104 Ind. 210, 2 N. E. 363, 3 N. E. 879; Los Angeles v. Mellus, 58 Cal. 16; Gray et al. v. Gray et al., 34 Ga.

499; Carlin v. Brackett, 38 Minn. 307, 37 N. W. 342; Johnson v. Pate, 90 N. C. 334; Felt v. Turnure, 48 Iowa, 397; Bouchaud v. Dias, 3 Denio, 238; Aurora City v. West, 7 Wall. 82, 19 L. Ed. 42; Gilman v. Rives, 10 Pet. 298, 9 L. Ed. 432. "A decision upon a demurrer which has, however, clearly gone to the merits of the case, by being based distinctly upon a specific allegation of the facts touching the substance of the action or the defence, is an effectual bar to further litigation, and, upon the facts admitted, it is held to be as conclusive as a verdict; and this will be true in regard to such facts, though the second litigation, being between the same parties, is not upon the same cause of action." Big. on Est. 56.

The conclusion resulting from an examination of the record in the light of these principles is that another suit by attachment, based upon the same facts as it, would have been, and will still be, barred by the decree in this cause. Whether a second suit, under section 2 of chapter 133 of the Code of 1899, brought after the maturity of the debt, would be barred, is not so clear. A new essential fact, namely, the maturity of the debt, would appear in the case, and it would not be the same matter as that determined in the present suit. This, however, we do not decide, as it is unnecessary; but, as it would clearly bar a proceeding by attachment upon the same facts—a remedy to which the plaintiff was entitled, as clearly appears from the allegations of the bill—the court ought not to have pronounced such a decree, but should have dismissed the bill without prejudice. In failing to do this, the court erred, and for this reason the decree must be modified. Carberry v. Railroad Co., 44 W. Va. 260, 28 S. E. 694; Van Dorn v. County Court, 38 W. Va. 267, 18 S. E. 579; Christian v. Vance, 41 W. Va. 754, 24 S. E. 596.

Ought the appellant to have costs in this court? In Van Dorn v. County Court and Christian v. Vance, costs were given to the appellees, as the parties substantially prevailing; but in those cases nothing was said in the court below against the failure to put in the clause "without prejudice." In Carberry v. Railroad Co., costs in this court were awarded the appellant, but objection to the decree for want of saving clause was made in the court below. In this case no such objection appears, and the appellant stands as did the appellants in the two cases above mentioned, in which costs were awarded the appellees. There are two reasons in those cases, and in this one, for refusing costs to the appellant: He brought his suit in a court which could not entertain it, and thereby superinduced the error of which he has the right to complain. He is also in fault in having remained silent when the decree was entered. Had he objected to it, and asked that it be made to show that the dismissal was for want of jurisdiction, or that it was to be without prejudice, his situation would be far better, and like that of the appellant in Carberry v. Railroad Co., and there would probably have been no necessity for his coming here at all. On the ground of their having been in fault, the appellants, in Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 164, were refused costs. In doing so, this court followed the Supreme Court of the United States in Railroad Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 379, 4 Sup. Ct. 510, 28 L. Ed. 462, in the opinion in which the question is fully discussed. The reasoning of that opinion, as quoted in Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 16, 43 S. E. 164, clearly applies here.

For the reasons above given, the decree complained of is to be amended so as to save to the appellant the right to prosecute any other proper suit in respect to the matters complained in his bill, and then affirmed as amended; and costs in this court are to be adjudged to the appellees, as the parties substantially prevailing.

MILLER, J. (dissenting). I do not agree to the fourth point in the syllabus. It is the duty of the trial court to pronounce, and have entered on its record, proper decrees and judgments in cases before it. Parties to the action or suit have no legal control of this duty, and should not be held responsible for a failure therein. If such an error be committed in this respect, that it can be corrected only by this court on appeal or writ of error, the party injured, who is compelled to apply for such correction, should be allowed his costs occasioned thereby. This should be the rule in such case, because the erroneous decree or judgment is entered, presumably, at the instance of the party who recovers costs, and who would be benefited by such erroneous decree or judgment, should the same be permitted to stand.

BRANNON, J. I concur with Judge MILLER in the above note.

GORRELL & SMITH v. WILLIS, Judge, et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 14, 1903.)

ACTION—DISMISSAL—REINSTATEMENT.

1. G. & S., partners, recovered a judgment for $28.52, with interest thereon and costs, against A., before a justice. A. gave bond, with approved security, and was granted an appeal from the judgment by the justice. Afterwards the plaintiffs and defendant appeared in the circuit court, and thereupon the appellees moved the court to dismiss the appeal for the reason that the transcript filed did not show that any appeal had been granted by the justice to the appellant. The court sustained the motion, and dismissed the appeal, and gave judgment against the appellant for costs. At its next term the court, on motion of the appellant, set aside its former order of dismissal, and reinstated the appeal on the docket for trial.

Held, that the first order is not a final and conclusive judgment, and that the second order is authorized by section 11 of chapter 127 of the Code of 1899.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition of Gorrell & Smith for a writ of prohibition to M. H. Willis, judge of the circuit court of Tyler county, and others. Writ denied.

I. M. Underwood, for petitioner. J. H. Strickling, for respondents.

MILLER, J. On the 22d day of May, 1900, before G. W. Robinson, one of the justices of the peace of Tyler county, W. Va., Moses Gorrell and W. A. F. Smith, partners under the firm name of Gorrell & Smith, recovered a judgment against Emanuel Alkire for $28.52, with interest thereon and costs of the action. On the 30th day of May, 1900, Alkire executed and filed with the justice an appeal bond, with approved security, and was granted an appeal from the judgment aforesaid to the circuit court. On the 11th day of June, 1900, a transcript from the docket of the justice of the proceedings had before him in the action, together with the appeal bond, the pleadings, and all of the original papers in the cause, were transmitted to the clerk of the circuit court of said county, which transcript and papers were filed by said clerk, and the appeal docketed, and set for trial at the August term, 1900, of said court. On the 21st day of August, 1900, petitioners moved the court to dismiss the appeal, and thereupon the court made and entered an order in the words following: "This day came the parties plaintiff and defendant, by their attorneys, and thereupon the appellees moved the court to dismiss this appeal for the reason that the transcript filed shows that no appeal was granted by the justice to the appellant, Man Alkire. The court doth therefore sustain said motion, and this appeal is dismissed for the reason aforesaid; and it is further considered by the court that the appellees, Gorrell & Smith, do recover their costs in this court against said appellant, Man Alkire." At its December term, 1900, the court made and entered another order in the action, in the words and figures following: "This day came the defendant, by his attorneys, and moved the court to set aside the order of dismissal in this cause entered at the August term, 1900, of this court; to reinstate upon the trial docket of this court the above case, because the same was improvidently dismissed and dropped from the docket. The court doth consider the motion well taken, and doth order the said order of dismissal set aside, and the said case reinstated upon the trial docket of this court, and doth require notice to be served upon the plaintiffs as required by law. Thereupon the defendant suggested diminution of the record sent up by the justice, and the court doth order the justice to send up a full and complete transcript of the record of all the proceedings had before him in said case. A copy of this order shall be served upon the justice rendering the judgment." Upon petition of Gorrell & Smith, a rule was awarded by this court, directed to the circuit court of Tyler county, M. H. Willis, judge thereof, and said Emanuel Alkire, to show cause, if any, they or either of them can, why a writ of prohibition shall not be issued, prohibiting the said circuit court and said Willis, judge thereof, from proceeding further in said cause. To this rule, Alkire has filed his demurrer and answer, and contends that the circuit court had no legal power or jurisdiction to dismiss said appeal, and that its order of dismissal is no more, in effect, than a refusal to take or entertain jurisdiction of the appeal then properly before it. On the other hand, petitioners claim that the said order of dismissal at the August term, 1900, was and is a final judgment, whether erroneous or not, and could not be set aside by the court at a subsequent term. From the language of the said order of dismissal, we may conclude that the court dismissed the appeal because the transcript from the justice's docket did not, in terms, state that the appeal had been granted. However, in obedience to the last order of the circuit court, the justice, on the 2d day of January, 1901, transmitted what he certifies to be "a true copy as appears on his docket," and by which it is shown that the defendant on the 30th day of May, 1900, applied for an appeal, executed his appeal bond, with approved security, and was granted an appeal.

It thus appears that the appeal was properly allowed and perfected, so far as the defendant was concerned. Holmes v. Yoke, 48 W. Va. 267, 37 S. E. 545. It was docketed in the circuit court, and at its August term, 1900, the court had jurisdiction both of the parties and the subject-matter, because, as the record shows, the defendant had brought the case into that court by his appeal; and the petitioners appeared thereto, and moved the court to dismiss the same, which was done. The case was in the circuit court, to be tried and determined de novo. Section 169, c. 50, Code 1899. "In such case, where the effect of the appeal is to transfer the action to an appellate court, in which the cause is to be tried de novo, and the controversy is to be settled by a judgment in such court, regardless of the judgment appealed from, the appeal operates not only to suspend the judgment of the justice or inferior tribunal, but vacates it and sets it aside, so that it cannot be used as evidence or as the foundation of an action in any court." Watson v. Hurry, 47 W. Va. 810, 35 S. E. 830; Evans v. Taylor, 28 W. Va. 188. If the transcript from the justice's docket, when filed in the circuit court, was incomplete, the court should have then ordered the omitted parts to be supplied, as was afterwards done. Code 1899, c. 50, § 173. The dismissal of the appeal was, in effect, nothing more than a refusal of the court to try the controversy between the parties, upon the erroneous assumption that it did not have jurisdiction, and was not a judgment final and conclusive upon the parties. In Wheeling, B. & T. Ry. Co. v. Paull, 89 W. Va. 148, 19 S. E. 553, the court says: "The appeal was not tried on its merits, but was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The jurisdiction being unquestionable, the order of dismissal amounts to nothing more than a refusal to hear or entertain the appeal, and is equivalent to the refusal of the court to proceed with any case properly pending therein." At its December term, 1890, the court, finding the case in that condition, set aside its former order and reinstated the appeal, under section 11, c. 127, Code 1890, which provides that "any circuit court may on motion, re-instate on the trial docket of the court, any case dismissed, and set aside any non-suit that may be entered by reason of the non-appearance of the plaintiff, within three terms after the order of dismissal may have been made, or order of non-suit entered." This language is broad and comprehensive, and certainly embraces the dismissal in this case. The court, in reinstating the appeal, did no more than it could have been compelled to do by mandamus—take jurisdiction of the action. Wheeling, B. & T. Ry. Co. v. Paull, supra. In Alderson's Heirs v. Henderson, reported in 5 W. Va. 187, the circuit court, at its own instance, dismissed the bill at the costs of the plaintiff, and at the next term reinstated the cause. At the time of the dismissal the process had been duly served on the adult defendants, some of whom had filed their answers, and the answers of the infant defendants, by their guardian ad litem, had also been filed. Berkshire, J., who delivered the opinion, says: "I think there was no sufficient ground for dismissing the bill and amended bill, and that the court did not err in reinstating the cause, which it was clearly authorized to do under the first section of chapter 132, p. 115, of the act of March, 1868 [now section 11, c. 127, of the Code of 1890]." To the same effect is the case of M. & F. Bank v. Mathews, 8 W. Va. 26.

To uphold the contention of petitioners would be to forever deprive them of the right to collect their said demand from respondent Alkire by legal process. They have no judgment now, and could recover none hereafter.

For the reasons stated, the said demurrer is sustained, the rule quashed, and the writ of prohibition refused.

TIMMS v. TIMMS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 12, 1903.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—KNOWLEDGE OF GRANTEE—EVIDENCE.

1. Where the grantee in a deed made to defraud the creditors of the grantor knows of the fraudulent intent of the grantor, or has notice of facts sufficient to excite the suspicions of a prudent man and put him on inquiry, he makes himself a party to the fraud.

2. T. and his wife conveyed to U., the brother of the wife of T., a house and lot in the city of Parkersburg, being all the estate owned by T., in consideration of $1,900, assumed to be paid on the indebtedness of T. by U., the grantee, $665 of which was the balance due on a trust debt on the property conveyed, and the residue of the consideration was made up of negotiable paper of T., mostly indorsed by U., a part indorsed by the brother of U., and most of it long past due and under protest. No lien was retained on the property conveyed to secure the payment of the notes so assumed by U., and U. made no inquiry as to any other indebtedness of T., and left T. in possession of the property free of rent, with authority to sell the same; and the excess over $1,900 for which it might be sold by T. was to go to the wife of T., the sister of U.

Held, such conveyance is made in fraud of the creditors of T., and is void as to creditors.

S. Livesay's Ex'r v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585 (Syl., points 8, 12), reaffirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County; L. N. Tavenner, Judge.

Bill by J. Ross Timms, Jr., against John D. Timms and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant Monroe Uhl appeals. Affirmed.

McCluer & McCluer, for appellant. Hunter H. Moss, Jr., for appellees.

McWHORTER, P. John D. Timms and J. Ross Timms, Jr., his brother, were partners, under the firm name of John D. Timms & Bro., in the insurance business at Parkersburg, for some two years or more. On the 1st day of January, 1901, they dissolved their partnership. By the terms of the dissolution, J. D. Timms assumed all the obligations of the firm, and gave his note to J. Ross Timms, Jr., for $200, payable in one year, and also assumed to pay a note for $620 given by said J. Ross Timms, Jr., to J. D. Timms, and which had been discounted by J. D. Timms in the Citizens' National Bank at Parkersburg, and all accounts due the firm were to be collected by J. D. Timms. J. D. Timms was the owner of a lot, 40x100, fronting on Spring street, in the city of Parkersburg, upon which there was a house, which premises were occupied by himself and family as a residence. On the 18th day of June, 1901, John D. Timms and Emma M. Timms, his wife, conveyed said property to Monroe Uhl, the brother of said Emma M. Timms, in consideration of $1,900, to be paid as follows: The grantee assumed the payment of a balance of $665.70 due from the said John D. Timms on a deed of trust made by said Timms and his wife to secure a loan to the Citizens' Building Association, dated the 30th of April, 1898; also a promissory negotiable note for the sum of $175, dated January 24, 1901, payable 90 days after its date, to the order of said Uhl, at the Citizens' National Bank of Parkersburg; also a negotiable note dated February 18, 1901, for $400, payable 60 days after its date at the same bank, to the order of said Uhl; another negotiable note, payable at the same bank, for

$200, to the order of C. M. Uhl, 90 days after its date; also another negotiable note, dated April 25, 1901, for $225, payable to the order of M. Uhl, at the same bank, 60 days after its date; also another note, dated the 13th day of May, 1901, for the sum of $200, payable 90 days after its date to the order of C. M. Uhl, at the same bank; and the further sum of $34.30, as near as the same could be estimated, for protests and overdue interest upon said notes. On the 27th day of August, 1901, J. Ross Timms, Jr., sued out of the clerk's office of the circuit court of Wood county his subpoena in chancery, and at the November rules of said court, 1901, filed his bill against John D. Timms et al. for the purpose of setting aside said conveyance made by J. D. Timms and his wife to M. Uhl, dated June 18, 1901, as fraudulent and void, as being executed with the fraudulent design of delaying, hindering, and defrauding the creditors of the said John D. Timms, other than the said M. Uhl, and giving said Uhl a preference over the other creditors of said Timms, and praying that the said deed be declared to be fraudulent, and be set aside and held for naught, and the property be sold, and the proceeds distributed pro rata among all the creditors of said J. D. Timms whose claims existed at the time of said conveyance, and who should come in and unite in said suit, and agree to contribute to the cost and expenses of it, and for general relief.

Hermann O. Smith, trustee of the estate of John D. Timms in bankruptcy, filed his petition in said cause, showing that on the 22d day of November, 1901, the said John D. Timms was adjudged a bankrupt upon his own petition in voluntary bankruptcy, and praying to be made a party plaintiff in said suit, and joining plaintiff in the allegations and prayer of said bill. The defendant M. Uhl filed his answer denying all the allegations of fraud against himself, and all knowledge of fraud or fraudulent intent on the part of said John D. Timms in the execution of said conveyance to him, and denied all knowledge of any indebtedness on the part of said John D. Timms at the time of the execution of said conveyance, except that assumed by him as set out in the deed, to be paid as the consideration for such conveyance. Depositions were taken and filed by the plaintiff, and also by the defendants. The cause was heard on the 28th of March, 1903, and the court ascertained the indebtedness of John D. Timms to the plaintiff, J. Ross Timms, Jr., to be $2,088.06, and decreed the recovery thereof, and further decreed the deed from John D. Timms and his wife to M. Uhl, dated the 18th of June, 1901, to be fraudulent and voluntary as to said claim of plaintiff, and set the same aside, as to said claim, as fraudulent and void; that there were no liens on said property, by judgment or otherwise, except the deed of trust to the Citizens' Building Association of Parkersburg; and that the plaintiff, J. Ross Timms, Jr., by the filing of his bill attacking the validity of said deed, acquired a lien upon said real estate mentioned and described in the deed for the amount of his claim aforesaid, which lien was second in priority to that of the said building association; and decreed a sale of the said property by a special commissioner to satisfy the said two liens. From which decree the defendant M. Uhl appealed, and says that the court erred in decreeing that said deed from Timms and wife to Uhl was fraudulent and voluntary, and in setting aside and nullifying and declaring the said deed void, and that there was any fraud on the part of M. Uhl, connected with the making of the said deed, and in decreeing that the amounts due from John D. Timms to J. Ross Timms, Jr., constituted a lien upon the said house and lot, and in decreeing that the said conveyance was voluntary, "as the records show that the sum of $1,900 was paid for this property, and the evidence is conclusive that that sum was a fair valuation for the property."

It is contended by appellees that the conveyance from Timms to Uhl was fraudulent, in law and in fact. In Wait on Fraudulent Conveyances, § 225, it is said: "Badges of fraud are suspicious circumstances that overhang a transaction, or appear on the face of the papers. The possible indicia of fraud are so numerous that no court could pretend to anticipate and catalogue them. A single one may stamp the transaction as fraudulent, and, when several are found in combination, strong and clear evidence on the part of the upholder of the transaction will be required to repel the conclusion of fraud." It will be observed on examination of the deed, which is one of general warranty, conveying the house and lot of John D. Timms to M. Uhl, there was no money consideration passed directly from Uhl to Timms, but simply the assumption by Uhl to pay off the lien due to the building association, amounting to $665, and the payment of certain notes owing by said Timms, and described in the deed, the greater amount of which Uhl was already liable for as indorser for Timms, and the most of which were past due, lying in the bank under protest, and no provision was made, either by vendor's lien retained in the deed or otherwise, to secure the payment of said notes; no part of the consideration being secured, except the lien due to the building association, which was secured by virtue of the deed of trust which secured the original loan of $1,100, which had been reduced by payments to $665. This transaction, on the face of the deed, placed the property in position to have been conveyed by Uhl to an innocent purchaser without notice, beyond the reach of any of the unsecured creditors of said Timms. The purchaser, Uhl, must have known that his grantor was in failing circumstances. Although, in his answer, as well as his testimony, he claims to have had no information of his insolvency, and made no inquiry whatever as to his indebtedness or financial condition, yet he states that always theretofore the said John D. Timms had taken up his paper promptly by payment or renewal, and further admits that several of the notes had been protested, and were long past due, and the bank had given him notice that the said notes must be taken care of. When he called the attention of Timms to the fact that the notes were pressing him, Timms proposed to sell him the property, and asked him $2,400 or $2,500 for it, but sold it to him at $1,900, the price stated in the deed. Uhl says he made no inquiry as to any other indebtedness of the said Timms, but only purchased the property for the purpose of saving himself and his brother, who was indorser on a part of the paper assumed by him. In Bartles v. Gibson (C. C.) 17 Fed. 293 (Syl., point 2), it is held: "Where the grantee in a deed made to defraud the creditors of the grantor knows of the fraudulent intent of the grantor, or has notice of facts sufficient to excite the suspicions of a prudent man and put him on inquiry, he makes himself a party to the fraud." The fraudulent intent of John D. Timms is not seriously denied, and, indeed, the evidence, taken as a whole, clearly shows that his purpose in making the conveyance was to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, or some of them. In his testimony he says that Uhl might have known of other indebtedness of his than that mentioned in the deed, and assumed by Uhl. It seems almost incredible that a man of Uhl's evident intelligence and prudence would not have inquired of his brother-in-law, who had so far failed as to be unable to take care of his commercial paper, either by payment or renewal, as to his other indebtedness, and the cause of his failing condition. Surely his condition was sufficient to put Uhl upon inquiry. It is said in Wait on Fraudulent Conveyances, § 239: "Indebtedness or hopeless insolvency is, however, an important element of proof in marshaling badges of fraud to overturn a covinous transaction. * * * The conveyance, to be fraudulent, should bear such a ratio to the indebtedness as to tend directly to defeat the claims of creditors. It is not necessary that the conveyance should leave the grantor entirely without property, but the amount transferred and the part retained are all circumstances to be weighed. A heavy indebtedness of the grantor, together with a sale to a relative, of necessity form strong badges or indications of collusion and fraud, but are not in themselves, unsupported by other material facts, deemed conclusive proof of fraud." In the case at bar it is conceded that Timms conveyed all the estate he had to Uhl. As held in Reilly v. Barr, 34 W. Va. 95, 11 S. E. 750: "Where a conveyance has been made to a relative, and such conveyance is impeached by the creditors of the vendor as having been made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud them in the collection of their debts, the vendee relative will be held to stricter proof of the bona fides of the transaction than a stranger would be." See Hutchinson's Ex'r v. Boltz, 35 W. Va. 754, 14 S. E. 267 (Syl., point 4).

Another very suspicious circumstance connected with the transaction is the fact that the vendor was permitted to continue to occupy the premises in sole possession, and without payment of rent, and was authorized by Uhl to sell the same; and his wife, who was the sister of the vendee, was to have all the proceeds of such sale above the amount promised to be paid by the vendee—the $1,900. Timms tried to sell the property, representing it as his own, and made a contract of sale, in writing, signed by himself, to one Leslie M. Sorrell. Although the contract had been mislaid or destroyed, it was well established that it was executed. Sorrell testified that Timms asked $2,700 in the first place, and came down to $2,500 or $2,550—he was not sure which, but it was $2,500 or over. This contract, he thinks, was made about the 15th of August, 1901. While the deed was put on record on the day it was executed, yet Timms and his wife, on the next day after the execution of the deed, in an interview with the plaintiff, gave him no intimation that they had conveyed the property, but he says they told him they intended to sell it in the future, leaving him to infer that they still owned it. He further states that on that day (the 19th of June), when he had the conversation, "they were trying to figure out how much John D. Timms was in debt, and how much he had paid out, and what he had paid it with; and he put the price on his property—he said he could get $3,000 for it." Mrs. Timms denies having such conversation, but John D. Timms, in his testimony, makes no reference to it, by denial or otherwise. In Livesay's Ex'r v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585 (Syl., points 8, 12), it is held: "(8) Where, after an absolute conveyance of real estate by a debtor in failing circumstances, he remains in possession of the land without contract, and without accounting for the use of the land, these facts are evidence of fraudulent intent in such conveyance." "(12) A deed fraudulent in fact is void in toto, and cannot stand as security for grantees who have notice of the fraud." See, also, Curd v. Miller's Ex'rs, 7 Grat. 185; Peck v. Land, 2 Ga. 1, 46 Am. Dec. 368; Perkins v. Patten, 10 Ga. 241; Davis v. Turner, 4 Grat. 422; King v. Moon, 42 Mo. 551. In Sibley v. Stacey (W. Va.) 44 S. E. 420, it is held: "Where the evidence relating to fraud is conflicting and tends to support the decree of the circuit court, such decree will not be disturbed, unless plainly wrong."

As to the evidence touching the inadequacy of the price mentioned in the deed to Uhl—$1,900 for the property—it is somewhat conflicting, and, as to the estimate or price put upon it by the witnesses, the evidence that $1,000 was an adequate price preponderates to some extent; yet it would seem that the amount for which it was actually sold or contracted in good faith—and there seems to be no question about the contract to Sorrell by Timms for the property at the price of $2,500 or $2,600 being made in good faith, and such sale or contract actually made—would outweigh all expert testimony as to the value of the property given as the opinion of the witnesses, and this sale was made within two months after the date of the deed from Timms to Uhl, and there is nothing in the record to show that there was any material advance in real estate in that time.

There is no error in the decree, and the same must be affirmed.

DEEPWATER RY. CO. v. LAMBERT et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 12, 1908.)

RAILROADS—ORGANIZATION—EMINENT DOMAIN—PETITION—DESIGNATION OF TERMINI.

1. The terms of statutes providing for the organization of railroad companies, and the extension of lines of existing companies, requiring designation in the articles of incorporation and certificates for extensions of the termini of railroads and extensions thereof to be constructed by companies organizing and existing under them, are liberally construed in favor of the companies, and substantial compliance therewith is sufficient.

2. A railroad company duly organized under the general laws of this state, desiring to extend its line, as it may do, under section 53 of chapter 54 of the Code of 1899, after filing in the office of the Secretary of State a certificate stating "the point at or near which such extension in this state shall commence and terminate," passed at a meeting of its stockholders, and certified and filed as aforesaid, the following resolution: "Resolved, that the road be extended from its present terminus named in articles of incorporation and charter, at or near the village of Glen Jean, and near the junction of White Oak Fork of Dun Loup creek, with said Dun Loup creek in the county of Fayette, state of West Virginia. Said extension hereby authorized passes through the counties of Fayette, Raleigh, Wyoming, Mercer, Summers and Monroe, West Virginia, to a point on the state line on the line of Craig, Alleghany or Giles counties, Virginia, said extension to be located on the most practicable route from the present terminus at or near Glen Jean, in the county of Fayette, West Virginia, up the valley of Dun Loup creek, and its tributaries into the county of Raleigh, thence through Raleigh county by the most practicable route to the county of Wyoming, thence through Wyoming county by the most practicable route to the county of Mercer, thence through the county of Mercer to the Bluestone river, thence down the same by the most practicable route to New river, in the county of Summers, thence with New river and its tributaries by the most practicable route through the county of Summers to the county of Monroe, to a point on the state line and on the line of Craig, Alleghany or Giles counties, Virginia, said extension to be located on the most practicable route as shown on the maps and profiles filed as required by law; and that the foregoing resolution shall be filed with the Secretary of State of West Virginia as the certificate of extension as required under chapter 54 of the Code of West Virginia." Held, that said resolution designates with sufficient certainty the termini of the proposed extension.

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Proceedings by the Deepwater Railway Company against S. P. Lambert and others to condemn land. From the judgment, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A. N. Campbell, R. C. & B. McClaugherty, and Brown, Jackson & Knight, for plaintiff in error. A. W. Reynolds, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The Deepwater Railway Company commenced a proceeding in the circuit court of Mercer county in August, 1903, to condemn rights of way over numerous tracts of land, among which were certain lands owned by the Pocahontas Coal & Coke Company and the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. On the return day of the notice the Norfolk & Western Railway Company appeared and filed an answer setting up certain rights under unrecorded contracts, to which the petitioner replied generally and specially, and moved for a continuance until September 1, 1903, and the motion was sustained over the objection of the petitioner. On said last-mentioned day the parties again appeared, as did also the said Pocahontas Coal & Coke Company, and pleas were filed denying petitioner's right to condemn. On said pleas issue was made, and the petitioner introduced its articles of incorporation, authorizing it to construct and operate a railroad from a point near Deepwater, in Fayette county, to a point at or near Glen Jean, in said county. Then it offered a resolution, adopted by the stockholders of the company, and filed in the office of the Secretary of State, providing for an extension of the road from Glen Jean to the state line, to the introduction of which the court sustained an objection interposed by the defendants, and refused to allow it and the proof of the filing thereof with the Secretary of State to go in as evidence. The court refused, upon the like objection, to allow the introduction of maps of locations of the proposed extension, resolutions respecting the same, and the surveys, and other evidence. To all these rulings the petitioner excepted, and, the defendants having offered no evidence, the court, trying the case in lieu of a jury, found for the defendants and dismissed the petition.

The court based its action upon the uncertainty of the extension resolution, holding that it does not state with sufficient certainty the point at or near which one of the termini of the extension will be located, and is for that reason void. The statute authorizing extensions of their lines by railroad corporations contains the following clause: "Provided, that such corporation, before commencing any such extension in this state, shall file in the office of the Secretary of State a certicate stating the point at or near which such extension in this state shall commence and terminate." Section 53, c. 54, Code 1899. By way of compliance with this requirement, a copy of the resolution in question was certified by the chairman and secretary of the stockholders' meeting, and filed in the office of the Secretary of State, and reads as follows: "Resolved, that the road be extended from its present terminus named in articles of incorporation and charter, at or near the village of Glen Jean, and near the junction of White Oak Fork of Dun Loup creek with said Dun Loup creek in the county of Fayette, state of West Virginia. Said extension hereby authorized passes through the counties of Fayette, Raleigh, Wyoming, Mercer, Summers and Monroe, West Virginia, to a point on the state line on the line of Craig, Alleghany or Giles counties, Virginia, said extension to be located on the most practicable route from the present terminus at or near Glen Jean, in the county of Fayette, West Virginia, up the valley of the Dun Loup creek and its tributaries into the county of Raleigh, thence through Raleigh county by the most practicable route to the county of Wyoming, thence through Wyoming county by the most practicable route to the county of Mercer, thence through the county of Mercer to the Bluestone river, thence down the same by the most practicable route to New river, in the county of Summers, thence with New river and its tributaries by the most practicable route through the county of Summers to the county of Monroe, to a point on the state line and on the line of Craig, Alleghany or Giles counties, Virginia, said extension to be located on the most practicable route as shown on the maps and profiles as required by law, and that the foregoing resolution shall be filed with the Secretary of State of West Virginia, as the certificate of extension as required under chapter 54 of the Code of West Virginia." It will be observed that the beginning point of this extension is definitely fixed by the first clause of the resolution. The next clause gives a general indication of the route of this extension without fixing the terminus at any certain point. It says the extension shall go "to a point on the said line of Craig, Alleghany or Giles Counties, Virginia." The court judicially knows that these three counties of Virginia border on the West Virginia line for a long distance, and counsel for the defendants, in his brief, states that distance to be one hundred and thirteen miles. But this clause is followed by another, giving a more particular description of the route, commencing at Glen Jean and giving every county consecutively through which it is proposed to extend the road, and concluding with the following language: "Thence with New river and its tributaries by the most practicable route through the county of Summers to the county of Monroe, to a point on the state line and on the line of Craig, Alleghany or Giles counties, Virginia." Following this particular description, the point at which the extension will strike the Virginia line will necessarily be a point on that line where the three counties of Monroe, Summers, and Mercer corner on the line of Craig county, as will appear by reference to a map of the state showing the counties. This describes both the route and the terminus, definitely fixing the latter for all practical purposes. No citation of authority is needed to show that courts take judicial notice of the geography of the state, its lines and subdivisions. Reading this particular description of the route and terminus of this extension with the map before us, it is found impossible, without doing violence to the language of the resolution, to reach the point on the Virginia line elsewhere than at or near this common corner of the three counties. Following the course of the New river upward from the mouth of the Bluestone river, one strikes that corner, and it is impossible to strike the state line elsewhere without going through Monroe county, instead of to Monroe county, or through Mercer county a second time, instead of one time, as prescribed by the resolution. Here, however, it is suggested that the words "and its tributaries," in referring to the New river, make the point uncertain. But the tributaries cannot be followed to any other point on the Virginia line without going either into Monroe county or into Mercer county, and to do either of these things would be inconsistent with the clear language of the resolution respecting the objective point of the road. It may be possible that in following the general course of the New river it will be practicable and advantageous to depart from it at some point, and follow a tributary for some distance, and then go back to the river. For this reason it does not appear that the words "and its tributaries" will be without meaning or force under this interpretation of the meaning of the resolution, and the rule of construction requiring the giving of effect to every word, when possible, is not violated.

This construction is in harmony with that other rule, applicable alike to statutes, contracts, deeds, and other instruments, which makes words and clauses general in their nature yield to those which are more particular, when both the general and the particular clauses refer to the same matter. Suth. Stat. Cons. §§ 158, 159, 216. The first clause is general, but its generality is restrained and limited by what follows. Both it and that which follows it relate to the same thing, the terminus of the road. As independent clauses, they would be inconsistent. As clauses standing together, they must be read and considered together, and the instrument interpreted as a whole. In doing this, the rule of construction is to be applied, and its application makes the terminus sufficiently certain to comply substantially, at least, with the requirements of the statute, and nothing more is necessary. As a rule, the courts give to statutes authorizing the formation of railroad companies a liberal construction in respect to the requirements thereof concerning the designation of the termini of the road for the construction of which the company is formed. Redf. on Railways, vol. 1, pp. 412, 413. One of the earliest cases bearing on this question is Railroad Co. v. Sullivan, 5 Ohio St. 278. The certificate of the organization of the corporation in that case was held insufficient, but it lacked certainty in almost every particular. The statute required a statement, not only of the termini of the road, but also of the names of the counties through which it should pass. One terminus was described as "a point on the Ohio and Pennsylvania state line in the county of Trumbull"; and the other as "a point on the Ohio river in same state, in the county of Brown or Adams." The route was described as running through "Trumbull, Mahoning, Portage, Stark, via the town of Massillon, Wayne, it may be Holmes, Knox, Licking, Franklin, via the city of Columbus, or near thereto, Pickaway, or it may be Fayette and Madison, or one of them, Ross or Highland, and it may be through each of them, Pike, it may be Brown or Adams." Here was uncertainty both as to the counties through which the road would pass and as to the termini. In Callender v. Railroad Co., 11 Ohio St. 516, a very liberal construction was given to the statute, and the certificate was held good. It read in part as follows: "To commence at some point to be hereinafter designated in the township of Hudson, in the county of Summit, passing through the county of Portage or Cuyahoga." This was not a condemnation proceeding, and the company denied it had any corporate existence, and upon two well-settled principles a decision of the question of the sufficiency of the description might have been avoided. In all ordinary actions ex contractu or ex delicto it is enough to show corporate existence de facto, and a corporation is generally precluded by estoppel from denying its own existence. But the court did pass upon the sufficiency of the articles of incorporation, and asserted most unequivocally and emphatically the rule of liberal construction in favor of the company, saying, among other things: "But, the object being of public interest, and the construction of such roads by private enterprise equally subservient of the convenience of the public as if constructed by the state at public expense, such enterprises undertaken by private associations have always been favored by the state, and the object of the Legislature has been, as evinced by past legislation, to invest such companies with all that right of eminent domain which the state herself might reasonably exercise in the location, construction, and maintenance of such public improvement. The termini and line of this road would, without doubt, have been regarded sufficiently certain if expressed in the same language used in this certificate in a special act or charter under our former Constitution; and I am unable to perceive, either in reason or law, any ground for an exception to its validity for want of certainty, under this general act, which could not have been urged against the incorporation of the company if so claimed under a special act or charter."

Eakright v. Railroad Co., 13 Ind. 404, was a suit to recover upon a subscription to the original stock of the railroad company, and the court, properly or improperly, proceeded upon the theory that, in order to recover, it was necessary that the company prove its existence de jure. The organization was effected under a special act of the Legislature, requiring a designation of "the name of the place from which and the place to which the proposed road is to be constructed." It required this designation to be made in articles of association to be subscribed by the stockholders, and the description, as given in that instrument, described the termini as follows: "The railroad shall commence at the west, or such point on the west line of De Kalb county, with a view of connecting with the present Auburn and Eel River Valley Railroad, at such point as may be agreed on by the companies so connecting; thence running down Eel river valley to Logansport." In passing upon the sufficiency of its designation, the court said: "The statute simply requires the name of such place to be set forth. This must be done with a reasonable degree of certainty. In our opinion, the articles on their face show that this requirement of the statute has been properly complied with." The court could not have deemed it a strict compliance, as the beginning point was not stated, but was left to be fixed by agreement. Hence they must have considered a substantial compliance sufficient, and, in doing so, the construction was certainly a very liberal one in favor of the company.

In State v. Bailey, 19 Ind. 452, and Heaston v. Railroad Co., 18 Ind. 275, 79 Am. Dec. 430, the court expressed doubt as to whether the following description of termini in articles of association was sufficient: "Said road shall commence at Fort Wayne, in the county of Allen, and shall be constructed to the eastern line of the county of Wayne, pointing in the direction of Cincinnati." But the court said: "If it had been that that terminus was to be the east line of Wayne county at the point where it would meet a road in Ohio, extending from Cincinnati, with which it was to form a continuous line between Fort Wayne and Cincinnati, we think it would clearly have been sufficient. Inferentially, perhaps, it is thus stated now." That would have been a very indefinite and uncertain designation, as compared with that found in the resolution of extension now under consideration. The Ohio statute requires the designation of the names of the places of the termini of railroads, and not the names of the places "at or near" which the termini will be, as ours does; but it was held in Warner v. Callender, 20 Ohio St. 190, that

It was sufficient to say "in or near the town of Lima." Again, in Railroad Co. v. Hatch, 20 N. Y. 157, a statute requiring the articles of association to state the length of the proposed road "as near as may be" was held to have been sufficiently complied with by the statement that the road was to be "about seventy-five miles long." The statute further required an affidavit showing that $1,000 per mile had been in good faith subscribed, and 10 per cent. on the subscription paid, and it was held that the statement in the affidavit that $84,100 had been subscribed was a sufficient compliance with this requirement. The court decided that the omission, from the affidavit required, of the words "in good faith," in stating that 10 per cent. had been paid in cash on the subscription, was immaterial.

These authorities abundantly establish the rule of liberality in the construction of statutes authorizing the formation of railroad companies. The courts everywhere justly hold that the organization of these corporations is favored and encouraged by the Legislature as necessary agencies of internal improvement, promotive of the convenience of the public, and necessary to the development of the material wealth of the state, as well as the furtherance of its commercial interest and general welfare. In no state or country is there greater necessity or reason for railroad building and extension than in the state of West Virginia, and its legislation has been at all times such as to encourage their construction and operation. Under nothing but the strictest rule of interpretation could it be held that this resolution falls short of a compliance with the statute. A careful examination of the authorities fails to reveal any such rule as obtaining anywhere.

Whether, in a condemnation proceeding, a railroad company must prove its existence de jure, when the plea of nul tiel corporation is interposed, has been extensively and ably discussed in the briefs filed, as well as in the oral argument; but the decision of that question is wholly unnecessary, as the certificate and resolution under which the proceeding has been instituted are clearly valid.

From this conclusion it results that the court below erred in refusing to admit the evidence offered by the applicant, and also in its finding and judgment. Therefore the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, in accordance with the principles here decided, and, further, according to law.

REGER v. GALL.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 12, 1903.)

DECREE—REVERSAL—NECESSARY PARTIES.

1. If, in any way, it be shown by the record that the final decree was rendered in the absence of necessary parties, such decree will be reversed, and the cause remanded, in order that proper parties may be made.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by John T. Reger against David W. Gall. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Fred O. Blue, for appellant. J. Hop Woods, for appellee.

MILLER, J. It appears from the record in this cause that on the 1st day of March, 1898, the appellant, D. W. Gall, sold to appellee, John T. Reger, the Plaindealer, a newspaper plant in the town of Philippi, Barbour county, W. Va., for $1,000. Reger executed to Gall his seven several promissory notes for said sum—one for $50, payable October 30, 1898; five for $150 each, payable October 30, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903, respectively; and one for $200, payable October 30, 1904—all bearing date on the day and year first aforesaid, and each bearing interest from its date. To secure to said Gall and his assigns the payment of the aforesaid notes, also another note of said Reger to Gall for $248.83, bearing date on the 9th day of November, 1896, and whatever sum might be due said Gall from Reger on a settlement of their partnership accounts, said Reger, by deed of trust of the even date of said first-mentioned notes, conveyed to F. O. Blue, as trustee, the entire Plaindealer plant, and all the stock and fixtures of the office, in which deed it was provided that, should the said John T. Reger pay off and cancel the several evidences of debt to said Gall or his assigns, the deed was to be void, but, in the event of his failure so to do, it should be the duty of said trustee to sell said property at public auction, when requested by said Gall. It further appears that appellant and appellee had been partners in the Plaindealer plant; that the said $248.83 note represented a settlement of their accounts up to the 9th day of November, 1896, the date of said note; but that the other partnership accounts and transactions pertaining to said newspaper business from the date last mentioned to the date of the deed of trust had not been settled, and have not been settled since that time. Some time in June, 1899, said Blue, trustee, as aforesaid, being required by appellant so to do, advertised for sale, under the trust deed, the Plaindealer plant and property conveyed to him as aforesaid. Thereupon the said Reger, on the 7th day of July, 1899, presented to the judge of the circuit court of Barbour county his bill, verified by affidavit, against said Gall and Blue, trustee, praying an injunction to enjoin and restrain the trustee from advertising a sale under said trust, and from the execution thereof, until the matters alleged in the bill could be inquired into.

The bill sets out the sale of the newspaper plant; the execution of the notes by plaintiff to Gall therefor; also the said note for $248.83, and the agreement to pay to Gall whatever might be due from plaintiff to him upon a settlement of partnership matters theretofore existing between them. It then, in substance, alleges that a part of the time from the 20th day of June, 1893, until the 1st day of March, 1898, plaintiff was a partner of Gall in the said newspaper; that very little, if anything, is due to Gall, according to his own pretensions, upon a settlement of their partnership accounts mentioned in the trust deed; that at the time of said purchase Gall agreed with plaintiff not to collect, or endeavor to collect, said $248.83 from plaintiff until he had paid said annual installments; that without such agreement plaintiff would not have purchased said newspaper, or have executed said trust thereon, for the reason that he wanted sufficient time within which to pay for the same, to all of which said Gall agreed; that the first one, and only one, of said deferred annual installments which has become due, plaintiff has paid with the exception of a very few dollars, which he has arranged for in a satisfactory manner with the person to whom said Gall has assigned the same; that nothing further is now due and payable thereon until the 1st day of October, 1899; that, as plaintiff is informed, said Gall has assigned, or pretended to assign, either in payment of his own debts or as collateral security for the same, the residue of said notes, so that nothing is due him thereon, but as to whom said Gall has assigned said notes plaintiff is not fully advised. It further alleges that Gall is not living in this state, and is insolvent; that defendant has demanded of plaintiff said $248.83, which plaintiff has refused to pay, not only because of said agreement, but because he does not owe the same; or, if owing the same, he has lawful set-offs against it to the full amount thereof, of all of which said Gall is fully advised.

Plaintiff then avers that Gall is indebted to him the amount of a negotiable note for $118.29, dated April 9, 1891, executed by Gall to him, and by him indorsed for Gall's accommodation, and by Gall indorsed to J. N. B. Crim, payable at Tygarts Valley Bank, whereof protest was waived, and, in default of payment thereof by Gall, paid by plaintiff to Crim, who assigned the same without recourse to plaintiff; and, further, that on the 18th day of February, 1895, said Crim recovered a judgment in the name of James Nutter against said Gall, and previously against G. B. Harvey for $633.94, with interest and costs in the circuit court of said county, which, plaintiff says, said Gall is liable for, and which remains unpaid, of which $200, part thereof, has been assigned by said Crim for a valuable consideration to plaintiff, which last-mentioned sum also remains unpaid; that the said $200 and the said note constitute proper legal set-offs against said $248.83 due from plaintiff to Gall, which plaintiff offers to set off against the same.

Copies of the said judgment and assignment of part thereof are made parts of the bill. The prayer is that the plaintiff may have a decree setting off his said demands against said $248.83; for a settlement of the partnership accounts between plaintiff and said Gall; that, if anything be found due plaintiff, it may be decreed to him; and that the trustee be enjoined from advertising or selling the property under the trust deed until said matters be inquired into.

The record shows that on the 10th day of November, 1899, the defendant, D. W. Gall, tendered in court his answer to the plaintiff's bill, to which answer the plaintiff replied generally. The answer referred to is, in fact, a demurrer and answer together. Respondent demurs to the plaintiff's bill, because said James Nutter and G. B. Harvey are not made parties thereto. The answer states the terms of the said sale, the execution by Reger of the notes and deed of trust, and then alleges that on the 9th day of November, 1896, respondent induced plaintiff to make at least a partial settlement with him, upon which partial settlement there was found due from plaintiff to respondent the sum of $248.83 for which said note of that amount was given by Reger; and that there is due from plaintiff upon a proper settlement at least $300 more. Respondent denies any agreement with plaintiff for an extension of the time of payment of said $248.83 note. Respondent says that on the 16th day of January, 1899, for value, he assigned $100 of the last above mentioned note to R. E. Miles, of Washington, D. C., and that on the 12th day of June, 1899, he assigned $85 thereof to S. M. Yeatman, of the said city, of which assignments the plaintiff had notice before the institution of his suit, and before the assignments by Crim to plaintiff of said alleged set-offs; that said alleged set-offs were obtained by the plaintiff after respondent had directed the trustee to sell the property under the trust, and after the trustee had notified plaintiff that he was required to enforce the deed of trust. Respondent further says that plaintiff owes him $280 in rents; that the said judgment of Nutter against Harvey and himself was, in fact, paid to Crim before said assignment of part thereof to plaintiff; that the said $118.29 is more than offset by said rents due from plaintiff to respondent; and that the books showing the accounts between plaintiff and respondent are all in the possession of plaintiff, and that he declines to surrender them to respondent, or to make any settlement of the matter between them. Respondent prays, among other things, for a settlement of the said partnership accounts.

The affidavit of said Crim is filed. Affiant says that on the 29th day of June, 1899, he assigned and transferred to John T. Reger, by a paper writing of that date, a copy of which is filed with plaintiff's bill, $200 out of a certain judgment of $633.94, with interest thereon from the 12th day of February, 1895, and $32.10 costs, recovered in the circuit court of Barbour county by one James Nutter against said D. W. Gall and G. B. Harvey; that said assignment was for full value; that no part of said judgment had, at the time of said assignment, or has since, been paid to him by either Gall v. Harvey; that said assignment was made to Reger to enable him to set the same off, together with a claim of $118.29, against said $248.83, and that said judgment, although in the name of James Nutter, belongs to affiant.

Depositions were taken and filed in the cause on behalf of plaintiff and defendant. The plaintiff testifies that defendant is insolvent; that when his bill was filed he owed Gall the $248.83, and interest thereon, and that Gall owed him said $118.29, and $200 assigned to him by Crim, with their interest; that he believed upon a settlement of their partnership account Gall would owe him thereon; and that it was expressly understood between Gall and himself at the time the $248.83 note was given it was not to be paid, and that deponent was not to be called on to pay it until after the office (or newspaper) notes proper were all paid. It will be observed that the former note bears date November 9, 1896, and the latter notes March 1, 1898. Plaintiff admitted that the notice of sale by the trustee had been inserted in his newspaper before the date of the assignment to him of said $200, part of said judgment. It is further proved that I. E. Robinson is the owner, by assignment, of said five notes for $150 each and said $50 note, upon which notes $200 has been paid to him. J. N. B. Crim states that the Nutter judgment belonged to him, and that he assigned $200, part thereof, to Reger. Appellant testifies that Reger owes him at least $350 on their unsettled partnership account; that Reger had notice, before bringing his suit, of the said assignments by appellant to Miles and Yeatman of parts of said $248.83; that when he required the trustee to advertise the trust property for sale under the deed of trust he was acting for himself and for Miles and Yeatman under an agreement with them to see that the said note should be paid; and that the books and papers relating to the said partnership accounts are in the possession of Reger, who refuses to turn them over to appellant. R. E. Miles testifies that Gall assigned to him for a valuable consideration $100 of the $248.83 note prior to June 29, 1899. Yeatman also testifies to the assignment of $85 of said note to him on the 12th day of June, 1899, for value. Both of said sums of $185 are shown to be unpaid, and that Gall had agreed at the time of the assignments to see to the collection of the same for the assignees thereof. The said judgment of which the $200 assignment purports to be a part is in the name of James Nutter. It was rendered previously against G. B. Harvey, and on the 18th day of February, 1895, against said D. W. Gall. There is nothing in the record showing or attempting to show that, as between themselves, Gall and Harvey are not equally liable for the amount of said judgment. Crim is not a party to the record of said judgment. No assignment thereof by Nutter to Crim is filed or proved.

Upon the record thus made up the cause came on to be heard by the court, and thereupon the defendant moved the court to dissolve said injunction, which the court refused to do, but adjudged, ordered, and decreed that said injunction should be perpetuated, and that the plaintiff should recover from the defendant his costs. From this decree, appellant was allowed an appeal.

It is difficult to understand how the circuit court arrived at the conclusion that the injunction should be perpetuated, at least, without some reservation or saving as to the matters set up in the pleadings other than said $248.83 note. That note is shown to be a valid contract, and unpaid at the time of the commencement of plaintiff's suit. While it does not expressly appear that it was then due according to its terms, that fact is nowhere disputed or denied. No valid or binding agreement between the parties thereto for an extension of the time of its payment has been proved. Large parts of the debt therein specified were assigned to third parties for value, of which the plaintiff had notice before he commenced his suit. The assignees are not made parties. If the court applied the said $200, part of said Nutter judgment, assigned to the plaintiff as aforesaid, to said $248.83 as a set-off, such application (if proper under any circumstances) is without proof that Gall was or is the principal debtor in the said Nutter judgment. One of the objects of an adjudication is to end litigation between the parties as to the matter in controversy. The allowance of this $200 as a set-off, in the absence of Nutter and Harvey as parties, would afford cause for other controversies. There would be nothing to prevent the issuance of an execution against Gall and Harvey for the full amount of said judgment, notwithstanding said assignment and application of part thereof as aforesaid. An execution, being founded on a legal judgment, must follow the judgment, and be warranted by it, and this depends on its nature and form, and must conform to it in every respect as to the amount of the judgment and character of the parties, or it is void. Herman on Ex. § 55.

Reger says in the deed of trust, signed, sealed, acknowledged, and delivered by him, that it is to secure "whatsoever may be due the said D. W. Gall from the said John T. Reger on a settlement of their partnership account," as well as the notes specified therein. In addition to this admission, we have the evidence of Gall that there is at least $300 due him on a settlement of the partnership accounts, disputed only by the statement of Reger that he does not owe Gall anything. Any amount found due to Gall on such settlement is a lien on the newspaper property conveyed by the trust. Such settlement should be made before any sale of the property can take place with safety to the persons already interested as lienholders, or to a purchaser thereof. Besides, it appears that I. E. Robinson is the owner and holder, and was such before the institution of the suit, of the largest part of the said trust debt. It is important and necessary that all parties who hold any of the said indebtedness of Reger to Gall secured by said deed of trust should be before the court, that their rights and equities may be ascertained, before a sale of the property shall be made. "When a court of equity takes jurisdiction of a cause for one purpose, it will go on and dispose of the questions involved to avoid a multiplicity of suits." Chrislip et al. v. Teter et al., 43 W. Va. 365, 27 S. E. 292. It clearly appears that persons interested in the subject-matter of the suit have not been made parties, and were not before the court, although that fact was brought to the attention of the court by the pleadings and proof. The court should have caused all proper parties to be made to the bill. Code 1899, c. 125, § 58. It is immaterial in what manner it is brought to the attention of this court that the decree complained of was rendered. In the absence of proper parties, the decree will be reversed, and the cause remanded, in order that proper parties may be made. Gallatin L. C. & O. Co. v. Davis et al., 44 W. Va. 109, 28 S. E. 747.

For the reasons stated, there is error in the decree of May 26, 1900. It must therefore be reversed, and held for naught, the said demurrer to the bill sustained, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Barbour county, with leave to the plaintiff to make any necessary additional parties thereto, and to have such other proceedings therein as the principles of equity may warrant.

SCHAEFFER'S ADM'R v. SCHAEFFER'S ADM'R.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 16, 1903.)

WILL—CONSTRUCTION—SURVIVORSHIP—NATURE OF ESTATE.

1. Does survivorship in a will relate to the death of a testator, or to the death of the tenant for life, or other point of time?

2. A will gives testator's widow a life estate, with power to sell some realty and consume its proceeds, and then says, "At the death of my wife what real estate and personal property may be left shall be sold, and divided equally among my children, or their children, or their representatives."

Testator's children took no absolute or vested estate during the life tenancy, and such estate could vest only in those living at its close, and a deed of trust for debt given by a child dying before the life tenant has no effect upon testator's property against children of such child.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County; E. Boyd Faulkner, Judge.

Bill by William Schaeffer's administrator against Emanuel Schaeffer's administrator. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

D. B. Lucas and J. M. Mason, Jr., for appellant. D. C. Westenbaver, Joseph Trappnell, and Forrest W. Brown, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. William Schaeffer made a will by which he gave to his wife for life all his real and personal property, with power to sell some and use its proceeds, and then provided that "at the death of my wife what real and personal property may be left shall be sold and divided equally among my children, or their children, or their representatives." The testator died leaving his widow. Two of his sons, John W. and Emanuel, gave deeds of trust to secure debts on their interest in their father's estate, and then died during the lifetime of said widow. One of the said sons left a daughter, Deborah Merchant, and the other left children, one named Cora Merrit. The administrator with the will annexed of the testator, having sold the land, filed a bill to construe the will and give him directions how to dispose of the fund, there being conflicting claimants, the creditors of the dead sons claiming, under said deeds of trust, payment of their debts out of the fund, on the theory that the sons who made said trust deeds had vested estate in the land, while their children denied that their fathers had any estate for the deeds of trust to operate upon. A decree was pronounced holding that the sons took a vested estate at their father's death, and that the deeds of trust were effective, and directing their satisfaction out of the fund.

Had the two sons a vested property in the estate of their father, so that the deeds of trust given by them would be good against their children? Did the will vest those sons with an estate at their father's death, or had they only a contingent remainder after their mother's life estate, to become vested only in case they should survive her? Counsel for the trust creditors say that the words "or their children" are words of survivorship, and that they show that the testator had in contemplation that some of his children might die, and that the question is the time of such death; in other words, did he think of such death occurring before his own death or afterwards? They say that he contemplated it as occurring before his own death, and that he used those words to prevent a lapse of the legacies by their death in his lifetime. Viewing it as a question of survivorship, they make the burden of their argument and seek to control the case by the principle found in Martin v. Kirby, 11 Grat. 67, that "in a devise or bequest over to survivors at the death of a devisee or legatee for life, in the absence of the expression of a particular intent on the part of the testator, the survivorship has relation to the death of the testator." Counsel say that estate absolute vested in the sons at the testator's death. It is not demanded in this case that we say whether or not that principle is sound; for, if we treat the case as one of survivorship, even under that rule we can say that the survivorship does not relate to the death of the testator, but to that of the life tenant, because that rule says its application depends upon whether the will manifests another intent, as the will in hand does.

However, speaking for myself, I am at present ready to say that the rule is not sound. Once it was, but not now. Numerous English decisions once upheld it. Jarman on Wills, p. *1538 (6th Ed. 667), after giving numerous cases stating that rule, says, "The sequel will serve to show that no rule of construction, however sanctioned by repeated adoption, is secure of permanence unless founded in principle," and states that the rule is not based on reason, and that "the reader, on a perusal of later cases, will find himself probably impelled to the conclusion that where there is a gift of personal estate to a person for life or any unlimited interest, and after the determination of such interest to certain persons nominatim, or to a class of persons as tenants in common, and the survivors of them, these words are construed as intended to carry the subject of gift to the objects who are living at the period of distribution." On star page 1547, Jarman says, after a review of many cases: "In this state of the authorities one need scarcely hesitate to affirm that the rule that reads a gift to survivors simply as applying to objects living at the death of the testator is confined to those cases in which there is no other period to which survivorship can be referred, and that, where such gift is preceded by a life or other prior interest, it takes effect in favor of those who survive the period of distribution, and of those only." American cases recognize this change. Branson v. Hill, 31 Md. 181, 1 Am. Rep. 40; Wren v. Hynes' Adm'r, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 129. Several Virginia decisions support Martin v. Kirby. Stone v. Lewis, 84 Va. 474, 5 S. E. 282; Gish v. Moomaw, 89 Va. 345, 15 S. E. 868; Chapman v. Chapman, 90 Va. 409, 18 S. E. 913; Crews' Adm'r v. Hatcher, 91 Va. 378, 21 S. E. 811. But the latest, Cheatham v. Gower, 94 Va. 833, 28 S. E. 853, does not. In it a will gave "my nephew, T. M. C., during life, my mansion house * * * and at his death to his surviving children." Held, that the remainder after the life estate passed to the children of T. M. C. living at his death, whether living at testator's death or not. Likely, Jameson v. Jameson's Adm'r, 86 Va. 51, 9 S. E. 480, 3 L. R. A. 773, is against it. More does the rule apply as to personality, to be realized by a sale of land, as in this case, after the testator's death, and then divided. "Here the property to be distributed is not in a condition to be divided as directed by the testator until the death of a life tenant, and hence only those who survive him can take." 1 Underhill on Wills, § 350.

But be the case of a plain case of survivorship as it may, I think this a case of substitution, not survivorship. We have not the case of a survivor of several persons alike in interest, but a case where some persons are substituted in default or place of others. Take the will. What was the testator's intent? That at the death of the widow life tenant the property should go to the testator's children, if then living, and, if not, then to their children. If he intended to give unconditionally and at once to his children a vested estate, why not simply give to them? He did not do so. He used more words than those necessary to do this. He says "my children, or their children." He meant something by these additional words. What did he mean by these added words "or their children"? He did not mean "and" their children. We cannot change "or" into "and," for this is only done to execute plain intent; but in this case that is obviously not the case. We must give "or" its natural, usual, grammatical effect—a disjunctive effect. The testator did not mean to give his executor arbitrary power to choose either his own children or their children. He plainly meant to give to his own children, if living at date of distribution after death of his widow, and, if not, then to their children. Do we risk anything in saying that such was the purpose? Let us see if authority will not so interpret that little word "or." "The term [substitution] is generally applied to limitation intended to provide for the death of prior devisees or legatees before the period of distribution. Thus, a direct gift to A. or his children goes to A. if he survive the testator, and to his children if he does not. If the gift be preceded by a life estate, the substitutional gift takes effect whether A. dies in the lifetime of the testator or the tenant for life." 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (1st Ed.) 404. A will gave a wife a life estate, and directed a sale after her death, and gave fixed legacies to two grandchildren, and the balance to go to his six children "or their heirs." It was held that the word "or" interposed between the first legatee and the heirs was a word of substitution, and that the only persons entitled to share were those children living at the distribution and the children of dead ones. The word "or" was held to be equivalent to "in case of the death of." It is stated there that where a legacy is not payable at once on the death of the testator, but an intermediate life estate is given, and the testator provides that, in case of a death of a legatee, it is to be given to some one else, then the words "in case of the death of" mean "in the lifetime of the tenant for life—that is, before the money becomes payable." It was said to create an alternative devise. The court said: "The vesting of the estate in interest, as well as in possession, in the children of the testator, depended on their surviving the day of distribution." As a daughter died before the end of the life estate, her conveyance was held to pass nothing. Ebey v. Adams, 135 Ill. 80, 25 N. E. 1013, 10 L. R. A. 162. In Robb v. Belt, 12 B. Mon. 643, a devise was to a widow during widowhood, and on her marriage or death the estate to be divided among "my eight children or their heirs." It was contended that on the death of the testator the eight children took a vested interest in remainder, the possession only being postponed until the marriage or death of the widow. It was held that a proper construction of the will required the division to be made between the testator's children living at the marriage or death of the widow, and the heirs of those dead; that it was an alternative or substitutional devise; that the words "or their heirs" must be taken as a designation of persons to take, or words of purchase, and were equivalent to "or such descendants of any that may be dead or may be their heirs," referring to the time of division. It was said, as I have above said: "But as the testator does not say 'among my living children,' but 'among my eight children,' 'or' is proper to show, and does show, as to some there is an alternative devise in case of death before the time referred to, and in that event the heirs of the deceased take in place of the deceased." It was held that "no absolute and indefeasible interest vested in any of the children until the death or marriage of the widow." In Wren v. Hynes' Adm'r, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 129, was a devise that when the testator's youngest child should come of age a fund should be "divided among all my surviving children or their heirs," and it was held that survivorship referred to the date of distribution, not to testator's death, and the words "or their heirs" were words of purchase, and not limitation. "A daughter of the testator, who survived him, having died without issue prior to the period of distribution, her husband is not entitled to an interest in the estate." This was because she had no vested estate. 1 Redfield on Wills, 486, states the same meaning for the word "or" so used. Jarman on Wills, p. *482, cites Girdlestone v. Doe, 2 Sim. 225, as English authority to show that where a legacy was given to A. for life, then to B. "or his heirs," "B. did not take the absolute interest, but that the latter words created a substitutional gift for his next of kin in the event of B. dying in the lifetime of A." "Where, however, the word 'or' is applied to a bequest which may not take effect in possession on the testator's death, another point presents itself, to wit, whether the word 'or' (construing it to be introductory to a substituted gift) is meant to provide against the contingency of the first-named legatee dying in the testator's lifetime, or the contingency of his dying in the interval between the death of the testator and the vesting in possession." "And here it may be stated that those cases in which the word 'or' has been construed as introductory to a substitutional bequest (in which sense it seems tantamount to the words 'in case of death') present a distinction between immediate and future gifts similar to that which has been just pointed out. Thus, a legacy to A. or his children, or to A. or his heirs, is construed as letting in the children or next of kin in event of A. dying in the lifetime of the testator; while, on the other hand, a bequest to A. for life, and after his decease to B. or his children, is held to create a substitutional gift in favor of the children of B. in the event of B. dying in the lifetime of A." Jarman on Wills, pp. *482, *1570. Legacy to T. "or his heirs." Held, that "the legacy to T. was not an absolute one, but that in the event which had happened—T.'s death before the tenant for life—his heirs took directly under the will as substitutes for him." Heyward v. Heyward's Ex'rs, 7 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 289. Note that the children of the two dead sons of Schaeffer took, not by descent from their father, but from their grandfather as purchasers under his will. 1 Underhill on Wills, § 353. Having given authorities from abroad—and many more could be given—I now refer to Toothman v. Barrett, 14 W. Va. 301, as decisive. A will gave a daughter a life estate in land, and gave all his land after her death to "J. B. or his heirs," and in case of his death then the land to be sold, and proceeds divided as in the will stated. The court held that the force of the word "or" was to give their father but a contingent remainder. See Ewing v. Winters, 34 W. Va. 23, 11 S. E. 718.

I will add that even under the rule put in Martin v. Kirby, 11 Grat. 67, the dead sons took only a contingent remainder, they dying before the life tenant, because that case applies survivorship to the date of testator's death, "in the absence of the expression of a particular intent on the part of the testator," and in this case the words "or their children" show an intent to vest estate in the sons, if living at the death of the life tenant. I think I have cited enough law to show that the force of "or their children" is equivalent to "in case of their death"; that they provide those who take in place of the first legatee; that they make a condition on which the vesting of any estate depends; that they have the effect to give only a contingent remainder to Schaeffer's children, preventing any estate vesting in them at the testator's death.

I consider it a case of contingent remainder, but others might say that it is a case of an estate vesting in right, but not in possession, at the testator's death, defeasible by the death of any of his children during the life tenancy. It seems immaterial, except in technical law, as the same result is reached. In Reiff v. Strite, 54 Md. 298, it was considered in this light. Land was directed to be sold, and the money given as by the will, and it was held that, as to that part given to S. S. immediately, he took an indefeasible right at testator's death, but, as to that part bequeathed to him subject to the widow's life estate, an estate vested in him conditionally only, and upon his death in the lifetime of the widow it became divested and went over to those embraced by the description of "or his heirs," and consequently assignees claiming under a deed of trust made by S. S. had no claim to the fund. See, also, Brent v. Washington's Adm'r, 18 Grat. 528, on this view.

It cannot be said that the words "or their children" were used to prevent lapse from death of a child in the testator's life, because likely those very words by their own force would prevent a lapse, and also because section 12, c. 77, Code 1899, would prevent it. He meant something else. "But although, in the case of an immediate gift, it is generally true that a bequest over in the event of the death of a preceding legatee refers to death in the life of the testator, yet this construction is only made from the necessity of the thing, and consequently, where there is another point of time to which such dying may be referred (as in the case where the bequest is to take effect in possession at a period subsequent to the testator's death), the words are considered as applying to the event of the legatee's dying in the interval between the testator's death and the period of vesting in possession." Jarman, p. *1568. I repeat that I consider this a case of contingent remainder. In a note by the able author Freeman (10 Am. St. Rep. 477) it is stated that while the courts lean towards treating legacies as vested, yet "when there is no other legatory expression or intention than that implied in a direction to pay or distribute at a future time, or on a contingent event, the bequest, nothing else appearing, should be considered as contingent." Here, what else does appear fortifies this construction. He further says that when legacies are payable at 21, if, or when, in case, or provided the legatee attains 21, "or any other future definite period, these expressions annex the time to the substance of the legacy, and make the legatee's right depend upon his being alive at the time fixed for payment." If he dies before, his representative gets nothing. This will say the legacies are payable "at" the widow's death. Our conclusion is to reverse the decree dated 2d December, 1901, entered on 19th November, 1902, as a nunc pro tunc decree, so far as it decrees that by the will of William Schaeffer each of his children living at his death took a vested remainder in fee in his estate, and that the deeds of trust from Emanuel Schaeffer and wife to Cleon Moore, trustee, dated 11th November, 1892, and the deed of trust made by John W.

Schaeffer to E. S. Troxell and Joseph Trapnell, trustees, of date 21st February, 1880, conveyed the interests severally of said grantors in said deeds, and that the interest of said grantors in said estate are liable for the debts in said deeds secured; and we reverse the decree made the 6th December, 1901, so far as it directs the payment out of the fund belonging to the estate of William Schaeffer in the hands of Daniel Heffebower, administrator, to Daniel Heffebower, of $1,744.69, and to the Geiser Manufacturing Company of $822.10, and to Frick & Company of $722.09, and we deny payment out of said fund of the debts secured by said deeds of trust. The cause is remanded for any order that may be deemed proper not inconsistent with this decision.

SCHAFFER v. McJUNKIN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 7, 1903.)

CERTIORARI TO JUSTICE—FORM OF PROCEDURE—APPEAL.

1. A case in a circuit court on a writ of certiorari to a judgment of a justice of the peace, awarded before the decision of the case of Richmond v. Henderson, 37 S. E. 653, 48 W. Va. 389, and within 10 days from the date of the judgment, will, upon the request of the plaintiff in error, be treated as being in said court on an appeal allowed by the court or judge thereof, although the requirements of the statute as to the form of the petition and bond in such an appeal have not been complied with.

Error to Circuit Court, Tyler County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Action by H. M. Schaffer against Frank Thompson and E. J. McJunkin, before a justice. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings certiorari to the circuit court. From an order reversing the judgment, a writ of error was awarded. Affirmed.

F. D. Young and McCoy & Hanes, for plaintiffs in error. R. L. Moore and G. E. Kesterson, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. On September 6, 1899, H. M. Schaffer instituted a civil action against Frank Thompson and E. J. McJunkin, partners as Thompson & McJunkin, before H. B. Hissam, a justice of the peace of Tyler county, for the recovery of the possession of certain personal property, in which, on the 16th day of September, 1899, on the demand of the plaintiff, a jury was impaneled, a trial had, and a verdict rendered for the plaintiff, in the absence of the defendants, they having failed to appear. Two days later, on the motion of the defendants, the plaintiff being represented by his attorney, the judgment and verdict were set aside, and a new trial granted, to be had on September 25, 1899, which, being had on said day, resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants. On the 3d day of October, 1899, upon the petition of the plaintiff, a writ of certiorari was awarded, by the judge of the circuit court of Tyler county, requiring bond to be given in the penalty of $100, with security to be approved by the clerk of the court. The bond was given on the 19th day of October, 1899, but there is no indorsement on it showing the approval of the clerk. On the 24th day of December, 1899, on motion of the defendants, the bond was held insufficient, and a new one in the penalty of $75 was ordered, which was given. The next order was made on April 14, 1900, when a motion to quash the writ and dismiss the petition was made, accompanied by an affidavit of the justice purporting to show that his certificate of the evidence had been altered since made by him. Counter affidavits were filed later by the defendants, and on April 21, 1900, upon hearing, the court overruled the motion, and entered an order reversing the judgment and setting aside the verdict, and ordering that the case be retained upon the docket for trial in the circuit court, and to that order a writ of error and supersedeas was awarded by a judge of this court upon the petition of the defendants.

The principles announced in Harbert v. Railroad Co., 50 W. Va. 253, 40 S. E. 377, and Falconer v. Simmons, 51 W. Va. 172, 41 S. E. 193, govern the case. Disregarding all technicalities and informalities, the court decides in those two cases that, although a writ of certiorari does not lie from the circuit court to the judgment of a justice rendered upon the verdict of a jury, and is null and void as a writ of certiorari, yet, as it is a protest against the judgment, and as the decisions were, until that of the case of Richmond v. Henderson, 48 W. Va. 389, 37 S. E. 653, was rendered, a petition for a writ of certiorari was the only form in which such protest could be made, the writ awarded upon such petition should be treated as an order granting an appeal, under section 17 of chapter 50 of the Code of 1899, although made within 10 days from the judgment, contrary to the express letter of the statute, and without any showing of excuse for not having taken the appeal in the justice's court, as required by the statute, thereby proceeding upon the theory that the court must take judicial notice of the existence of a sufficient excuse in the fact that the decisions, as they then stood, did not permit an appeal to be taken in such cases. Against this liberality in procedure it was vainly urged also that the bond given was not in the penalty nor in the form of an appeal bond. The objections urged against treating those cases as being in the circuit court on appeal were of the same character and equally as strong as those stated in the present case, and the relaxation of merely formal requirements which rendered them unavailing must be permitted to sustain the position of the defendant in error in this case.

As the judgment of the justice has already been reversed and the verdict of the jury set aside, which would have been the effect of an appeal had it been granted, and the result of proper proceedings in the circuit court upon the request that the certiorari be treated as an appeal, had such request been made and proceeded upon, the action of the court, in reversing the judgment and setting aside the verdict and retaining the action for a new trial, is affirmed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings, if desired by the defendant in error.

BOUNDARIES—ACQUESCENCE—ESTOPPEL—DESCRIPTION IN DEED—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—EJECTMENT—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. Where a husband owns, in its entirety, one of two adjoining tracts of land, and his wife an undivided one-eighth of the other, which she conveys to one of her co-tenants by a deed without warranty, in which her husband joins, reciting a description of the division line and one of its termini, different from that given in the deeds by which the husband obtained his lands, and referring to said terminus as an agreed corner, and, afterwards, by partition, another of her co-tenants obtains that portion of the land in which the wife owned a part, lying adjacent to said boundary line, and sues the husband and wife in ejectment for a small triangular piece of land, the title of which depends upon the location of the division line, in the absence of title by adverse possession—the husband having conveyed his land to his wife in the meantime—the defendants are estopped by the recitals in their deed from relying upon the description of the division line contained in the deeds under which they claim, and cannot use said deeds as evidence of the location of the disputed line, if objected to by the plaintiff.

2. The description of the corner in controversy contained in the deed executed by the defendants reads as follows: "Beginning opposite Uriah White's house in the middle of Dry Fork at an agreed corner between Thomas S. White, decd. and Uriah White." Held, that as the description calls for no monument which can be ascertained by mere inspection, and without measurement or calculation, and, opposite Uriah White's house, Dry Fork is claimed to have two channels, over 13 poles distant from each other, in either of which the point may be, as determined by the evidence, the description does not import such certainty of location as to estop the defendants from introducing evidence tending to show that the corner in question is not a certain rock in one channel of Dry Fork, as claimed by the plaintiff, and the court properly overruled plaintiff's motion to strike out such evidence.

3. As the defendants had, by their deed, recognized and admitted the title of the plaintiff, it was error to instruct the jury, on the trial of the issue above stated, that the plaintiff must show title derived from the commonwealth of Virginia or this state, or make out a title by adverse possession under color or claim of title.

4. When the defendant in an action of ejectment sustains such relation to the plaintiff as estops him from denying the title of the latter, the general rule that the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, and make out a chain of title from the state, is inapplicable.

5. Actual, open, continuous, exclusive, and hostile possession of land for a period of 10 years under color or claim of title confers a perfect title, upon which an action may be either defended or prosecuted, and which is not destroyed by mere abandonment of possession after such holding for such period of 10 years, unless some other person has obtained title to the land, while such abandonment continued, by like possession for a like period.

6. Where the plaintiff relies upon such title, it is error to instruct the jury that such adverse possession must continue, without interruption, to the time of the institution of the action, if the evidence tends to show the completion of the required period of adverse possession long before the action was commenced.

7. A deed without a covenant of warranty estops the grantor from asserting against the grantee any title to the land he had or claimed at the time of its execution.

8. A deed with covenant of general warranty estops the grantor from asserting against the grantee any title to the land he had or claimed at the time of its execution, and also passes to the grantee any title to the land that the grantor may acquire afterwards.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by Lucy J. Summerfield against Uriah White and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. B. Maxwell and Harding & Harding, for plaintiff in error. McGraw & Post, Molohan, McClintic & Mathews, and Brown & Talbott, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. Lucy J. Summerfield complains of a judgment of the circuit court of Randolph county, rendered against her as plaintiff in an action of ejectment, involving only the question of the location of a boundary line between her lands and those of the defendant Hannah V. White, upon which depends the validity of her claim to the small triangular tract of land in controversy, containing about four acres. This disputed line was once a division line between two tracts of land, one of which was owned in its entirety by Thomas S. White, and the other by said Thomas S. White and Allen J. Currence as tenants in common. By the death of said Thomas S. White, and subsequent conveyances by his heirs, in some of which said Hannah V. White and Uriah H. White, her husband, joined—the former being an heir of said decedent—that portion of said first-mentioned tract lying next to the disputed line became the property of the plaintiff. Briefly stated, the history of her title is as follows: Many years ago Thomas S. White placed his son Harvey White upon the tract of which the land now owned by the plaintiff was a part, with the intention, it is said, of giving it to him, but never made any conveyance. The son died first, leaving eight children, of whom the plaintiff was one, and the defendant Hannah V. White another. Prior to March 6, 1884, the father died; and his heirs conveyed the tract on which the son had resided, containing about 123 acres, to said eight children and their mother. By this conveyance the plaintiff obtained one share in the tract. She then purchased the share of Madison White, her brother, and one-half of the share of Joseph, another brother. S. Lee White, having obtained one share by the original conveyance, bought the shares of Phoebe Ketterman and the defendant Hannah V. White, his sisters, and one-half of the share of Joseph White. Martha Jordan and Mary Pennington sold their shares to C. S. Armentrout. By partition, after these conveyances, the plaintiff became the owner of the land next to the disputed line, in its entirety. On the tract so partitioned, Harvey White had resided for a long time prior to his death, and thereafter his heirs resided upon it until the date of the deed conveying the same to them, March 6, 1884; and immediately after the partition, which the evidence shows took place probably 13 or 14 years ago, the plaintiff took possession of the part allotted to her. Some of the deeds by which said land passed as aforesaid are somewhat awkwardly drawn. The one by which Madison G. White conveyed his interest to the plaintiff bears date December 24, 1884, and the defendant Hannah V. White and her husband and the other brothers and sisters of the plaintiff joined in it; and in the deed by which Hannah V. White conveyed her interest to S. Lee White all the other brothers and sisters of S. Lee White joined. Each of these deeds conveyed an undivided one-eighth interest in the whole tract. As above stated, the land on the opposite side of the line was originally owned by Thomas S. White and Allen J. Currence in equal undivided shares, and they conveyed it by separate deeds dated, respectively, November 2 and 20, 1880, to said Uriah White, who subsequently conveyed it to his wife, the defendant Hannah V. White, by deed dated January 17, 1895. The land in dispute has not been inclosed by either of the parties, and the question of its actual occupation is one concerning which there is some conflict in the testimony. The southern terminus of the disputed line is not contested. At that point a sugar and elm are called for. The location of the other end of the line is in dispute. In the deeds from Thomas S. White and Allen J. Currence to Uriah White, the corner at the northern end of the line is described as "a beech and sugar on the west bank of Dry Fork," and is said to run thence south, 20 deg. west, 125 poles. These deeds are dated in November, 1880. In the deed from the heirs of Thomas S. White to the heirs of Harvey White, dated March 6, 1884, and the deeds dated December 10 and December 24, 1884, made by the heirs of Harvey White, including the defendant Hannah V. White, as above stated, the disputed corner is described as follows: "Beginning opposite Uriah White's house in the middle of Dry Fork at an agreed corner between Thomas S. White, decd. and Uriah White."

And the line running from the sugar and elm to said point is described in these deeds as running north, $8\frac{1}{2}$ deg. east, 104 poles. The beech and sugar called for in the deeds to Uriah White are not found, and it is contended by the defendants that the agreed corner called for by the other deeds is something over 13 poles east of the point contended for by the plaintiff, and yet in the middle of Dry Fork. At this point in its course, Dry Fork river seems to have changed its channel. At least, that is the contention of the defendants. And the point they claim as the agreed corner is in what they call the "Old Channel," on the west bank of which they claim the beech and sugar stood.

Upon the theory that the defendants are estopped by their deeds of December 10, 1884, and December 24, 1884, from denying that the rock in Dry Fork river at the point claimed as the corner by the plaintiffs, in what is called by the defendants the "New Channel," plaintiffs moved the court to strike out all the evidence introduced by the defendants tending to show a different location of that corner. This motion the court overruled, and upon its action in so doing the first assignment of error is predicated. As no rock is called for in the deed, and the location of the agreed corner therein mentioned can only be ascertained by resorting to extrinsic evidence, the estoppel, if any, created by the deed, cannot go to the extent claimed by counsel for the plaintiff in error. One of the essentials of a recital creating an estoppel is certainty, and where that element is wanting there can be no estoppel. Bigelow on Estoppel, 377, where Lord Tenterden is represented to have said it was a rule that an estoppel should be certain to every intent. The construction of the deed is for the court, but the location of the monuments and lines upon the ground is for the jury. Looking at the deed alone, it is impossible to say where a particular line or corner called for in the deed will be found upon the land. The calls contained in the deed must be applied to the subject-matter, and that goes beyond the mere matter of construction, and requires the aid of a jury and the introduction of extrinsic evidence. If a monument called for by the deed is established by uncontradicted evidence, it becomes binding upon the parties. But where such certainty of location cannot be made, the evidence of both parties must go to the jury, and a motion to strike out the evidence offered by the one or the other could not properly be sustained unless the evidence so stricken out were so slight as to be wholly insufficient to sustain a verdict based upon it. If the corner called for in the deeds relied upon by the plaintiff was so clearly described as to leave no doubt about the particular point in the river, the interpretation of the deed by the court would necessarily involve the consideration of the latent ambiguity arising from the fact that there are two Dry Fork rivers, or, rather, two distinct and separate channels of the Dry Fork river. At least, the claim of two such channels set up by the defendants, and the evidence introduced in support thereof, could not be ignored. For these reasons, the ruling of the court on the motion to exclude was proper. That there is evidence tending to show the existence of the old channel, and that the corner in dispute is located in or near it, is undeniable.

Though the defendants are not estopped to deny that the agreed corner is located in the so-called new channel, the deeds of December, 1884, limit and narrow the scope of their resistance to that proposition. This phase of the case is not presented here upon any proper exception, but as, upon other grounds hereinafter to be noted, the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial, the proper conduct of that trial and the ends of justice require that the effect of the deeds in the determination of the controversy should be indicated. The description of the line in the deeds under which the defendants claim, bearing date in November, 1880, differs from the description given in the deeds in which they joined, conveying interests to the plaintiff and her cotenant, S. Lee White, and bearing date in December, 1884. The former described the line as being 123 poles long, and running to the sugar and elm on a course south, 20 west, while the other deeds described it as being 104 poles long, and running from the sugar and elm on a course north, $8\frac{1}{2}$ ——. In the deed executed by the heirs of Thomas S. White to the heirs of Harvey White, the description of which is followed in subsequent deeds, the course is stated to be north, $8\frac{1}{2}$ deg. east. As the monument is not so described that it can be found with absolute certainty, the courses and distances mentioned in the deeds control, if they can be reconciled; and, if not, either course or distance may be preferred, as shall best comport with the manifest intention of the parties and with the circumstances of the case. Ruffner v. Hill, 31 W. Va. 428, 7 S. E. 13. In thus seeking the true location of the corner, ought all these deeds, with their irreconcilably inconsistent descriptions or calls, to be given to the jury? That depends upon whether the defendants are estopped by the execution of the deeds of December, 1884, from relying upon the description contained in their own deeds of an earlier date. If so, the description of the disputed line and corner contained in the deeds of November, 1880, ought not to go to the jury. It is true that each of the deeds of December, 1884, only conveyed an undivided one-eighth of the tract of land. Neither of them purported to convey more than the one-eighth. But Mrs. White, the defendant, was a tenant in common with the plaintiff, holding under the same title. Their title and boundary lines were of the same character and coextensive. Admitting the location of that boundary line at a particular place for her own purposes, namely, as defining the territorial extent of her undivided one-eighth, she fixed the same limit for the other seven-eighths. Her husband, though having no title in himself, other than his contingent estate by the curtesy, joined in the deed. As to the one-eighth, they are both estopped to claim against those deeds. Herman on Est. §§ 573, 605. A married woman's conveyance estops her as to the estate thereby granted. Herman on Est. 716; Schaffner v. Grutzmacher, 6 Iowa, 187. It is true that the recitals in the deed of a married woman are limited to the estate which she has at the time, and do not estop her from showing that they are false. Herman on Est. 716; Griffin v. Sheffield, 38 Miss. 359, 77 Am. Dec. 646; Banks v. Banks, 101 U. S. 240, 25 L. Ed. 850. But Mrs. White, at the time the deeds of December, 1884, were made, neither had nor claimed any estate in either of the two tracts of land, except the one-eighth which she conveyed. Having conveyed all of her interest by that deed, and now not setting up any after-acquired title, she could not be permitted to make a defense, except by allowing her to deny the plain terms of her deed. Having parted with all her title in the land claimed by the plaintiff, and taken her husband's land by conveyance from him, she can assert no greater right under the title conferred by his deed than he could. By the deeds of December, 1884, he purports to convey the land according to the calls of those deeds. He could not now go beyond the limits fixed by those deeds without contradicting the terms thereof. As she stands now in his shoes in respect to the same land, holding exactly the title that he held, her claim can go no further than his could have gone. "Any person claiming under one who is bound by an estoppel is himself bound by the same estoppel." Herman on Est. 720. "Privies, or those who derive title from or through the parties, ordinarily stand in the same position as the parties, and are bound by every estoppel that would have been binding on the parties." Id. The application of the principle of estoppel is resisted by counsel for the defendants on the ground that there is no warranty in the deeds of December, 1884. But there may be an estoppel without warranty. The distinction between a mere estoppel by deed and title by estoppel must be kept in mind. A conveyance without warranty by mere estoppel cuts off the assertion of any title or claim which the grantor had at the time of the conveyance, but it will not operate to pass to the grantee any title afterwards acquired by the grantor. If, however, there is a warranty in the deed, it not only cuts off the existing title of the grantor, but precludes him from setting up any after-acquired title. It does more. Such after-acquired title inures to the benefit of the grantee and passes to him. "The old rule of law was: Where one, by a deed of bargain and sale, or lease and release, conveyed that to which he had no title, he was estopped by his deed from claiming an after-acquired title in it. But this rule has been repeatedly set aside, and the law at the present time is that where one conveys land to which he has no title, by deed of bargain and sale, without a covenant of warranty, a subsequently acquired title will not inure to the benefit of the bargainee, even as against the bargainor and his heirs." Herman on Est. § 653. "A warranty creates an estoppel which not only binds the grantor, but takes effect upon every subsequent interest which he acquires, and transfers it immediately to the grantee." Herman on Est. § 654. Here no after-acquired title, the passing of which by estoppel is dependent upon the presence of a covenant of warranty in the deed, is involved; and the question is whether, when there is no warranty, the grantor can assert, contrary to his conveyance and its recitals, any title which he had or claimed to have at the time of the conveyance; and it falls under an entirely different principle of law, resting upon the general doctrine that a man shall not defeat his own act, or deny its validity, to the prejudice of another. In Taylor v. Shufford, 15 Am. Dec. 512, 514, Henderson, J., said: "I think the counsel is wrong in attributing the estoppel to the warranty. The estoppel arises entirely out of the affirmation of matters of fact made in the deed. He has confounded estoppels and rebutters—things essentially different in their nature, although frequently producing the same results. A rebutter operates on the right of action to the estate. It operates as to strangers as well as between parties and privies, which is a consequence flowing from its operation on the right to the estate. An estoppel operates entirely as to facts. Its effect is to conclude the parties from making, and, of course, proving the facts to be otherwise than they are stated or acknowledged to be in a deed or other transaction out of which the estoppel arises." A party who has admitted a fact in his deed is estopped not only from disputing the deed, but every fact which it recites, and so are all persons claiming under and through him. Stow v. Wyse, 7 Conn. 214, 18 Am. Dec. 99. As the case stands, Mrs. White asserts no title in the land owned by the plaintiff. Her defense is that the boundary line of her own land, derived from her husband by conveyance, is at a place different from where it was claimed to be by the plaintiff. The husband, before conveying the land to her, by his deed, said that the line should run from the sugar and elm on a course north, $8\frac{1}{2}$ deg. east, to an agreed corner in the middle of Dry Fork river. By this he bound himself to the ascertainment of the corner and the line by that description. She takes the land subject to the same limitation as to boundary. By the aid of this description and any extrinsic evidence which may be introduced tending to show the location of the agreed corner, it is to be found; but the deeds of November, 1880, if objected to, giving different courses and descriptions, cannot be permitted to go to the jury as evidence of the location of the boundary line.

At the instance of the defendants, the court gave the following instructions over the objection of the plaintiff:

"(1) The court instructs the jury that the plaintiff must recover on the strength of her own title, and not on the weakness of the title of the defendant; and, unless she shows title derived from the commonwealth of Virginia or this state, then she can only recover by actual, continuous, adverse, open, and exclusive possession under color or claim of title to the land in controversy for ten successive years next before the bringing of this suit.

"(2) The court further instructs the jury that unless they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, or those under whom she claims title, have had actual, visible, adverse, exclusive, and continuous possession of the lands in controversy, under color or claim of title, for ten successive years next before the bringing of this suit, then they shall find for the defendant.

"(3) The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendants, or either of them, have had actual, continuous, visible, adverse, and exclusive possession of the lands in controversy, or any part thereof, under claim or color of title, within ten years next preceding the bringing of this suit, then they shall find for the defendant, unless they should further believe that the plaintiffs have had actual, continuous, adverse, visible, and exclusive possession of some part of said lands, when they shall find for the plaintiff only such part of said lands in controversy as she has had in possession as aforesaid."

"(5) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendants, or any person claiming under them, or either of them, have had actual, continuous, adverse, open, and exclusive possession of the lands in controversy, or any part thereof, under color or claim of title, within ten years next preceding the bringing of this suit, then it makes no difference what agreement the defendant Uriah White had with Thomas S. White, or any other person, as to an agreed corner, and they must find for the defendants."

To the first of these instructions there are two objections: First, it requires the defendant to show title derived from the commonwealth of Virginia or of this state, unless she has made out a good title upon adverse possession under the statute of limitations. Against the propriety of this requirement, it is urged that the plaintiff and defendants have derived their titles from a common source, which makes it unnecessary for the plaintiff to trace her title from the state. The general rule is that the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title. He must make out a perfect title, showing a grant from the state. Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 762; Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. 214; Low v. Settle, 32 W. Va. 600, 9 S. E. 922; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 481. "No length of chain of paper title which does not reach the sovereignty of the soil is sufficient of itself to constitute prima facie evidence of title." 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 484; Newell on Eject. 585. But the general rule is subject to very important qualifications. Witten v. St. Clair, supra. These qualifications rest upon the principle of estoppel for the most part. "According to the general rule, this proposition means that he can recover only on the strength of his title, as being good against the whole world, or as being good against the defendant by estoppel." 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 481. In the examination of the decisions touching paper title, this expression is found to have been used by nearly all the courts. The estoppel which renders it unnecessary to make out a complete chain of title from the government—the original source—arises in numerous ways. Thus, in Witten v. St. Clair, Judge Snyder gives illustrations in the following language: "As where the defendant has entered under the title of the plaintiff, and in subordination thereto, as tenant, trustee, coparcener, or licensee. * * * Likewise, when a party in peaceable possession of land is entered upon and ousted by one not having title to, or authority to enter upon, the land." Where both parties assert title from a common grantor, and no other source, the estoppel arises. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 491; Newell on Eject. 579. Most, if not all, these exceptions to the general rule stand upon the principle of estoppel. It is certainly true of the one grounded upon common source of title. "Where parties claim title from one person as a common source, they are estopped from denying the title of the original claimant from whom they derived title." Herman on Est. § 593. The position that the titles of the plaintiff and defendants were derived from a common source is not tenable. That of the plaintiff is derived from Thomas S. White, while that of the defendants comes from Thomas S. White and Allen J. Currence. The one title was owned by Thomas S. White alone, while the other was owned by himself and another person in common. The mere fact that Thomas S. White was a co-tenant of Allen J. Currence would not estop the latter from claiming title to the full extent of his deed, although such claim might be hostile to an adjoining tract owned in its entirety by his co-tenant. As to the tract owned by them in common, there was a privity between them, but none as to the other tract. From this it is apparent that the two titles in conflict do not come from the same source. However, as by their deeds the defendants are estopped to deny the title of the plaintiff, as has been already shown, it is unnecessary for her to make out a chain of title from the state. By their deeds they expressly recognize her title, and this is as full, complete, direct, and immediate an estoppel as could arise from their holding under titles from a common grantor. As the basis of practically all these exceptions to the general rule is estopped, it is sufficient, however it may arise. This being true, the instruction, in so far as it requires the plaintiff to go back to the state as the source of her title, is erroneous.

The next objection to the first instruction, if sound, is good against all the others, for, if the alleged impurity is found to exist in it, it has been carried into and infects all the others. This objection is that the instruction tells the jury that, in order to make out a title to adverse possession, that possession must have been actual, continuous, adverse, open, and exclusive, under color or claim of title, for 10 consecutive years next before the bringing of the suit; the contention being that such possession for any period of 10 years, whether next before the bringing of the suit or not, if prior thereto, ripens into a good title, and that it need not be continued down to the time of the commencement of the action. Newell on Eject. 736, says: "If a person holding lands in adverse possession abandon the same before the expiration of the statutory period, his abandonment will, of course, amount to an interruption of the possession, of the most effective kind; but, if the abandonment occurs after the adverse holding has ripened into a title, it will be otherwise. The law requires of the claimant holding adversely nothing but an adverse possession for the period required. As the period closes, his possession ripens into a title without any additional acts upon his part." Under our statute, such possession for 10 years gives perfect title, not a mere right to continue the possession, not a title to be lost by mere temporary abandonment of actual possession. It is not only a defensive title, but one which will sustain an action of ejectment as effectually as a deed or a grant. If, after title is acquired by adverse possession, the holder thereof loses the actual possession, he may maintain an action to regain it, just as if he had a perfect paper title. Sutton v. Pollard, 96 Ky. 640, 29 S. W. 637. In Parkersburg Industrial Co. v. Schultz, 48 W. Va. 470, 475, 27 S. E. 255, 256, Judge Brannon, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The statute itself confers and invests title in the occupant as effectually as does descent, devise, or grant, so that he may not only defend, but, if afterwards another enter upon the land, he may maintain ejectment on the title conferred by the statute, though he may not have the scratch of a pen to show title." This is supported by the citation of numerous authorities.

As the fundamental proposition of law laid down by the foregoing authorities has been clearly violated in that part of instruction No. 1 which requires the adverse possession of the plaintiff to have been for 10 consecutive years next before the bringing of her suit, instead of allowing her to show a period of 10 years of such possession at any time prior to the bringing of the suit, the court erred in giving it. By inspection of the remaining instructions given at the instance of the defendants, it is apparent that they followed the same rule. The second contains a repetition of the objectionable language found in the first. The third tells the jury that if the defendants, or either of them, have had adverse possession under claim or color of title within 10 years next preceding the institution of the suit, the verdict should be for the defendant. It is an enunciation of the same proposition in different form and language. In substance, the last instruction is the same as the third, and equally erroneous.

The plaintiff requested the court to give the following instruction, which was refused: "The court instructs the jury that although they may believe from the evidence that the defendants, or one of them, have introduced in evidence such a title, which, in the absence of proof as to the possession of the land in controversy by the plaintiff, would be held to be a perfect written title, and entitle the defendants to a verdict in their favor, yet if the jury further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff and those under whom she claims were in the uninterrupted, honest, continued, exclusive, visible, notorious, hostile, and adverse possession of the land in controversy, under colorable claim of title, for more than ten years, and that the defendant, just a short time before the institution of this suit, entered upon the land in controversy, claiming the same, that then such prior possession of the plaintiff and those under whom she claims entitles the plaintiff to recover in this action, and the jury should find for the plaintiff." While perhaps a little informal, this instruction is substantially correct in its statement of the law, and should have been given.

For the reasons here given, the judgment is reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

BASSELL v. CAYWOOD et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1903.)

CONTINGENT RIGHT OF DOWER—HOW CHARGEABLE—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

1. Where land is bona fide sold in the lifetime of a husband to satisfy a lien or incumbrance thereon paramount to the wife's contingent right of dower, and such land sells for more than enough to satisfy such paramount claim or claims and the necessary costs and expenses, such contingent right of dower in the surplus remains a charge (not assignable in kind) on such land, unless the same is sold free and acquit from such contingency.

2. The purchaser who buys such land subject to such contingency assumes the risk thereof, and he cannot have the same charged up to or set off against the purchase price.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Bill by John Bassell against John G. Caywood and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant John G. Caywood appeals. Reversed.

Davis & Davis and O. E. Schwartz, for appellant. Taney Harrison and John Bassell, for appellee.

DENT, J. "This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Harrison county, passed at the May term, 1903, in favor of the appellee, John Bassell, against the appellant, John G. Caywood, sequestering part of the surplus funds arising from the sale of a house and lot in Clarksburg upon which two deeds of trust had been given by Alfred Caywood and wife (he being the father of appellant, John G. Caywood) to secure two debts to a creditor, Mrs. De Hass. One of the trusts was made on November 29, 1892, and the other on May 4, 1896, by Alfred Caywood and wife, and Alfred Caywood and his wife died in February, 1899, leaving the deeds of trust unsatisfied. On the 29th day of November, 1902, Edwin Maxwell, who was trustee in the deed of trust of May 4, 1896, and who had been appointed trustee in place of Mr. Clifford, who had died, to execute the trust of November 29, 1892, sold the property in the manner provided by law, and appellee became the purchaser at the price of $5,501, of which sum he paid to the trustee, Maxwell, $2,000.73, being the amount of the two deeds of trust plus the costs, commissions, and other expenses of sale, leaving an unpaid balance or surplus of $3,591.26, for which appellee gave his notes, with personal security, payable in one and two years from date of sale. John G. Caywood, at the time of the sale, and prior thereto, was married, his wife being the defendant Rosa C. Caywood. The appellant, John G. Caywood, was and still is in bad health, and the chances all seemed, at the date of the sale, and still seem, to favor the death of appellant prior to the death of his wife, and as she, immediately after the sale, announced pretty emphatically that, should she survive him, she would claim dower in the surplus proceeds, and charge it upon the property, appellee filed his bill, setting up substantially what has been previously stated, alleging that defendant Rosa C. Caywood would not, in the opinion of appellee, should she survive her husband, be entitled to take dower in the surplus proceeds, and charge the value of it upon the lot, notwithstanding the decision in Holden v. Bog- gess, 20 W. Va. 62, and appellee prayed by his bill that the present value of the dower of Rosa C. Caywood, assuming that her husband was then dead, should be secured, set apart, or sequestered during the life of appellant, so as to exonerate the property sold in the event the husband should die first. The appellant, John G. Caywood, by counsel, entered his demurrer to the bill, which was overruled by the court, and the defendants thereupon waived the right to answer, and the cause was submitted upon the bill taken for confessed, and the court, upon a hearing, passed a decree directing that appellee should pay to the receiver of the court the sum of $739.37 as the cash value of the dower of Rosa C. Caywood, assuming her husband to be then dead, or that he would die upon the day after the date of the decree, and the court further directed that the fund should be held by the receiver during the life of John G. Caywood, unless his wife, Rosa C., should sooner die, in which event the fund was then to be paid to him, and, in the event she survived him, the principal, or rather so much thereof as might then be the equivalent of the cash value of her dower in the proceeds of sale, should be paid to her, and, in the meantime and during the joint lives of John G. and Rosa C. Caywood, the interest upon the fund was to be paid to him, and from this decree John G. Caywood has appealed. The decree also provided that when such sum should be paid by appellee he should be entitled to credit for it upon his second note given to the trustee, the first note having been paid."

This statement of the case is adopted from appellee's brief. It is evident therefrom that the object of the litigation is to have this court review and disapprove of its decision in the case of Holden v. Boggess, 20 W. Va. 62; otherwise the holding in the syllabus of that case that the purchaser "made his bids and purchased the land with reference to and subject to said contingent right of dower" (page 62) must be conclusive of this case, and determine it against the appellee; for if he purchased with reference to and subject to such contingent right of dower, he assumed all the risks of such contingency in addition to the purchase price he agreed to pay. Such is undoubtedly the risk he did take, for he was fully aware of the decision, although he may have also taken into consideration a belief that he might be able to have the decision nullified. This is an additional risk he personally assumed. The decision established a rule of property which ought not to be disturbed except for the most cogent reasons. The appellee's case furnishes no such reason, for he purchased with full knowledge of the rule, and which probably enabled him to purchase the property for a less price than he would have had to pay had his present contention been at that time established by a decision of this court. Other bidders no doubt accepted such rule as the law of the land, and were deterred from higher bidding by reason of such contingency hanging over the property. So that the appellee has nothing to lose, but everything to gain, if he can transfer his assumed contingency from his own shoulders to those of the appellant. And it would seem to be equitable, even if the court should overrule the former decision, not to permit appellee thereby to escape the contingent risk he assumed. The decision does not and cannot hurt him, and yet it might be harmful to many others to overrule it at this time, when it has been standing over 20 years unquestioned. The appellee claims that he has a superior equity to the appellant. He has no equity, unless he can base it on his private belief that the law had been misconstrued, and therefore he purchased the property free from the contingency involved. This would be founding an equity on a personally assumed risk, while, on the other hand, the appellant and other bidders had the right to believe that the property was being sold subject to the contingency. The equity, it is to be regarded, rests with the appellant. When the law is known in advance, purchasers are presumed to purchase with full knowledge thereof, and it would be unfair and unjust to change it so as to affect contracts of which it has become a part. 23 Am. & En. En. Law, 28, 27 Am. Dec. 633; Boon v. Bowers, 30 Miss. 256, 64 Am. Dec. 159; Wilson v. Perry, 29 W. Va. 169, 1 S. E. 302. From this it is plain that the appellee is not in a position to ask this court to overrule the case of Holden v. Boggess, although the statute may have been erroneously construed. He has neither equity nor justice on his side. If the property had for any reason been sold free from the contingency, his position might have been different. There may be cases in which it would be proper for a trustee or court to sell property free from a contingent right of dower. In such cases the purchaser will be protected by a sequestration of a proper proportion of the proceeds of sale. Even if the appellee had some right to attack the decision referred to, this court could not overrule it, though it did not properly expound the law, except for good and cogent reasons to promote the ends of justice and vindicate the law. The decision is to the effect that, if a purchaser buy lands sold to pay liens thereon, and the wife of the owner has a contingent right of dower in the surplus proceeds of sale, such purchaser takes such lands subject to such contingent right of dower to the extent that the amount thereof may be charged against such lands in his hands when such dower right may become consummate, unless such dower right has been otherwise provided for or satisfied. The section of Code 1899 construed is section 3, c. 65, which reads as follows: "Where the land is bona fide sold in the lifetime of a husband to satisfy a lien or incumbrance thereon, created by deed in which the wife is united, or for the purchase money thereof, whether she has united therein or not, or created before the marriage, or otherwise paramount to the claim of the wife, she shall have no right to be endowed in the said land. But if a surplus of the proceeds of sale remain after satisfying the said lien or incumbrance or purchase money, she shall be entitled to dower in said surplus, and a court of equity having jurisdiction of the case may make such order as may seem to it proper to secure her right." The appellee claims that this section means, and should be so construed, that such land is to be sold entirely free and acquit from such contingent right of dower; that it only attaches to the surplus, and that it is the duty of a court of equity in all cases to secure such right. On first impression this undoubtedly appears to be the true meaning of the statute, but when we come to take into consideration the nature of a contingent right of dower, that it is a mere inchoate expectancy, which may never become vested, about which no suit can be maintained, the construction of such section must be broad enough to accomplish the end of its enactment. George et al. v. Hess, 48 W. Va. 534, 37 S. E. 564. The first clause bars her dower in the land to the extent of the paramount liens, and also prevents the dower in the surplus being assigned in kind. The second clause gives her dower in the surplus, and by the retention of the word "dower" makes it an interest in and chargeable against the land except as qualified by the first clause, and this is that it cannot be assigned in kind, but may be to the extent of the surplus as a measure of value charged against the same. It is also provided that in any proper case a court of equity may secure such right of dower. There may be cases in which it may be proper and right to sell the land with the consent of those in interest, and with or without the consent of the doweress, free and acquit from such contingency; and in such cases it would be the duty of a court of equity having jurisdiction thereof to provide for the securing of such dower right. Ordinarily, the only way to provide for such contingency is to permit the land to be sold subject thereto. To give a different construction to this section, we must treat the dower right as something more than an inchoate expectancy, and change the common-law rules in relation thereto, and it might become necessary before sales could be made of lands in which a wife may have a contingent right of dower to have such wife impleaded, and the value of such contingency ascertained and secured, and thus impose upon courts of equity much unnecessary and vain labor. How much better it is to allow the purchaser to take the risk of such contingency? If he wants to get rid of it, he can do so by purchase, as a wife has the right to relinquish the same. Thus it is plain that the conclusion reached by the court in the case of Holden v. Boggess is neither unjust nor unreasonable, although the language of the statute might be otherwise construed. If purchasers understand, as the purchaser did in this case, that in judicial and other similar sales they are purchasing subject to any contingent right of dower that may exist against the land, they may make their bids accordingly, and assume the risks thereof. If owners and others want the land sold free and acquit from such contingencies, they can make the necessary legal provision for so doing. To overrule Holden v. Boggess, we must also overrule George et al. v. Hess, as both these cases are dependent on the same legal principles, are constructions of the same statute, and mutually support each other.

In the cases of Robinson v. Shacklett, 29 Grat. 99, and Hurst v. Dulaney, 87 Va. 444, 12 S. E. 800, the Virginia court reached just the opposite conclusion to that reached by our court in the case of Holden v. Boggess. Hogg's Equity Principles, 130, note. It seems to me that an examination of these cases shows that the Virginia court followed the apparent language of the statute without regard to the purpose of the enactment, and without considering the quality and nature of a contingent right of dower at common law. It is true they left undetermined the question as to how such contingency was to be secured to the wife in case the land is sold prior to the death of the husband, holding that on account of its weight and importance they would leave it for future consideration when properly presented to them. This is the very question the court ought to have considered before pronouncing decree relieving the land from being charged therewith. They should have construed the statute as a whole, and not by piecemeal. This court construed it as a whole, and reached the just conclusion that in considering the nature of a contingent right of dower at common law and by statute there was no other truly equitable way to preserve it to the wife so that she could secure it when it became consummate at the death of the husband, except by making it a charge on the land when sold during coverture, and that this was the only way in which the true intention of the enactment could be effected. In doing so the court merely held that the land, unless otherwise provided, was sold subject to the contingent right of dower, and the purchaser assumed the risk thereof. This is the usual practice in equity when such contingency, being an inchoate expectancy, hovers over land. It is too uncertain for equitable consideration, and the risk thereof is left to the purchaser. On the other hand, the Virginia court holds that by virtue of the statute the land is sold free and acquit from, and the court finds no abiding place for such contingency. Now, if the court had gone further, and held that the common-law nature of a contingent right of dower had been so changed by the statute as to give a court of equity jurisdiction thereof during the life of the husband, and that it had become a vested estate liable to be defeated on the death of the wife prior to that of the husband, and that provision therefor should be made in all cases coming within the purview of a court of equity, whether the wife was a party to the suit or not, then its determination might be accepted as final and just. Perceiving the difficulties presented, the court purposely avoided them. In doing so, it committed error, which hereafter will have to be rectified. In Robinson v. Shacklett, 29 Grat. 107, Judge Staples says: "The object of the statute seems to be to provide for a case in which the land is sold in the lifetime of the husband when the wife has a mere contingent right of dower. Whether the wife ought not to be a party to the suit to enforce the lien or incumbrance, and, if so, whether she is concluded by the decree; whether the court is bound to make an order at all events for the protection of her rights, or whether it has a discretion on the subject; and whether, if the court fails to make such order, and directs the surplus to be paid to the husband or distributed among his creditors, his wife has, after the death of the husband, any remedy, and, if so, what it is—are difficult questions, which do not arise in the present aspect of the cause, and ought not now to be passed upon. One thing would seem, however, to be very clear—that the land is not liable in the hands of the purchaser, nor is he bound to see to the application of the purchase money, or that an order is entered for the protection of the wife." In short, the court holds that the land is sold free and acquit from the contingent right of dower, but to determine what becomes of the contingency is too difficult a question for the present investigation of the court. In the case of Chalmers v. Funk & Sons, 76 Va. 717, the Virginia court held, Judge Staples delivering the opinion, that: "In the interpretation of statutes, as of deeds, the primary object is to ascertain the intention of the lawmakers, and to give that intention effect, although the construction may not be in conformity with the letter of the law. The whole statute must be taken together, and the different provisions reconciled, so as to make the entire act consistent and harmonious." If the court had followed out its own rules, and construed the statute as a whole, instead of avoiding such construction, its conclusion might not have been different from that reached by this court, which did construe the statute as a whole in the light of the common law. Bank of Bramwell v. County Court, 36 W. Va. 341, 15 S. E. 78. The Virginia court construes a clause of a section of the statute, and leaves a dependent clause not construed because it is difficult of construction standing alone. This court construes the whole section together, and arrives at a much more equitable and just construction, although not in harmony with the apparent letter of the law. Under the decision of this court all such sales, whether made by a court or trustee, are subject to any contingent right of dower existing at the time of the sale in the subject-matter thereof, unless otherwise provided, and the purchaser assumes the risk of such contingency ever becoming vested. Under the decision of the Virginia court all such sales are made free and acquit from all such contingencies, and they are left to take care of themselves, subject to future determination of the court on proper case presented. It does not make any difference to a purchaser which of these rules prevail if he has notice thereof at the time of his purchase. The rule becomes a part of his purchase. He makes his purchase with open eyes, and if under it he purchases subject to the contingency, he assumes the responsibility thereof. If, on the other hand, he purchases free and acquit from such contingency, the responsibility never attaches to him. The plaintiff in this case is not an innocent purchaser. He was familiar with the rule, and stated it to the trustee making the sale. The purchaser in Holden v. Boggess might with some degree of propriety claim to be an innocent purchaser. Not so the purchaser in the present case. He knew of the conflict between the Virginia court and this court. He took the risk of being able to convince the court of its error. This does not make him an innocent purchaser, for he was fully aware of the dangerous character of the risk he assumed in so doing. He was probably urged on thereto by the decisions of this court in the cases of Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 164; Richmond v. Henderson, 48 W. Va. 389, 37 S. E. 653, 86 Am. St. Rep. 17; Ralston v. Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. 326, 76 Am. St. Rep. 834; and Mayer v. Frobe, 40 W. Va. 246, 22 S. E. 58. This case lacks the necessity and justice that influenced the court in the other cases referred to, and he fails to show any good cause for overruling the case attacked other than the mere letter of the law, without regard to its spirit and intention. His contention cannot be sustained. The case of Iaegre v. Bossieux, 15 Grat. 83, 76 Am. Dec. 189, is not inconsistent with this determination, as it is herein recognized that a court of equity, by consent of the parties in interest, may direct a sale free and acquit from a contingent right of dower. In such case the contingency does not follow the property into the hands of the purchaser, but attaches to the proceeds of sale, and it becomes obligatory on the court to make the necessary provision for the preservation of the wife's rights during coverture. The decision of this court in the cases of Holden v. Boggess and George v. Hess are approved, and, as plaintiff became the purchaser of the property in controversy subject to the contingent right of dower, he is not entitled to the relief prayed for in his bill.

The decree is reversed, the demurrer sustained, and the bill dismissed as being without equity.

H. O. HURLBURT & SONS v. STRAUB.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Dec. 5, 1903.)

OFFICE JUDGMENT—SETTING ASIDE—GAMING—CHECK IN PAYMENT—MONEY LOANED—NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENT—REVERSAL ON APPEAL.

1. Where the plaintiff has filed with his declaration at rules the affidavit required by section 48, c. 125, Code 1899, the circuit court has no authority to set aside the office judgment, regularly entered, until the defendant has pleaded to issue and filed his counter affidavit with his plea; but it is the duty of such court, in the absence of such affidavit, to enter up judgment on the plaintiff's affidavit.

2. When the defendant fails to file such affidavit at the first term of court at which such office judgment becomes final, he cannot file it at any succeeding term of court.

3. The alleged loser in a game of poker gave the winner a check for $500, payable to an innocent merchant firm. The firm refused to accept it until the loser promised payment thereof on maturity. Such check is not void under section 1, c. 97, Code 1899, as it represents a debt between the firm and the loser, with which the winner has nothing to do.

4. The loaning of money to pay a gaming debt, not at the time thereof, but after such debt has been incurred, is not forbidden by the statute against gaming (chapter 97, Code 1899), even though the lender has knowledge for what purpose the money is going to be used.

5. A note or check payable to the winner in a gaming transaction is void, and no suit can be maintained thereon, even by an innocent holder for value, unless the maker has induced the purchase thereof by promising payment. In such case the maker is estopped, as against such innocent holder, from setting up the gaming consideration for such note or check.

6. A bona fide holder for value of a negotiable instrument not void, taken in due course of business, takes the same free from all equities existing between the maker and payee of which he has no notice.

7. On a reversal of a judgment, if the defendant's pleas show no defense to the action, this court will render judgment for the plaintiff.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Taylor County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by H. O. Hurlburt & Sons against Charles R. Straub. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

W. R. Dent, for plaintiffs in error.

DENT, J. H. O. Hurlburt & Sons complain of a judgment of the circuit court of Taylor county, in a certain action at law wherein they are plaintiffs and Charles H. Straub is defendant. The facts are as follows: Some time in the month of July, 1902, Charles H. Straub gave the following check to one P. L. Bartlett: "Grafton, W. Va. Oct. 15, 1902. The Grafton Bank, Pay to the order of Loar Bros. ($500.00) Five Hundred 00/100 Dollars, for cash. Chas. H. Straub." Mr. Bartlett took the check to Loar Bros.' store, where they were carrying on the jewelry business, and asked that he be given the money on it. The members of the firm were absent, and the clerk in charge, knowing that the firm had before cashed checks for the maker, advanced $100 on the check, and held the residue until the firm should see it. When it was shown to Mr. George Loar, a member of the firm, he declined to accept it until he should see Mr. Straub. He immediately called Mr. Straub's attention to it, and Mr. Straub told him the check was all right, that he had no money in the bank, but he would pay it on its maturity. Mr. Loar, being doubtful of Mr. Straub's financial ability, asked him if he would secure the check, and he assured him he would in any manner except by deed of trust on his real estate, as he did not want his wife to have anything to do with it. Mr. Loar, upon these assurances, accepted the check and paid the money to Bartlett, less the discount thereof. Mr. Loar was informed by Mr. Bartlett that the check was given in a coal deal. The next morning Mr. Loar again saw Mr. Straub, and asked him about giving security for the payment of the check. Mr. Straub informed him that he had changed his mind and would not pay the check. Loar Bros. assigned the check to the plaintiffs, who gave them credit for the amount on a wholesale merchandise bill. Neither Loar Bros. before acceptance, nor the plaintiffs, had any notice of the transaction between Bartlett and Straub, which it appears was a game of poker, and the indebtedness existing between Mr. Straub and Mr. Bartlett was for money lost or money loaned to be lost in such game. The check, being presented to the bank in due course of business, was protested for nonpayment. The plaintiffs then brought suit against Straub to enforce payment thereof. With their declaration they filed an affidavit under section 46, c. 125, Code 1899, of the amount they were entitled to recover. At December rules, Straub failing to put in an appearance, the office judgment was confirmed. At the January term the case was placed on the office judgment docket. Straub then appeared and moved to set aside the office judgment, and tendered his two several pleas in writing. The plaintiffs resisted the motion because he failed to file the affidavit required by the section aforesaid. The court, however, set aside the office judgment, and took time to consider of the pleas, to which action of the court the plaintiffs objected and excepted. The case so stood until the April term, when the court overruled the motion to reject the pleas, allowed them to be filed, and also allowed the defendant to file the affidavit required by section 46, c. 125, Code 1899, to which the plaintiffs objected and excepted because it came too late. The plaintiffs then filed a special replication to the pleas, in which defendant joined. The jury found a verdict in favor of the defendant upon his pleas, which the court on motion refused to set aside, but gave judgment accordingly, to which the plaintiffs excepted.

The first question is, did the court err in setting aside the office judgment? This depends on the language of section 46, c. 125, Code 1899. After reciting the affidavit filed by plaintiff, this section, in relation to the defendant, says: "No plea shall be filed in the case either at rules or in court, unless the defendant shall file with the plea, his affidavit that there is not as he verily believes any sum due from him to the plaintiff upon the demand or demands stated in the plaintiff's declaration. * * * If such plea and affidavit be not filed judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff by the court for the sum stated in his affidavit, with interest thereon from the date of the affidavit till paid." This language is imperative, and gives the court no discretionary power in relation thereto. If the affidavit is not filed, the court must enter up judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and if he refuses to do so, and arbitrarily sets aside the office judgment, his action is coram non iudice, and he may be compelled to enter up judgment thereon by mandamus. Mastillar v. Ward, 52 W. Va. 74, 43 S. E. 178; Quesenbury v. People's Building & Loan Association, 44 W. Va. 512, 30 S. E. 73. Having no authority to set aside the office judgment, he could neither allow the pleas nor affidavit to be filed at the next term, but judgment should have been entered for the plaintiffs. And it is the duty of the court to reverse the judgment and enter up the judgment the circuit court should have entered for want of the defendant's affidavit presented at the proper time.

As this case presents some interesting questions that should be settled for the public good, we proceed to consider it on its merits. The main question is as to whether a recovery on a check of this character is forbidden by section 1, c. 97, Code 1899, which is in these words: "Every contract, conveyance or assurance, of which the consideration or any part thereof, is money, property or other thing, won or bet at any game, sport, pastime or wager or money lent or advanced at the time of any gaming, betting, or wagering, to be used in being so bet or wagered (when the person lending or advancing it knows that it is to be so used) shall be void." Under a similar but more explicit section the court of appeals of Virginia, when this state was a part thereof, held "that the assignee of a bond for money won at gaming cannot recover, though the assignment was for a valuable consideration, and though he had no notice of the origin of the bond, unless the obligor before the assignment induce him to take the bond by promising to pay him the money." And in Woodson v. Barrett, 2 Hen. & M. 80, 3 Am. Dec. 612, Buckner v. Smith, 1 Wash. 299, 1 Am. Dec. 463, and Hoomes v. Stock, Id. 389, the doctrine was established that, if an assignee is induced by assurances of payment from the obligor to become the purchaser of the note, he can enforce payment thereof. These cases are on the theory that the contract is void and nonnegotiable in whatever hands found, innocent or guilty, unless the obligor has given new vitality thereto by inducing the purchaser to take it on promise of payment. Then it becomes a new promise between the obligor and purchaser, and is relieved from the inhibition of the statute. The statute forbids the loaning of money at the time of any gaming, to be used for the purposes thereof, when the lender knows it to be so used, but it does not forbid the loaning of money after such gaming, and not at the time and place thereof, to be used in the payment of debts thus contracted. In 14 Am. & Eng. En. Law, 642, the law is stated to be: "Where the loss is already incurred, any person, other than the winner, who advances money or other property to the loser to enable him to pay the loss, may recover such advance, in the absence of a special statute." In the case of Armstrong v. The National Exchange Bank, 133 U. S. 434, 10 Sup. Ct. 450, 33 L. Ed. 747, it is held that, "where losses have been made in an illegal transaction, a person who lends money to the loser with which to pay the debt can recover the loan, notwithstanding his knowledge of the fact that the money was to be so used." Both under the statute and decisions, the lender who has no knowledge that his money is going to be used for gaming purposes or to pay a gaming debt has the undisputed right to recover the same, nor is the note given for such loan either void or voidable.

In this case Loar Bros., at the instance of Straub, on promise of repayment and security, furnished the money to pay a debt which they did not know was a poker debt, on a check drawn in their favor by Straub. The check never became an evidence of debt until it was accepted and paid by Loar Bros. It is therefore an evidence of debt alone between Loar Bros., who had no part in or knowledge of the gaming, and Straub, the loser. The winner was not a party to it in any way, hence it is in no sense rendered void by the statute. It was accepted by Loar Bros. on the credit and promises of Straub alone. They would not have taken or accepted it from the winner, although they might have legally done so, as representative of a loan to Straub, if the latter had not agreed with them to pay it when it should fall due. If Straub had refused to promise payment of the check and repudiated it, they could have immediately recovered back from Bartlett the $100 advanced by the clerk, but by his promises and assurance he induced them to pay the balance, and hence he ratified the unauthorized payment already made by their clerk. In the case of Armstrong v. American Exchange Bank, cited, the court lays it down as an established rule that "an obligation will be enforced, though indirectly connected with an illegal transaction, if it is supported by an independent consideration, so that the plaintiff does not require the aid of the illegal transaction to make out his case." This rule applies to this case. Here the plaintiffs could make out their case without reference to the gaming contract. The check was nothing more than an invitation from Straub to Loar Bros. to pay for him the sum of $500, without any specification of the reason therefor. If they had accepted the check without consulting him, it would have been binding on him (2 Mod. 279, and cases before cited), for the consideration, as between him and Loar Bros., was the cash payment specified on the check, and not a gaming consideration. Loar Bros. were not satisfied to accept it without consulting Mr. Straub. He assured them it was all right, would be paid, and he would do anything he could to secure it. The next day after they had accepted it they again sought him about securing it. He then told them he had changed his mind and would not pay it. Mr. Straub did not seek them either time to notify them not to accept the check or that it was for a gambling debt. They were compelled to seek him, and he at first assures them that it is all right and will be paid at maturity, and after they had accepted and seek him to make it secure he repudiates it. The check not being void under the statute, the consideration therefor being cash, the Hurlburt Bros., being innocent holders thereof, for value without notice, are entitled to recover thereon.

An examination of defendant's pleas shows that neither of them alleges that plaintiffs had any notice of anything that would vitiate it in their hands as the innocent holders thereof for value. The second plea does not pretend to make any such allegation. The first plea avers that the check was given to one Bartlett in payment of a gambling debt, and that Loar Bros., before acceptance, had notice that it would not be honored. And it further alleges "that said defendant is not the holder of said writing obligatory for a valuable consideration and without notice of the character of said instrument, but had full and complete information of its being issued at the gaming table and in payment of a debt contracted at the gaming table." The plaintiffs are nowhere mentioned in the plea. Assuming that the plaintiffs are meant by the word "defendant" in the clause last quoted, the allegation is that they had notice "of its being issued at the gaming table and in payment of a debt contracted at the gaming table." It does not allege that they had notice that Loar Bros. had notice before acceptance that it would not be honored.

Although plaintiffs had knowledge that the check was issued in payment of a debt contracted at the gaming table, it would be valid in their hands unless they had notice that the acceptors were notified that it would not be honored before they accepted and paid it. Both pleas are based on the theory that the check is void under the statute, which, as heretofore shown, is not true—not being a contract between the winner and loser, but between the loser and Loar Bros., not parties to the gaming within the purview of the statute. The note not being void, the plaintiffs took it free from all equities existing between the maker and acceptor of which they had no notice. The only equity claimed to exist between the maker and acceptor is that the acceptor had notice not to accept prior to acceptance. The plea fails to allege notice of any such equity in the plaintiffs, hence as to them it was bad. Neither plea presenting any defense as against the plaintiffs, they should have both been rejected and judgment entered for the plaintiffs. All the other questions being legal, the only question of fact which could have been submitted to the jury was as to whether Loar Bros. had notice not to accept the check before they did so. On this, even the defendant's evidence is in favor of the plaintiffs. This, however, is an issue in which the plaintiffs are not interested, for there is no allegation in the pleas that they had notice of such defense. The gaming statute was enacted to prevent all kinds of gambling, and not for the purpose of allowing those who engage in such pastime unlawfully to foist on innocent parties, by any trick or device, their gambling debts or expenses. If the law permitted, how easy it would be for two gamblers with hardened consciences to fix up a check of this kind upon innocent parties, induce them to accept it on false representations, and, after they had mutually received and enjoyed the proceeds in common, avoid the check as being a gaming contract. Gaming of this kind would become very popular among gamblers, for they could continue to enjoy their beloved game of poker and make wholly innocent parties become their bankers and bear their losses. Such a law would be a law of promotion instead of prevention. If the defendant was really cheated, as he says, he may deserve some sympathy, yet he should not be permitted to make innocent parties pay his gambling debts. The lawbreaker must bear the penalties thereof. If a lamb does not want to be shorn, he must avoid the shears. The law will not permit him to drag the innocent beneath them.

The judgment is reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and a judgment entered for the plaintiffs for the sum of $501.60, with interest thereon from October 16, 1903, until the 5th day of December, 1903, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $535.85, with interest thereon until paid.

WEES et al. v. COAL & IRON RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 12, 1903.)

HIGHWAYS — OBSTRUCTION — INDICTMENT — INJUNCTION—NUISANCE—DAMAGES.

1. Public roads and highways are common property of all the people, and for their obstruction the statute gives a remedy by indictment.

2. Talbott v. King, 9 S. E. 48, 32 W. Va. 6 (Syl., point 1), reaffirmed.

3. A private individual who is injured by the obstruction of a public road cannot, by a suit brought on behalf of himself and all others who are similarly situated who would come into the suit and contribute to its costs, enjoin such obstruction as a public nuisance.

4. When the alleged nuisance is of a public character, the court will consider the injuries which may result to the public by granting the injunction, as well as the injuries to be sustained by the plaintiff in refusing it.

5. And, when the public benefit derived from the thing complained of outweighs the private inconvenience, an injunction will not be granted.

6. Courts should exercise great caution in enjoining acts alleged to constitute public nuisances at the suit of private parties, lest, in protecting the latter, much greater injury be done to the public.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by Perry H. Wees and others against the Coal & Iron Railway Company. Decree for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. B. Maxwell, for appellants. C. W. Dailey, for appellee.

McWHORTER, P. Perry H. Wees, Jesse W. Godden, Charles E. Mylius, Philip C. Harper, and W. Harrison Coberly presented their bill in equity to the judge of the circuit court of Randolph county against the Coal & Iron Railway Company, alleging that said company was engaged in the construction of a railroad southward from the city of Elkins to a point on Greenbrier river in Pocahontas county; that plaintiffs were landowners, owning land along or in the vicinity of the said line of railroad on or near the Shafer's Fork of Cheat river, in Randolph county, said railroad running through a part of the lands of plaintiffs Wees, Godden, and Harper, and near the lands of plaintiffs Mylius and Coberly; and alleged that there were a large number of other landowners similarly situated with reference to said railroad as the plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs' suit should be held and treated as a suit brought on behalf of the plaintiffs and all others who were similarly situated who would come into the suit and contribute to the cost thereof; that a public road had been established many years ago from a point within what are now the corporate limits of the city of Elkins, southward to the Dry Fork of Cheat river in said county, and commonly known as the "Seneca Road," and maintained as such public road for more than 20 years, and probably for more than 50 years, by the authorities of Randolph county, at considerable expense in repairs from year to year; that some six years prior to the filing of their bill the county court of said county at a heavy expense constructed a steel or iron bridge across said

¶ 2. See Highways, vol. 25, Cent. Dig. § 435.

Shafer's Fork of said river on the line of said public road, and the plaintiff Harper, after the erection of said bridge, relying on the permanency thereof, purchased a farm on which the same was located, which farm lies on both sides of said river, and he expected to use said public bridge so as to receive the full benefits of said farm; that about one-half in value and productiveness of said farm was on each side of said bridge, and the farm was much more valuable with the use of said bridge than if the same were destroyed; that plaintiff Mylius, after said bridge had been erected, purchased a small parcel of five or six acres of land on the south side of said river, near the end of said bridge, and erected a storehouse thereon, at a total expense to himself of about $1,000, and engaged in the mercantile business, and with said bridge remaining had good prospects of having a successful business, but with said bridge destroyed his prospects of success were greatly injured; that there had been a public road established by said county court leading up the northern side of Cheat river from said Seneca road from near the northern end of said bridge, and that plaintiffs Wees and Godden were the respective owners of farms located on this road, and, while it had not yet been entirely completed, it was so far completed that the said plaintiffs were able to use the same in getting to and from their said farms from Seneca road, and the new road was the only practicable way of getting to and from their said farms; that the defendant, without any authority whatever from the said county court or from the landowners, entered upon the said Seneca road at a number of places, and took the same at other places crossing over the said road, and for several miles of the distance, particularly some two or three miles below said bridge, destroyed the said road to such an extent that the same was not safely passable for teams, stock, or persons, and were then diligently employed laying their tracks on what it had made its roadbed, utterly destroying a large part of said public road, and making it impassable and unsafe, and injuring the substance of the value of the land of plaintiffs, and largely decreasing the value of said lands; that defendant had not restored the road so taken by it to its former condition, or so as not necessarily to impair its usefulness; that defendant had also taken and destroyed the said public road leading up Shafer's Fork from said Seneca road, so that plaintiffs Wees and Godden and all other persons similarly situated had no practicable way to get to and from their farms, which were located on said road which defendant had destroyed, without permission from the county court or landowners, and had made no road equally convenient in lieu of the same; that the defendant, in the construction of its road, in cutting timber from its right of way above said bridge, felled a large part of said timber into said Cheat river, and a flood, having come in said river, washed said timber down against said bridge and destroyed it, and that defendant should be required to restore it; that defendant, by reason of the taking of said county roads and destroying said bridge without the authority of the county court or the plaintiffs and other persons, was guilty of such an obstruction of said roads and such irreparable damage to the plaintiffs and each of them and to the public as amount to a nuisance, and that it should be inhibited, restrained, and enjoined, and by mandatory injunction required, to restore said roads, and each of them, and the bridge to their former usefulness; that, as the said roads and bridge were located, there was standing south of said bridge many millions of feet of merchantable timber, the natural place to market which, when sawed into lumber, was on the railroad near the northern or western end of said bridge, and plaintiff Mylius was the owner of a large part of said timber; that unless said bridge was restored he would have to haul his said lumber about two miles down said river before he could cross the said river to the said railroad, and there were many other landowners similarly situated who also had timber which they would at some time want to market, and to not restore the bridge would entail upon these timber owners loss upon the value of their timber, which loss was wholly conjectural, unliquidated, and not thereby subject to an action at law; and prayed for a mandatory writ of injunction requiring defendant to restore both of said public roads to their former usefulness or state, or to such state as not to unnecessarily impair their usefulness, or to make an equally convenient road in lieu of each of said roads, and restore said bridge in as good condition as before it was destroyed, or erect an equally good new bridge, and provide plaintiffs and each of them as good public rights of way to their land as they had before defendant injured and took said roads, and as good a bridge across the said river at the same location as the bridge destroyed, and that defendant be inhibited from further obstructing said roads with its tracks, engines, and cars until it had restored said roads, and for general and special relief.

On the 28th of June, 1902, the judge granted an injunction as prayed for, but with the exception that it should not be construed to prevent the defendant from proceeding with its work of constructing its railroad, if it proceeded to restore the public roads mentioned in the bill as rapidly as practicable.

The defendant, on the 8th day of July, 1902, gave notice to the plaintiffs that on the 18th of July, in the town of Grafton, it would tender its answer to said bill before the judge of said court, and move the judge to dissolve the injunction awarded by him. On the 9th day of July, 1902, the plaintiffs gave the defendant notice that on the same day, the 18th day of July, at Grafton, they would move the judge of the circuit court of Randolph county, in vacation, to so far modify the injunction as to absolutely inhibit, restrain, and enjoin defendant, its agents, servants, employes, and all others on its behalf, from further operating its line of railroad or doing any further work or labor thereon, and from running any locomotive trains or cars thereon, so far as the same in any way or manner interfered with the public roads or any part of said public roads as complained in plaintiffs' bill, and that said injunction when so modified be made effectual, effective, and complete until such time as said cause could be matured for bearing upon the merits, and until it had restored said roads and each part thereof, as by law it was in duty bound to do.

There is nothing in the record indicating that anything was done on or after the 18th of July, the day on which the defendant had given notice that it would tender its answer, and on which day plaintiffs gave notice to defendant that they would move to enlarge the injunction, except the taking of depositions by both parties, plaintiffs and defendant, between that time and the 28th day of August (except as it is implied in the final decree that the said motions were heard in vacation), when the cause came on to be heard "upon the motion made by the defendant in vacation to dissolve the injunction heretofore awarded in this cause, to which the plaintiffs appeared, upon the answer of the defendant and exhibits tendered therewith upon the making of such motion to dissolve, which answer and exhibits are now indorsed by the clerk as filed, upon general replication to such answer upon motion of plaintiffs to enlarge the injunction, also made in vacation, at the time of defendant's motion to dissolve the injunction, to which motion defendant appeared, and upon depositions taken by the plaintiffs and the defendant, and upon plaintiffs' exceptions to defendant's depositions, and filed before the hearing of the respective motions in vacation, and was argued by counsel and considered by the court. Upon consideration whereof, the court is of opinion that the motion of the plaintiffs to enlarge the injunction should not be granted, and doth refuse to enlarge the injunction, and is further of the opinion that the injunction should be dissolved; wherefore it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the injunction heretofore awarded in this cause on the 28th day of June, 1902, be and the same is hereby wholly dissolved, and that the defendant recover of the plaintiffs its costs in this behalf expended; and, no sufficient reason appearing against it, the bill of the plaintiffs is dismissed."

There is filed with, as a part of, the answer of the defendant, a demurrer to the plaintiffs' bill, in addition to the usual general demurrer, that "the bill is not sufficient in law." It is alleged, as ground of demurrer, that the bill does not show any such special interest on the part of plaintiffs, or any of them, as justified an injunction at the instance of private individuals against the alleged interference with a public road or against an alleged nuisance; that the plaintiffs' allegations of irreparable injury to plaintiffs were not based upon any intelligible statement of facts, and the allegations as to the destruction of the bridge over Shafer's Fork of Cheat river, being the result of defendant's acts, and upon which the mandatory injunction as to restoring such bridge had issued, were vague, uncertain, indefinite, and not supported by any reliable statement of facts, and that such statements as were made were not sufficient grounds for such injunction, and, without waiving their demurrer, answered the bill, denying the material allegations thereof, and filed with its answer, as exhibits, three several deeds made by the plaintiffs J. W. Godden, P. H. Wees, and Philip C. Harper, for the right of way for said railroad through their respective lands, wherein the rights of way were definitely set out and described, and also filed as exhibits with their answer copies of orders of the county court establishing the new road from the bridge across Shafer's Fork on the Seneca road to the line between Z. D. Wees and P. H. Wees, and also a copy of an order and judgment from the records of the circuit court of Randolph county, dated January 27, 1902, showing that upon appeal by Philip C. Harper, from the order of the county court establishing said road, to the said circuit court, the order of the county court establishing the said road was set aside and annulled, and judgment was rendered in favor of said Harper against the county court for his costs of the appeal; and denied that there was any established road above the location of the bridge to or through the lands of plaintiffs Wees and Godden, but averred that there was only a rough bridle path running up the river from the bridge on the south side of the river to the lands of Godden and Wees, and that fences of the landowners were built across said path; that respondent's railroad was not located along or upon said path, except in one place, where it crossed the same, and respondent's roadbed was there located upon the land that was sold and conveyed to it by the owners. Respondent admitted that it had at one or more places crossed the Seneca road, and at other places encroached upon the same with its roadbed, but denied that it did so without authority from the county court, and filed with its answer an order of the county court dated February 28, 1900, authorizing it to construct its railroad "across, along, and upon any highway, roads, or turnpikes within the boundary of Randolph county," and providing that any such highway, road, or turnpike, or any part thereof, so taken or occupied, should be restored as the statute provides; and averring that wherever it had interfered with any such road it had complied with the requirements of the law; and averring that whether respondent had had to make practically a new road on account of taking up the old road, or part of it, with its roadbed, it had constructed a road more solid, wider, and of a better grade than the road occupied or partly occupied, and that such obstruction as there had been made of the county road was only such a partial temporary obstruction as was unavoidable; that wherever it had crossed the Seneca road it had put in and was maintaining proper road crossings as was required by law and by the order of the county court; that as to the two or three miles of the said Seneca road below what was the site of the bridge across Shafer's Fork, it denied the destruction of said road to such an extent as to make it not safely passable for teams, stock, or persons, and averring that the county court of Randolph county had determined to change the location of said road, and, instead of continuing it on the southerly or easterly side of the river along the railroad of respondent to the bridge site, it had determined to cross the river about two miles below the bridge site at a place called "Kimmell Hole," and intersect the road again near the northern end of the bridge site, and near the residence of plaintiff P. C. Harper and the site of the store of plaintiff Mylius; and respondent, in consideration that it would be relieved thereby from one or more crossings over the said road, agreed with said court that it would construct the road on the location adopted on the northerly side of said river, and it had been proceeding with all practicable dispatch to make said road, and had expended considerable money thereon, all of which was known to the plaintiffs, as they had presented their bill to the circuit court of said county praying for an injunction to restrain the county court from altering said road; and filed with its answer a certified copy of the proceedings of the county court directing the alteration of the location of said road; denied that the construction of its railway had caused the washing out of the bridge over Shafer's Fork by reason of timber felled by it into said river, but averred that the abutment of the said bridge at the northern end was washed out in such a manner as to indicate plainly that the bridge was destroyed owing to that abutment having been undermined and going to pieces; and averred that it was the purpose of the county court to rebuild the bridge about two miles further down the river, and have the road cross the river at that point, as was also alleged in plaintiffs' bill, and that such action would be wise and greatly promote the public interests; that, under direction of the county court to construct the road on the easterly side of the river, James Coberly and C. M. Marsteller had contracted to construct the same at the price of $1,200, to be paid by respondent, and the contractors were proceeding with the work with all practicable diligence, and had it then nearly half completed, and said road was used or could be used in traveling the Seneca road from Kimmell Hole to an intersection of the old road on that side of the river, which had never been discontinued, and that it was the intention and purpose of respondent to have said contractors continue the work until completed; that the county court could not agree with the plaintiff Mylius on compensation to be allowed him for damages to grow out of the construction of the new piece of road, and directed proceedings to be instituted for the condemnation of the right of way, and such proceedings would at once be instituted but for the fact that Philip C. Harper and Mylius took an appeal from the action of the county court, and respondent was advised no proceedings could be taken to condemn the land of Mylius for the road during the pendency of the appeal; that under all the circumstances respondent was under no obligations to restore the road for the 75 or 100 rods below the bridge site, where it did not take the road for its railway bed, but where the supposed county road fell in or slipped down the hill, even had no action been taken by the county court for changing the location for that part of the road; that the supposed public road on the westerly side of the river to the ford about one-fourth of a mile below the bridge site where the Seneca road crossed the river could be traveled as well as it could before respondent began the construction of its railroad, with the exception of the place where the high water had interfered with it; that in every instance where the railroad had interfered with the road it had been restored to its former state; and prayed that the injunction awarded in vacation be dissolved.

This is a suit by the plaintiffs, who are landowners, on behalf of themselves and all others who are similarly situated who would come into the suit and contribute to its costs. This means all the citizens of that community. The object of the suit is to enjoin the obstruction of what are claimed to be two public roads, and this is attempted to be done by private individuals, who show by their bill that they are situated as are the rest of the members of the community or citizens of the neighborhood. The direct injury complained of is in being deprived of the use of the public roads, which are alleged to have been taken and occupied or destroyed by the defendant in the construction of its railroad. This is a damage to the whole community, and does not appear to work any special or peculiar injury to the plaintiffs, but the injury to plaintiffs, while it may be greater than to some others, yet it is only greater in degree; persons having more use for public roads or occasion to use them more extensively than others, the road being obstructed will, of course, be of greater or less injury to those having use for the road in proportion to their respective needs. In Talbott v. King, 32 W. Va. 6, 9 S. E. 48 (Syl., point 1), it is held: "An individual cannot enjoin a public nuisance, such as the obstruction of a road, unless it works special and peculiar injury to him, and that injury must not be trivial, or such as may be compensated in damages, but must be serious, affecting the substance and value of the plaintiff's estate. The first point of syllabus in Bridge Co. v. Summers, 13 W. Va. 476, reaffirmed." It is well said in the opinion in that case, at page 10, 32 W. Va., page 50, 9 S. E.: "Were it the law that any one consequentially sustaining damage from obstruction of a road, like others, or even greater in degree than others, may go into equity by injunction, a vast field of private litigation would be opened. To justify it, the injury must be special and peculiar to the plaintiff, and, moreover, serious, and certainly depreciating the value and enjoyment of his estate. The highways are the common property of all, and by our law are under the guard and care of the state. For their obstruction the law gives a remedy by indictment. The general rule of law is well settled, and individuals cannot enforce a public right or redress a public injury by suits in their own names. Brainard v. Railroad Co., 7 Cush. 510. Endless would be the litigation were every individual allowed to do so upon his own impulse or for private ends. It is safer and more prudent to trust the vindication of the public right to the public prosecutors and grand juries, and courts should rather limit than widen the jurisdiction to entertain private suits in such cases." In Blackwell v. Railroad Co., 122 Mass. 1, Chief Justice Gray writing the opinion of the court, it is held: "No action lies to recover damages for the obstruction of a navigable stream by the building of a bridge across the same, whereby the owner of a parcel of land and a wharf above the bridge is prevented from coming to the wharf from the sea in vessels, although his wharf is the only one above the bridge used for business purposes, and he is thereby compelled to abandon the use of his wharf for such purposes, and to transport his goods by land at an enhanced expense." In a well-considered note to Murdock's Case, 2 Bland, 461, 20 Am. Dec. 381, 391, in treating of the mandatory injunction, it is said, "Every case of this kind must depend upon its own circumstances, and, unless the damage which will ensue from withholding a mandatory injunction will be extreme, or at all events very serious, the writ should not be issued," citing Durell v. Pritchard, L. R. 1 Ch. Ap. 244; City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, L. R. 9 Ch. Ap. 219. "The comparative convenience or inconvenience to the parties from granting or withholding the injunction must be considered." Kerr on Inj. 231. In 1 Spelling on Injunctions, § 417, it is said: "Where the alleged nuisance is of a public character, the court will consider the injuries which may result to the public by granting the injunction, as well as the injuries to be sustained by complainant in refusing it.

Where the public benefit derived from the thing complained of outweighs the private inconvenience, an injunction will not be granted, and courts habitually exercise great caution in enjoining acts alleged to constitute public nuisances at the suit of private parties, lest in protecting the latter much greater injury be done to the public. Where the evidence is conflicting and the public injury doubtful, that alone constitutes good reason for withholding this extraordinary relief. For these reasons, a railroad being not per se a nuisance, a strong case must be presented to justify an injunction against its construction upon the ground of injury to the public"—and cases there cited. And in Hogg's Eq. Principles, § 232, in speaking of mandatory injunctions, it is said: "An injunction of this kind is rarely granted before final hearing, though it may issue interlocutorily where an extreme or serious damage would ensue from withholding it, and in case of interferences with easements; but this is done with caution and hesitation, and only in extreme cases"—and cases there cited.

The record of the county court of Randolph county shows clearly that no road has ever been established on the location starting from Seneca road near the bridge site to the line between Z. D. Wees and P. H. Wees, as claimed by the plaintiffs. The order of the county court establishing said road, made on the 7th day of July, 1899, was set aside and annulled by the judgment of the circuit court on the 27th of January, 1902, on appeal taken by Philip C. Harper, when judgment was rendered against the county court for appellant's costs and the cause ordered stricken from the docket. It is contended by appellants in case at bar that the road was established except as to where it passed through the lands of the appellant Philip C. Harper, but this is not the fact, as the judgment of the circuit court set aside and annulled the whole order of the county court establishing the road, without any reservation whatever. Besides, the defendant files with its answer a deed from the plaintiff J. W. Godden, and wife, for the right of way through his land in consideration of $1,500 cash, and the deed of plaintiff P. H. Wees, and wife, in consideration of $1,250 cash, and the deed of Philip C. Harper and wife in consideration of $500 cash, by which deeds the said parties respectively conveyed to the defendant the right of way upon which they were constructing their said railroad, and the plaintiffs cannot be heard to complain that defendant is constructing its railroad on the rights of way so conveyed to it by them. Defendant also filed with its answer a copy of the record of the county court of Randolph county in a proceeding to change the location of Seneca road from a point in said road at or near the residence of P. C. Harper down Shafer's Fork of Cheat river on the east side to a point at or near the falls or the Kimmell Hole. On the 14th of September, 1901, viewers were appointed to view a route for said road. The viewers appointed made their report to the county court, recommending a change from the westerly to the easterly side of the Shafer's Fork of Cheat river, giving as their reasons that it would shorten the distance; that it would put the road on much better ground for a road, as it would be on the sunny side of the hill, where it would be always dry; that it would take it away from the line of the railroad, being on the opposite side of the river, and that it would be a much better grade than could possibly be established on the other side of the river; and recommending the bridge site known as the "Kimmell Hole," with a natural abutment on the west side of the river, and the approach on either side of the bridge could be easily made and at small cost. The viewers reported the names of the landowners, and the amount of damages that would accrue to each of them. The county court adopted their report, and ordered the change of location of the Seneca road from the west side to the east side, as reported by the viewers, and ordered that the road on the west side between the points named be abandoned from and after the time of the completion of the road on the new location on the east side of the river. The Coal & Iron Railway Company submitted its proposition in writing to the county court to construct said road on the proposed location, in view of its change from the west side to the east side of the river, which proposition was accepted and ordered filed, and, the court being unable to agree with R. M. Dyer and O. E. Mylius for the right of way through their lands, the prosecuting attorney was ordered to institute and prosecute in the circuit court, in the name of the court, proceedings to acquire the condemnation of the right of way through the lands of Dyer and Mylius.

The court did not err in dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill, and the final decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

PINNELL v. HINKLE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 14, 1903.)

GUARDIAN AND WARD—ACTION ON BOND—LIABILITIES—NECESSARIES FOR WARD—SUMMONS.

1. An action at law on a guardian's bond cannot be sustained until after a settlement of his accounts.

2. A guardian cannot be sued for necessities for his ward unless he expressly promises to pay therefor. There is no implied promise which will sustain such action against him for necessities furnished the ward without his order, but, if he make an express promise to pay an action against him as an individual can be sustained.

3. A summons from a justice is against "B. L. Hinkle, guardian for Joseph E. and Mary Friend, infants." It is an action against Hinkle as an individual.

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by Edith Pinnell against B. L. Hinkle and another. From a judgment of the justice court dismissing the action, plaintiff appealed to the circuit court, and from an order dismissing the action she brings error. Reversed.

Wamsley & Coberley, for plaintiff in error. Keenan & Tyree and C. H. Scott, for defendants in error.

BRANNON, J. Edith Pinnell brought an action before a justice of Randolph county against "B. L. Hinkle, guardian for Joseph E. and Mary E. Friend, infant children of W. H. H. Friend, deceased, and N. Shiffet, surety on the official bond of B. L. Hinkle." The action was dismissed as to Shiffet in the justice's court on motion of plaintiff. The case went by appeal to the circuit court. Hinkle moved the court to dismiss the action because it was intended to collect money from the defendant as guardian out of the corpus of the estate of the infants, and the court dismissed the action. The case having been dismissed before trial, we must find ground for dismissal only from the face of the summons. The action, as begun, was on the guardian's bond. An action at law cannot be maintained on a guardian's bond until there has been an account or settlement, as provided by law, showing a balance in his hands. Roberts v. Colvin, 8 Grat. 358; 9 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 976; Perkins v. Stimmel (N. Y.) 21 N. E. 729, 11 Am. St. Rep. 659. Whether, after such settlement, only the ward, or also a person who has furnished necessities to the ward, can sue, it is not necessary to say, in view of dismissal as to the surety. Section 7, c. 82, Code 1899, requires the guardian out of the proceeds of the ward's estate to provide for his maintenance and education, and whether a third party furnishing maintenance can sue a guardian and sureties upon such settlement I do not say. If he could, it would be error to dismiss an action in advance of evidence, as it cannot be presumed that there was or was not such settlement and balance. But, the case having been dismissed as to Shiffet, we need not say it is a suit against Hinkle as guardian. The account filed does not appear to be part of the record. It, however, appears to be for necessities for the wards. Looking at the summons, it imports that the liability is on account of his relation of guardian to the two infants. That, we may say, though we treat the suit as one against Hinkle individually, is the ground of action. A guardian cannot be sued for necessities for his ward, unless he make an express promise to pay. He cannot be sued on an implied promise. Young v. Warne, 2 Rob. 420; Call v. Ward (Pa.) 39 Am. Dec. 64; Schouler, Domes, Rel. § 337; Broadus v. Ross, 3 Leigh, 12; Hutchinson v. Hutchinson, 19 Vt. 437; 3 Rob. (New) Prac. 266. These authorities show that, if the guardian promise, he is personally liable. Now, in absence of evidence, we cannot, nor could the circuit court, presume there could be no evidence of an express promise. There may or may not have been. It was error in the court to assume there was no such evidence, as its dismissal of the action imports it did. And how could the court say that it would or would not infringe on the principal of the ward's estate? The action is to be treated as one against Hinkle as an individual, the word "guardian" being mere descriptio personae. Thompson & Lively v. Mann (W. Va.) 44 S. E. 246; 3 Rob. (New) Prac. 265; Snead v. Coleman, 7 Grat. 300, 56 Am. Dec. 112.

The argument is made that there are two wards, each with distinct interest, and the debt of one separate from that of the other, and, if there be a solid judgment, it cannot be told how much is for account of one, how much for the other. But the suit is against Hinkle as an individual. If he said to the plaintiff, "I will pay you for the board of these two children," he could sue for board of both in one suit. If he made separate promises at different times, they could be united in one action in separate counts. There is no requirement of formal pleading in a justice's court. And this is only the summons. If a man agrees to pay for board of several of his hands, must there be separate action for each? The matter of how much would be chargeable to the estate of each ward if Hinkle made a promise would be a matter in settlement of his guardian account.

We think it was error to dismiss the action on the mere face of the papers, and we reverse the judgment, and remand the cause for further proceedings, if the plaintiff shall elect to further prosecute her suit.

SUBSCRIPTION—JOINT OWNERSHIP—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES—PARTNERSHIP—ACTION AT LAW.

I. T., as agent of F. & C., presented to R. a written contract for the purchase of a stallion at the price of $1,800, which specified that those who should execute the contract and join in the purchase of the horse should, after the purchase, own interests therein by shares of $100 each, the interest of each party to be determined by the number of shares for which he should subscribe. R. signed it, subscribing for two shares, and delivered it to T., upon the verbally expressed condition that it should not be effective as to him unless M. and W. should sign it, and, they refusing to join in the enterprise, T. obtained the signatures of 15 other persons who took the remaining 16 shares, and executed and delivered to T. two negotiable notes for the sum of $900 each, without notice of the condition upon which R. had signed, and F. & C. delivered the horse at R.'s stable, and indorsed and delivered one of the notes to a stranger, without having obtained R.'s signature thereto, and without the knowledge of the other parties to the contract, who afterwards paid it, and then instituted an action to recover from R. one-ninth of the sum so paid, proving the additional fact that, after the contract had been completed and shown to R., he expressed approval thereof. Held, that they may recover in an action at law.

2. A partner who has paid into the capital of the firm the amount which his co-partner had bound himself to pay may recover it from the latter in an action at law, as money paid for his use, no adjustment of the partnership accounts being necessary to a determination of the case on its merits.

Error to Circuit Court, Wetzel County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Action by B. B. Newman and others against A. C. Ruby. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. W. McIntire and B. T. Bowers, for plaintiff in error. Cornett & Newman and T. P. Jacobs, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment for $111.83, rendered by the circuit court of Wetzel county, in an action commenced before a justice of the peace, which was carried up to the circuit court by appeal. The principal sum recovered is $100, which the 15 plaintiffs claim to have paid for the use of the defendant, A. C. Ruby, as a part of the sum which he agreed to contribute in a partnership or joint ownership venture in respect to the purchase and handling of a stallion in 1898. At that time one Tracy, an agent of Fletcher & Coleman, of Wayne, Ill., brought to New Martinsville a Percheron horse which he proposed to sell for the sum of $1,800, and began his negotiations with the defendant, Ruby. He had a printed form of contract which Ruby signed, with the understanding that it was to be signed by John McMunn and John Witten. Tracy took the paper with Ruby's signature on it, and obtained the signatures of 15 other persons, but McMunn and Witten did not sign it. The parties who did sign it after Ruby do not appear to have had any notice of the agreement under which he executed the paper. No copy of this paper appears in the record, the paper itself having been misplaced before the action was brought. Evidence of its contents was given. Some two or three of the plaintiffs testified that it fixed the price of the horse at $1,800, for which two notes of $900 each were to be executed by the parties signing it, and that it specified the interest each signer was to have in the horse, and the amount which he bound himself to contribute to the undertaking, by making the shares $100 each. They also testified that the paper had on it Ruby's subscription to two shares when they signed it. After the other sixteen shares were made up, two $900 notes, both negotiable, were executed by all the parties except Ruby, he not being present at the time, and they supposing that he would sign them. He did not, however, and the first note was indorsed by the payees, and passed into the hands of Joseph Probst. Ruby denies that any of the blanks in the printed form were filled up at the time he signed it, and also that he subscribed for any number of shares. He further claims that he repudiated the whole matter, and announced that he would have nothing to do with it, because McMunn and Witten had not joined him in the enterprise, and he had not authorized Tracy to obtain the signatures of the persons who did sign. He is, to some extent, corroborated by other witnesses. But G. B. Woodcock, B. B. Newman, Louis Dulaney, and Jacob Yoho, all parties to the transaction, testified positively and fully, not only that they had no notice of Ruby's repudiation and refusal to go on with the undertaking until after the notes had been executed and delivered, but also to several admissions in different forms on the part of Ruby, and conduct on his part well calculated to lead them to believe the contrary. At the maturity of the first note it was paid by the makers, and then this suit was brought to recover from Ruby said sum of $100, his proportion of the amount paid.

That the paper was in the form in which the witnesses for the plaintiffs say it was, and bore the subscription of Ruby to two shares, and that none of the plaintiffs had notice of the agreement under which he subscribed until after the note had been made and delivered, are facts so well supported by evidence that the finding in reference thereto by the court below cannot be disturbed. The same is undoubtedly true as to Ruby's acquiescence for a short time after this transaction. Woodcock testified that, after the contract was signed up by all the parties, it was shown to Ruby, and he expressed himself as being perfectly satisfied, and that when they went to organize the company he said it was impossible for him to go, but that they might go on and organize, and he would be satisfied with whatever they did, and that after the organization was effectuated, and he was informed as to who the officers were and what had been done, he expressed himself as being well pleased. Ruby denies this, but the circuit court has found against him.

By signing the contract and delivering it to Tracy to obtain other signatures sufficient to make up the $1,800 at $100 per share, without anything on the paper to indicate what parties were to join him in the enterprise, or that his subscription was conditional, Ruby placed himself in a situation similar to that of one who signs a bond or other obligation upon condition that certain other persons shall sign it before it shall become effective as to him. The paper he signed was not only an obligation to Fletcher & Coleman, but a contract of co-partnership or joint ownership with such persons as might thereafter subscribe for the remaining 16 shares. The subscribers for these 16 shares, relying upon his subscription, and without any notice that it was conditional, executed a negotiable note, whereby they placed themselves almost in the same situation as if they had parted with $1,800 cash, $200 of which was on the faith of his signature. Had Ruby signed a note upon such condition, and it had passed into the hands of a stranger, for valuable consideration, without notice of the condition, he would be absolutely bound. The principal involved here is exactly the same.

"A bond which is a complete and perfect instrument on its face at the time of its delivery to the obligee was executed by persons as sureties upon the condition that it should not be delivered until executed by other persons, and it was placed in the hands of the principal obligor, and without being so executed it was delivered by the obligor to the obligee, who was not informed of the condition. The bond is the valid bond of the sureties, and they cannot set up the condition against the obligee." Nash v. Fugate, 24 Grat. 202, 18 Am. Rep. 640; Nash v. Fugate, 32 Grat. 595, 34 Am. Rep. 780. To the same effect, see Miller v. Fletcher, 27 Grat. 403, 21 Am. Rep. 356; Lyttle v. Cozad, 21 W. Va. 183; Webb v. Baird, 27 Ind. 368, 89 Am. Dec. 507; Cutler v. Roberts, 7 Neb. 4, 29 Am. Rep. 371.

But, aside from this principle, it was competent for Ruby to waive that condition, and there was evidence that he did waive it, by looking over the contract after it had been completed, expressing his satisfaction with it, and encouraging, at least one of the parties to go on and organize the "company," as it was called, under it. He denies this, but, as stated, the court has found against him, and the evidence against him is as strong as the evidence in his favor. Hence, under the rule, this court cannot disturb the finding. Board v. Parsons, 24 W. Va. 551; Lewis v. Alkire, 32 W. Va. 504, 9 S. E. 890; Hysell v. Coal Co., 46 W. Va. 158, 33 S. E. 95; Englerth & Rowland v. Kellar, 50 W. Va. 259, 40 S. E. 465. His condition is even worse than that. The case was tried by the court in lieu of a jury, and is regarded as standing upon a demurrer to the evidence, considering the plaintiff in error as demurrant. Board v. Parsons, 24 W. Va. 551; Clafin v. Steenbock, 18 Grat. 842; Lewis v. Alkire, 32 W. Va. 504, 9 S. E. 890; Black's Adm'r v. Thomas, 21 W. Va. 713. By demurring to the evidence he has admitted, in favor of the demurrees, all inferences of fact that may be fairly deduced from the evidence. Mapel v. John, 42 W. Va. 30, 24 S.

E. 608, 32 L. R. A. 800, 57 Am. St. Rep. 839; Talbott v. Railroad Co., 42 W. Va. 561, 28 S. E. 311; Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 345; Gunn v. Railroad Co., 42 W. Va. 676, 26 S. E. 546, 36 L. R. A. 575; Lewis v. Alkire, 32 W. Va. 504, 9 S. E. 890.

The only other objection to the judgment is the claim that the action involves the settlement of partnership accounts, and therefore presents a subject-matter belonging to exclusive equity jurisdiction—one not cognizable by a court of law. A part of the claim set up originally in the justice's court was open to this objection, but the circuit court eliminated it, and refused to permit the plaintiffs to take anything there except the $100, with interest and costs. This sum is clearly no part of the partnership account. It is a part of what Ruby agreed to contribute as capital, and for this an action at law may be maintained. "The remedy at law for one partner against another (save by the action of account) is, in general, limited to instances where the justice of the case may be attained without the settlement of the accounts of the partnership, which a court of law, except in the action of account, has no facilities for doing, and even in that action very imperfect facilities. But where no such adjustment of the partnership accounts is requisite to reach the merits of the case, a partner may as readily sue a co-partner, in a court of law, as a stranger. Hence, upon any covenant by deed, or upon any special undertaking without deed, whether the undertaking be express or implied, an action at law may be instituted by one partner against his fellows, supposing that the covenant or special undertaking be one whereby a partner agrees with his co-partners to do a specific thing, notwithstanding it relates to the partnership—as to advance a due proportion of the capital stock, in order to its formation; to pay a certain rent for premises occupied; to pay for work done before the doer of it became a member of the firm; * * * and, in short, to do any specific thing where the particular transactions are insulated and separated from the joint account." 3 Min. Inst., part 2, p. 700; 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 1043; Gow on Part. (2d Ed.) 86; Wadsworth v. Manning, 4 Md. 59; Currier v. Webster, 45 N. H. 226; Glover v. Tuck, 24 Wend. 153; Morgan v. Nunes, 54 Miss. 308.

"If a contract, though made concerning the partnership affairs, and in furtherance of the joint undertaking, is the individual contract of the parties who are parties to it, and if it is made by them in their own name, and not in the name of the firm, an action may be maintained thereon by one against the other, during the continuance of the partnership." Wright v. Michie, 6 Grat. 354.

From these principles, it results that the judgment must be affirmed.

GROSS v. LEWIS & SCHMIDT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 16, 1903.)

CONTRACT—REFUSAL TO PERFORM.

1. If, during performance of a contract, or after the time for performance arrives, one of the parties, by word or act, openly and clearly refuses to perform his promise in whole or in part, the other party is thereupon exonerated from performing his part of the contract.

2. When a court, by its decree or judgment, deprives one person of his money or property, to be paid or delivered to another, such action should be warranted by sufficient legal justification. Held, in this cause, the evidence does not support the decree.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by George W. Gross against James Lewis and Peter W. Schmidt. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

E. D. Talbott and Wamsley & Coberly, for appellants. C. H. Scott, for appellee.

MILLER, J. George W. Gross, at the August rules, 1899, filed his bill in chancery in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Tucker county against James Lewis and Peter W. Schmidt. Plaintiff also sued out in said cause an attachment against the estate of said defendants, which was, by the sheriff of said county, levied upon a tract of land situate in the county aforesaid, described as containing 497 acres. Both the bill and affidavit for the attachment aver that the defendants are nonresidents of this state. The bill alleges that the defendants are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $312.50; that therefore, to wit, on the 14th day of February, 1898, the plaintiff and defendants entered into a contract whereby defendants sold to plaintiff all the hemlock timber on the Haddix Run side of a certain tract of land, owned by them, containing 497 acres, situate on Haddix and Clover runs, in Tucker county, fully described in a deed of conveyance by Charles W. Mayer to defendants, bearing date on the 18th day of June, 1889. A copy of the deed is filed with, and made part of, the bill. The plaintiff further avers that the contract price for the said timber on said lands was 50 cents per thousand feet; that he took possession of said timber, and in May, 1899, sold the same to A. McCauley at the price of $1.12½ per thousand feet; that immediately after he entered into the contract for the sale of said timber to McCauley, and when said McCauley was about to begin the manufacture of said timber into lumber, the defendants repudiated the sale made to plaintiff by them, and refused to allow McCauley to carry out his contract with plaintiff for the purchase of said timber; that defendants, without any cause whatsoever, repuddled and refused to comply with their contract with him for the sale of the timber, and prohibited him from selling said timber to McCauley or any one else, and prevented him from cutting and causing said timber to be cut and sold, and the funds to be realized thereon by plaintiff at the price of $1.12½ aforesaid, whereby plaintiff would have made the profit of 62½ cents per thousand feet upon the whole quantity of said timber; that there was on the said land 500,000 feet of hemlock timber, bought by him from the defendants as aforesaid, and by him sold to McCauley at the price aforesaid; and that he has been damaged in the sum of $312.50 by reason of the refusal of defendants to carry out their said contract with him, and because defendants prohibited him from delivering said timber to McCauley. The plaintiff also alleges that the defendants are the owners of said 497 acres of land, and further says that defendant James Lewis, who was then, and still is, the owner of the undivided half of said 497 acres, did on the 1st day of November, 1896, convey his said interest therein by deed to his codefendant, Schmidt, for the pretended consideration of $1,500 cash, but plaintiff charges that no consideration was paid or to be paid by Schmidt to Lewis for said land; that said conveyance was made in fraud and without any consideration. The plaintiff prays that he may have a decree to subject said land to the payment of his said demand of $312.50, with interest thereon, and the costs of his suit; that said deed from Lewis to Schmidt be set aside and canceled as to his demand; and that the said land be sold to satisfy the same. The deed from said Charles W. Mayer and his wife to said Lewis and Schmidt, bearing date as aforesaid, for said 497 acres of land, reserves on its face a lien upon said land in favor of Mayer to secure the payment of two notes, for $500 each, executed by the defendants, bearing the same date as the said deed, and payable to Mayer on the 1st day of January and July, respectively, 1890, being for parts of the purchase money for the land; but Mayer is not made a party to said cause.

On the 23d day of November, 1899, the said circuit court entered a decree in the cause, reciting that it was heard upon the bill and exhibits, the order of publication as to the defendants, and the order of attachment against the property of the defendants levied as aforesaid. The decree then finds that there is due the plaintiff from the defendants the sum of $320.31, and declares the said sum to be a lien upon the tract of 497 acres of land. "And it appearing that the said defendant Lewis hath conveyed his half interest in the said tract of land to his codefendant, Peter W. Schmidt, which conveyance is without consideration and fraudulent and void as to the said debt of the plaintiff, and to that extent is set aside, canceled, and annulled." The decree further provides for a sale of the land in default of the payment of the sum decreed against the defendants.

On the 7th day of March, 1900, the defendants tendered to the court their petition, accompanied by proper bond, praying that the proceedings in said cause might be reheard, which petition and bond were accepted by the court and filed, the bond approved, and said defendants permitted to make defense as in such case is provided by statute. Defendants' petition seems to have been intended for, and treated as, their answer to the bill. This could be done, so far as it contains proper matter for an answer. Sturm v. Fleming, 22 W. Va. 404. It specifically denies every material allegation of the bill. The defendants aver therein that it is not true that petitioner, Lewis, without any consideration, or with any fraudulent intent, conveyed his one-half interest in said tract of 497 acres of land to Schmidt, but it is true that said Mayer on the 18th day of June, 1889, conveyed said tract of land to petitioners; that on the 1st day of November, 1896, petitioner Lewis conveyed to Schmidt his moiety of the same, and that Schmidt paid him for it. They further deny that Lewis is a joint owner of said tract of land, in equity or otherwise. A copy of said last-mentioned deed is in the record, from which it appears that it was duly admitted to record in the county of Tucker on the 5th day of February, 1896. Depositions for both plaintiff and defendants were taken and filed in the cause.

The plaintiff, in answer to the question, "State whether you purchased the hemlock timber and bark on that certain tract of land, containing four hundred and ninety-seven acres, on Haddin creek, Tucker county, owned by the defendants, about February, 1898; if so, state at what price, and all about it?" said: "Why, I did purchase it. I purchased all the hemlock on the Haddix Creek side of the survey at fifty cents a cord for the bark, and fifty cents a thousand for the timber." Witness further stated: "I just made the offer of fifty cents a thousand for the timber, and fifty cents a cord for the bark." In answer to another question, as to the quantity of the timber and bark on that part of the tract of land tributary to this Haddix creek, plaintiff further stated: "I think there was about six hundred thousand feet of the hemlock timber. Somewhere close to two hundred and fifty cords of bark. I sawed about two hundred and fifty thousand feet of timber off of that part of the tract for I. H. Rinard. I estimated the balance of it, in a rough way, at three hundred and fifty thousand feet, but there was more than that. I made this estimate when I was peeling the bark off of it." The witness further stated, that he had sold the timber purchased from the defendants on the 5th day of May, 1899, to A. McCauley, at $1.12½ per thousand, in the tree. He filed a copy of a contract in writing with McCauley, dated May 5, 1899, showing that, in consideration of $1.12½ per thousand feet, he had sold to McCauley all the hemlock, poplar, red oak, and white oak timber on the Haddix Creek side of the Mayer tract of land, owned by P. R. Schmidt. He also testified that Lewis sold the timber to I. H. Rinard; that Lewis told him that he could not cut the timber; that he notified McCauley what Lewis had done; that McCauley then tore his signature from the said contract with plaintiff; that by his contract he was making 62½ cents per thousand feet on the timber; and that he had cut the timber all down. Plaintiff also filed several letters addressed to him, signed by James Lewis, all purporting to have been written at McKeesport, Pa. The first is dated January 7, 1898, in which Lewis says: "I seen schmidt about the bark and hemlock I couldn't do any better with him than you offered he wants to know how he is to git his money. You state in the next letter that you will pay him as you get the money out of it," etc. The next letter is dated January 26, 1898, and says: "I seen Smith about the hemlock. I have told him that it had better be sold he has agreed to sell it. Let me know what you can give for the hemlock and bark [hemlock] by the thousand and the bark by the cord or what you will give for the hemlock by bulk," etc. Another letter, dated February 14th, states: "That is all right about the pay. You git at it, and git it off this year." And the last letter, dated February 21, 1898, says: "You can do as you like with the Tannery about the pay for the bark. Will leave that to you," etc. No specific time of payment appears to have been agreed upon by the parties for the hemlock timber.

The defendant James Lewis testifies that he sold to Gross the hemlock timber on Haddix creek for 50 cents per thousand for the timber, and 50 cents per cord for the bark; that Gross was to cut the timber; that the sale was in the early spring of 1898; that Gross cut down part of the hemlock timber, and peeled the bark off of what he cut down; that he picked out and went through the best part of the timber; that he had been told by Gross that Gross had sold the timber to McCauley; that he objected to Gross making sale of the hardwood timber to McCauley, because he had sold no hardwood timber to Gross; that he made no attempt whatever to stop the sale of the hemlock timber; that by the term "hardwood timber" he meant poplar, oak, chestnut, beech, birch, and all except the hemlock; that Gross had no right to sell, and had no claim whatever on, the poplar, red oak, and white oak timber mentioned in his contract with McCauley dated May, 1899; that afterwards Gross told witness that he would throw up his contract for the bark and hemlock; that witness could work it, sell it, or do as he pleased with it, as he (Gross) would have no more to do with it. "I received it from him. He told me I could have it." Afterwards witness sold the hemlock and hardwood to I. H. Rinard. Witness further testifies that he never at any time refused to allow Gross to cut the hemlock timber, that Gross did not object to the sale of the hemlock timber by defendant to Rinard, and that Gross afterwards sawed a part of it for Rinard.

Samuel W. Gainer swears that Gross told him that he had thrown up his contract with Lewis, and was not going to have anything more to do with it; that he had sent him word that he was not going to handle his timber; that it was the hemlock timber referred to. W. D. Murphy states that Gross told him in May, 1899, that he had given up the contract betwixt him and Lewis for Lewis' hemlock timber. He (Gross) said Mr. Lewis could take the timber, and do what he pleased with it; that he did not care if it lay there and rotted. He would have no more to do with it. H. H. Gross testifies that Gross told him that he had thrown up the contract between himself and Lewis, and would have no more to do with it. I. H. Rinard says that he purchased the hemlock timber on Haddix, theretofore sold by Lewis to Gross; that there was about 400,000 feet manufactured by him on the 497-acre tract.

Gross was recalled, and denied that he threw up his contract for the timber, or that he ever stated to witnesses Gainer, Murphy, or Gross that he had done so. He further stated that he had a verbal contract whereby he was to have all the hardwood on the part of the tract tributary to Haddix creek.

On the 15th day of June, 1903, the said cause was again heard upon the plaintiff's bill, and exhibits filed therewith, upon the order of publication against the defendants, order of attachment levied upon the 497 acres of land, the said petition of defendants, the depositions taken and filed as aforesaid, and upon the former orders made and entered. On consideration whereof it was adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the plaintiff should recover from the defendants, James Lewis and Peter W. Schmidt, $385.31, with interest thereon from the 15th day of June, 1903, and the costs of said suit. "And it appearing that the said defendant James Lewis hath conveyed his half interest in said tract of land to his codefendant, Peter W. Schmidt, which conveyance is without consideration, fraudulent, and void as to the said debt of the plaintiff, George W. Gross, and to that extent is set aside, canceled, and annulled." The decree then provides for a sale of said land in default of the payment by defendants of the amount decreed against them within a time given. From the aforesaid decree the defendants obtained an appeal, and assign errors, which are to the effect that the said decree is erroneous, to their prejudice, and should be reversed.

From the foregoing statement it may be concluded that on the 18th day of June, 1899, Charles W. Mayer and his wife, by deed of that date, conveyed to the defendants the said tract of 497 acres of land; that on the 1st day of November, 1895, Lewis conveyed his one undivided half interest therein to Schmidt; that said last-mentioned deed was admitted to record in said county on the 5th day of February, 1896; that some time in the early part of 1898 plaintiff bought the hemlock timber, and bark thereon, on the Haddix Run part of said tract of 497 acres of land; that no specific time of payment for the hemlock timber was agreed upon by the parties, and that nothing had been paid by Gross thereon; and that afterwards he attempted to sell the said hemlock and also the poplar, red oak, and white oak timber on said parcel of said 497 acres to Rinard.

It is plainly evident that Lewis, at the time of the alleged sale of the hemlock timber and bark to Gross, was not the owner thereof. In what capacity he was acting for Schmidt, is not shown, and is immaterial, because Schmidt does not repudiate that sale. It is equally as plain that Gross did not buy the "hardwood" on the land, and that he had no right thereto. The evidence upon which the court found the amount of damages in favor of the plaintiff is very vague and uncertain—too much so to be the basis of a decree against the defendants. "I [the plaintiff] think there was about six hundred thousand feet of the hemlock timber. * * * I sawed about two hundred and fifty thousand feet of timber off that part of the tract for I. H. Rinard. I estimated the balance of it, in a rough way, at three hundred and fifty thousand feet, but there was more than that. I made this estimate when I was peeling bark off of it." It will be borne in mind that Lewis sold to Rinard the poplar, red oak, and white oak, as well as the hemlock; and Rinard says that there was 400,000 feet of hemlock timber on the 497-acre tract, which he manufactured. Gross had manufactured none for himself. When a court, by its decree or judgment, deprives one person of money or property, to be paid or delivered to another, such action should be warranted by sufficient legal justification. The proof is overwhelming that Gross abandoned his contract and refused to perform the same. It is not contended that he had paid anything to defendants on the timber. He had cut part of the hemlock, but that was necessary for the purpose of removing the bark therefrom. Clark on Contracts, p. 648, says: "It may also happen that, in the course of performance of a contract, one of the parties may, by word or act, deliberately and avowedly refuse performance on his part. In such case the other party is exonerated from a continued performance of his promise, and is at once entitled to bring action." Defendants did not see fit to sue Gross, but sold the hemlock, along with other timber, to Rinard. On the evidence, the court should have found for the defendants. There is no proof whatever that the deed by Lewis to Schmidt was in fraud of any right of Gross, or that it was intended to be so. As is shown, it was executed and recorded more than two years before the timber deal between Gross and defendants took place. A plaintiff who alleges fraud must clearly and distinctly prove the fraud alleged in his bill. Armstrong v. Bailey, 48 W. Va. 778, 28 S. E. 766. It was error to set aside and cancel said deed as to plaintiff's alleged demand. It seems to us that the circuit court, upon the hearing, should have abated the said attachment, and dismissed the plaintiff's bill.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of is reversed and set aside, the attachment abated, and the bill dismissed.

GOFF v. GOFF.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 5, 1908.)

DIVORCE—ALIMONY—RECEIVER—BOND.

1. In a suit for divorce, the question of allowances to the wife for maintenance pendente lite, and to enable her to carry on the suit, to be paid by the husband, is within the sound discretion of the court, or judge in vacation, under section 9, c. 64, Code 1899; and the exercise of this discretion, which is a very broad one, will not be reviewed unless it is made to appear that it has been grossly abused.

2. Where, in a suit for divorce and alimony by a wife, the allegations of the bill and the record show the defendant to be the possessor of an estate worth from $75,000 to $80,000, composed largely of real estate, and the defendant has been enjoined in the suit from disposing of any of his real estate, and has responded to an order in the cause requiring him to pay a specified sum for temporary maintenance of plaintiff, and expenses of carrying on her suit, held, the appointment of a special receiver by the judge in vacation to take charge of the personal property of the defendant is an abuse of judicial discretion.

3. When a trust company, which is properly doing business under the laws of this state, shall be appointed a special receiver in any case or proceeding, it is not required to give bond. The capital of such company, together with any deposits required to be made by it with any officer or officers of the state, whether such deposits be a part of said capital or not, are to be taken and considered as the security required by law for the faithful performance of its duties.

Goff presented her bill in chancery, in vacation, to the judge of the circuit court of Randolph county, verified by her affidavit, against her husband, Charles P. Goff, Charles M. Kittle, the Elkins National Bank et al., debtors of said Charles P.

¶ 1. See Divorce, vol. 17, Cent. Dig. §§ 613, 770.

Goff, praying for a divorce from bed and board against the said defendant Goff, for cruel and inhuman treatment, reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt, and other matters alleged and set out in her bill, and for alimony and for money to carry on and prosecute her suit, and praying that the court would commit the custody, care, and management of the said defendant Goff's large estate to some competent person, that the same might be protected and preserved in the interest of plaintiff and of said Goff, and others who might have an interest therein; that the defendants who were debtors of said Goff and all other persons be restrained and enjoined from paying to him any of the money they owed him; that a deed made by Goff to the defendant Kittle, dated the 20th of August, 1901, for an undivided moiety in the undivided one-fourth interest owned by said Goff in the 6,806-acre tract of land known as the "Goff-Arnold Land," for the reasons set out in the bill, be annulled, vacated, and set aside, and the said Kittle enjoined and restrained from selling or conveying the interest in said land so conveyed to him by Goff; that the gift or supposed gift of the diamond ring by said Goff to Kittle be canceled and set aside and declared null and void, and that Kittle be required to surrender and deliver possession of said ring to some suitable person, to be named by the court, to be held by such person to answer any further order or charge touching the same, and that the court will make such provision for the maintenance of said Goff out of his estate as might be proper; and that Goff be enjoined and prevented from imposing any restraint upon the personal liberty of the plaintiff; and for general relief. Whereupon the judge made an order granting the injunction prayed for, and appointed Kent B. Crawford a receiver to take charge of the diamond ring, and directed the defendant Kittle to surrender the same to Crawford, who was required to give bond, in the penalty of $800, to have the ring forthcoming to answer any future order of the court respecting the same, and further ordered the defendant Goff to pay the plaintiff $500, to enable her to carry on her suit, and for temporary maintenance. On the 22d day of February, 1902, the judge of said court made another order in said cause, reciting that plaintiff had presented to him in vacation her bill, verified by affidavit, praying for a divorce from bed and board against the defendant Goff, for alimony, and other matters of relief therein specified, and that it appeared that process to answer said bill had been regularly sued out of the clerk's office of said court, and duly served upon all the defendants, and reciting that the vacation order made on the 10th of February, 1902, inadvertently directed said Goff to pay to the plaintiff $500 to carry on this suit, and for temporary maintenance, without any notice to said Goff of plaintiff's intention to ask for said sum. On motion of plaintiff, it was ordered that that part of the order which directed the payment of said sum of money be set aside and annulled; and it further appearing from affidavits filed that the defendant Charles P. Goff on the 10th of February, 1902, left his residence and the town of Beverly, and that the only persons occupying his residence were defendant Charles M. Kittle and a small boy, who were absent from the premises a great part of the time, leaving the house and effects therein uncared for and unprotected, it was further ordered that the defendant Charles P. Goff, his agents, servants, and representatives, be restrained and enjoined from preventing the plaintiff from returning to said residence and dwelling therein, if she should elect so to do, for the purpose of preserving and caring for the same, and the household goods, furniture, and chattels therein, with full power to control in said house as to its occupancy and management for the said purposes during the absence of said Goff from said residence. The restraining order of February 10th was so modified as to permit the debtors of Goff to pay their indebtedness to the general receiver, if they should elect so to do, taking proper receipts therefor from said receiver, and provided that a copy of said order of the 22d of February be served upon the defendants in the cause. The defendants Charles P. Goff and Charles M. Kittle filed their separate answers. A large number of depositions were taken and filed in the cause by both plaintiff and defendant Goff, and on the 16th day of May, 1902, the cause was heard in court upon process duly executed upon all the defendants, the answers of Goff and Kittle, and general replications thereto, and the depositions and exhibits taken and filed in the cause, and upon the orders theretofore entered; but, the court not then being ready to dispose finally of the cause on its merits, it was heard upon the motion of the plaintiff for an allowance for temporary maintenance, and also for expenses and attorney's fees in the prosecution of the suit, when it was ordered and decreed that plaintiff be allowed the sum of $60 per month, beginning January 21, 1902, for her support, and $500 on account of costs and attorney's fees in prosecuting her suit, to be paid out of moneys coming into the hands of the general receiver of the court from payments made to him by Goff's debtors. It was further ordered that any debtor of Goff might pay to plaintiff moneys not exceeding the amount specified in the order, and take a receipt from plaintiff for such sum. And on the 15th day of July, 1902, in vacation, the judge of said court, in pursuance of a notice served upon defendant Goff, on the 7th day of July, heard the motion of plaintiff to appoint a special receiver in the cause, to take charge of the personal property of the defendant Goff, when the notice of such motion was filed, together with the affidavit of plaintiff, Louise L. Goff, which motion to appoint such receiver was resisted by the counsel of Goff, who was present at the hearing. Upon the hearing of the motion the court appointed the Trust Company of West Virginia, at Elkins, special receiver of the personal property and effects of defendant Goff, with power and authority to collect such outstanding indebtedness as was due or might become due, of said Goff, and especially the claim due from Mable, McClure, and Stephenson, mentioned in the affidavit of plaintiff; and the judge being informed by counsel for defendant Goff that they had in their hands sufficient money furnished by Goff to pay such alimony as had been awarded to plaintiff by the court, and put in their hands for that purpose, they were directed to pay the same to plaintiff or her attorneys. These are all the orders or decrees entered in the cause.

The defendant Goff appealed to this court, and insists that the court erred in entering each and all of said orders and decrees. The first order that was entered on February 10, 1902, in so far as it allowed $500 to the plaintiff before the issuing and service of process in the cause, was null and void to the extent only of such allowance. "The judge had no jurisdiction to enter a decree for alimony pendente lite or permanent alimony without first in some manner summoning the husband to appear, and thus affording him an opportunity to be heard; and, should such a decree be entered without first citing the husband, a writ of prohibition will lie to prevent its enforcement." Coger v. Coger, 48 W. Va. 135, 35 S. E. 823. It is contended by appellant's counsel that the judge had no jurisdiction in vacation, and without notice to Goff, to review the order of February 10th, and cite section 1, c. 134, Code 1899. That section has reference to the correction of orders and decrees in which errors of the nature mentioned have occurred, and not to orders and decrees which were without the jurisdiction of the judge or court, and are simply nullities. Prohibition lies where there is an effort to enforce, or where there may be an attempt to enforce, a void order or decree. The court could at any time in term, on motion, or on its own motion, have set aside the order of February 10th, as null and void. The judge, by his attempt in vacation to set it aside, showed that he did not propose to enforce it. The case has not been heard or passed upon by the circuit court upon its merits, and the appellate court can only consider such questions as are brought before it upon the four orders entered in the cause and complained of. Section 6, c. 64, Code 1899, provides that "a divorce from bed and board may be decreed for cruel or inhuman treatment, reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt, abandonment, desertion, or where either party after marriage becomes a habitual drunkard." Section 7 of the same chapter gives chancery jurisdiction in all matters pertaining to divorce suits to the circuit courts, and section 9 provides: "The court in term, or the judge in vacation, may at any time pending the suit, make any order that may be proper to compel the man to pay any sum necessary for the maintenance of the woman, and to enable her to carry on the suit, or to prevent him from imposing any restraint on her personal liberty. * * * Or to preserve the estate of the man so that it be forthcoming to meet any decree which may be made in the suit or to compel him to give security to abide such decree."

It is insisted by appellant's counsel that the judge of the circuit court, by the order of February 22d, erred in appointing plaintiff receiver of the real estate of defendant, and without requiring bond and security, as provided in section 28, c. 133, Code 1899. The order is very peculiar. It does not, in terms, appoint plaintiff receiver of the home and effects therein of defendant; and yet it takes the custody and control of it from the agents and employes of defendant, and places plaintiff in the custody thereof, with full control, in and during the absence of defendant. Although it changed the possession of the residence and effects therein for the time being, the order does not clothe her with all the powers and duties of a special receiver of the property; and it was evidently not the purpose to appoint her as such receiver, as her occupancy is limited by the language of the order to the time that the defendant remained absent, and it is fairly implied that upon his return she shall relinquish her occupancy or possession. Whether this should be construed as appointing her receiver or not, no motion was made to set aside this ex parte vacation order; and, under the decisions of this court, no appeal will lie therefrom until such motion has been made and overruled. "An ex parte order granting an injunction is not appealable until after a motion made to vacate or set it aside." Brast v. Oil Co., 46 W. Va. 613, 33 S. E. 302. In the opinion in that case it is said: "It is not an adjudication between parties. One side has not been heard, and, until he moves the court that granted the injunction to correct it, he has no right of appeal. Appeals are to correct errors committed after hearing, and not to review mere preliminary orders made in the absence of one of the litigants. Such orders are still in the breast of the court until finally heard and determined. The party affected thereby has an easy remedy by motion, and an appeal will not lie until such motion proves ineffectual." 11 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 96; Aldinger v. Pugh, 57 Hun, 181, 10 N. Y. Supp. 684; and other authorities there cited. In case of Clark v. Bryan, 48 W. Va. 271, 37 S. E. 543, there was held to be "an appeal improvidently awarded to an ex parte vacation order made by the judge of the circuit court awarding an injunction and appointing a receiver." This case is referred to by counsel for appellant as a case in point, but which it was claimed was abandoned by counsel for appellant, and was not argued in the appellate court, and the attention of the court was not called to the authorities which the counsel claim fully sustained their views to the contrary. Why counsel chose to abandon an appeal which was, according to their contention, well taken, and was supported by the authorities, is not made to appear. The case of Clark v. Bryan has not been overruled, and stands as the authority of this appellate court, to the effect that "an ex parte vacation order made by a judge of the circuit court is nonappealable." And for the very good reason that provision is made in sections 5, 6, c. 134, Code 1899, for the correction of all such errors by the court committing them. Said section 6 provides that no appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas shall be allowed or entertained by the appellate court from any such order or decree until such motion has been made and overruled, in whole or in part, by the trial court. The order of May 16th was entered in open court when the case was heard upon the question of alimony and an allowance for costs and attorney's fees, etc. This question of allowance is addressed to the sound discretion of the court or judge in vacation, he having full authority to make such allowances under section 9, c. 64, Code 1899, and it is only a question of the abuse of such discretion that the appellate court can deal with. In Wass v. Wass, 42 W. Va. 460, 28 S. E. 440, it is held that the amount of alimony pendente lite allowed the wife in a divorce case is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case, and the condition of the parties must also be taken into consideration; and in Miller v. Miller, 92 Va. 196, 23 S. E. 232, it is held: "The amount of alimony to be decreed is within the sound discretion of the trial court, to be fixed according to the established principles, and upon an equitable view of all the circumstances of the particular case." In Hogg's Eq. Pr. p. 582, it is said: "The circuit court is clothed with the exclusive right to award alimony pendente lite, and the exercise of this discretion, which is a very broad one, will not be reviewed unless it is made to appear that it has been grossly abused." Gussman v. Gussman, 140 Ind. 433, 39 N. E. 918; Sellers v. Sellers, 141 Ind. 307, 40 N. E. 699. Appellant complains that the order granting the alimony and allowance was made when the case was submitted to the court for hearing. The pleadings and evidence taken in the case are very voluminous, there being nearly 460 pages in the record. To give the cause the consideration due to it was quite an undertaking for the court, while a cursory examination would satisfy the court that the plaintiff was entitled to relief, whether all she claimed or not. The pleadings and the evidence showed the financial condition of the parties and their condition in life, so that the court had little trouble in arriving at what was a reasonable allowance and alimony. In Bailey v. Bailey, 21 Grat. 43, it is said: "The general rule is that the wife is entitled to the support corresponding to her condition in life and the fortune of her husband; and when delinquency of the husband has been established, and the wife is the injured party, driven by his cruelty or other wrongful conduct from the comfort of domestic enjoyment, she should be liberally supported." There seems to have been no abuse of the sound discretion of the court in making the allowance for alimony, as well as for fees and expenses of the prosecution of the plaintiff's suit; the record fully sustaining the action of the court in that particular. As to the appointing of a receiver of the personal property under the order of July 15, 1902, after due notice to the defendant, the judge of the circuit court in vacation had full power, under section 28, c. 133, Code 1899, to appoint such receiver, in case the circumstances of the case warranted such action, if there was a necessity for it, such as "danger of the loss or misappropriation of the same or a material part thereof." Section 6823, 5 Thompson on Corporations, says: "Unless there is a statute giving the right to a receiver in a given state of facts, no one can demand the appointment of a receiver therein ex debito justitiæ; but the question whether or not a receiver will be appointed in a given case is addressed to the sound discretion of the chancellor, under all the circumstances. The discretionary power possessed by courts of equity of appointing receivers, or refusing applications for such appointment, will not be interfered with on appeal, except in cases where the discretion has been manifestly abused; this being the general rule as to the appellate review of discretionary action." Let us consider a little the facts in the case, and see if they are such as to warrant the application by the court of this drastic remedy. This is a suit for divorce, and, according to the allegations of plaintiff's bill, defendant was possessed of a large estate, worth at least $80,000, a large part of which consisted of real estate. This was, at the instance of plaintiff, tied up by injunction, to await the action of the court, so that defendant could not dispose of it; and it was liable to any final decree that might be awarded in favor of plaintiff. Defendant had responded to the order of the court requiring him to pay $500 for costs and expenses of carrying on plaintiff's suit, and for the payment of the $60 per month for plaintiff's temporary support. Was there any reason for the court taking possession by its receiver of the large personal estate of the defendant, thus depriving him of the use of the whole of his estate? This was a clear abuse of the judicial discretion, and so much of the decree or order of July 15, 1902, as appointed the Trust Company of West Virginia receiver of the personal property of the defendant should be set aside and held for naught.

It is further insisted by counsel for appellant that it was error to appoint the Trust Company of West Virginia as special receiver of the personal estate of defendant in the order of the 15th of July, 1902, without requiring bond for the faithful performance of the duties of receiver. Section 5, c. 85, p. 187, of the Acts of 1901, relating to the incorporation and regulation of title and trust companies, provides that whenever such company shall become trustee, assignee, receiver, guardian, etc., the capital of such company, together with such other assets as are named therein, "shall be taken and considered as the security required by law for the faithful performance of such duties."

For the reasons herein stated, so much of the order of February 10, 1902, as ordered the payment of $500 by defendant to plaintiff for temporary maintenance, and appointing Kent B. Crawford receiver of the diamond ring of defendant, is set aside and held for naught, as is also so much of the order of February 22, 1902, as places plaintiff in the possession and custody of the residence and the property therein of defendant. Such order, while in itself not appealable, because it was such error as could have been corrected on motion by the circuit court, and the cause being properly here by appeal from the decree of July 15, 1902, appointing the Trust Company of West Virginia special receiver, and said order being complained of in said particular, this court will make such order as the circuit court should have rendered, and will set aside such part of said order of February 22, 1902; and so much of the order of July 15, 1902, as appointed the trust company special receiver is reversed and annulled, and the cause is remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein.

MILLER v. FIREMAN'S INS. CO. OF BALTIMORE.

INSURANCE—CANCELLATION OF POLICY—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

1. A fire insurance policy gives right to the company to cancel it on five days' notice. The company instructs its local agent to take up the policy for cancellation, and the agent informs the assured that the company elected to cancel the policy, and stated to him that he would procure him a policy in another company for which he was agent. The assured, with this understanding, delivered up the policy to the agent for cancellation, and the agent delivered it to the company, and it was canceled by it. Held, that the policy was thereby canceled.

2. An insurance agent directed by his company to take up for cancellation a policy of insurance has no power to take it up with a condition that he would get for the assured a policy in another company, and the surrender of the policy to such agent for such cancellation on such condition is an absolute cancellation.

Dent, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Summers County; J. M. McWhorter, Judge.

Action by James H. Miller against the Fireman's Insurance Company of Baltimore. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Peyton & Perkinson and Northcott, Perry & McComas, for plaintiff in error. Miller & Read, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. J. B. Lavender, agent of the Fireman's Insurance Company of Baltimore at the town of Hinton, issued to James H. Miller its insurance policy for the sum of $1,000, insuring said Miller against loss by fire on certain books and office furniture in his law office, in said town of Hinton, for the period of three years, for which the premium was fully paid to said Lavender. On December 19, 1900, J. B. Lavender went to James H. Miller, and told him that the Fireman's Insurance Company was going out of business in West Virginia, and wanted him to procure a return of said policy for cancellation, and told Miller that, if he wished, he would give him another policy in another company as good without additional cost. And Miller in his testimony says that, "with this understanding, I gave him the policy." Thereupon said policy was delivered by said J. B. Lavender to U. O. Michaels, special agent of said insurance company, who was in town for the purpose of taking up and canceling policies, which fact was told Miller; and said policy was thereupon canceled and destroyed by said company, and said Lavender given credit for the proper amount of return premium. Afterwards, on the 3d day of September, 1901, the property which had been embraced in said policy was destroyed by fire; and then Miller enquired of said Lavender if he had ever issued him any new insurance upon said property, and, finding that he had not, set about to make proofs of loss under the destroyed policy in defendant company, and on the 9th day of November, 1902, instituted action in the circuit court of Summers county, wherein a judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, Miller, for the sum of $925, from which this writ of error is prosecuted.

There is but one contention of importance in the case, and that is as to whether or not the policy sued upon had, prior to the loss complained of, been canceled. It is contended by the defendant that the surrender of the policy to Lavender amounted to an agreement to surrender the policy for cancellation, and constituted a waiver on the part of the insured to have the notice given him which was provided in the policy, and the payment to him of the return premium as provided for therein. On the other hand, it is contended by plaintiff that the circumstances under which said policy was returned through Lavender to the company for cancellation, amounted to nothing more than a conditional surrender, and that the condition upon which the surrender was made was not complied with prior to the time of the loss. Lavender was agent for several companies. Miller's statement in evidence is: "One evening Mr. Lavender came into the office, and told me that the company was going to quit business here; that their special agent, Mr. Michaels, was in town, and wanted to take up my policy. He said, if I wished, he would give me another policy in another company as good, without any additional cost. With this understanding, I gave him the policy."

The policy gave the company right to cancel on notice. Miller waived notice, assented to cancellation, asked no notice, and gave up the policy with final intent, because he knew that the local agent received it for the very purpose of delivering it as a surrendered policy to the general agent then in the town to take up policies. It could be canceled by consent without notice. See Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 105 Fed. 286, 44 C. C. A. 477. To show further that Miller considered it a cancellation, he lay nine months without mention of any condition as annexed to the cancellation to the company, so that it might take steps to protect itself, and never inquired of the agent for a policy in another company. Strange that he should thus be silent so long, if he had made only a conditional surrender! "Acts speak louder than words." Miller claims that he surrendered the policy with the condition that Lavender should procure him a policy in another company, but he knew that, while Lavender had authority to cancel, he had no color of authority to make a conditional cancellation—one leaving the company still liable. He had either to surrender or not surrender the policy. He could not make a surrender upon such condition. As he surrendered, it was a surrender freed of condition. Dealing with an agent, he was bound to know his limited authority. Otherwise who would be safe from an agent's unauthorized act? In making such a condition (it was not such) the agent would be acting to the harm of the principal. Apply here the rule in Rohrbough v. Express Co., 50 W. Va. 149, 40 S. E. 398, (4), 88 Am. St. Rep. 849, and we find that he could not do so, and that Miller was bound to know this: "The powers of an agent must be exercised for the benefit of his principal only, and when he acts otherwise, with the knowledge and participation of the person relying upon his unauthorized act, his principal is not bound." What benefit did the company get from this condition? It was to its harm, because it kept the company still bound. The sufficient answer to this theory of conditional surrender is that the parties could not make such a condition. That condition would be a contract which the agent had no right to make. But if the parties could make such condition, they did not do so. It was no condition, but an independent agreement between Miller and Lavender, unknown to the company, with which it had nothing to do. The cancellation was one thing between certain parties. The procuring of new insurance was another thing between other parties. Miller surrendered the policy, and appointed Lavender his own agent to get another policy, leaving part of the premium in his hands to pay for another policy; otherwise he would have demanded it. In Hillock v. Traders' Co., 54 Mich. 531, 20 N. W. 571, a general agent went to the place where a policy had been placed, and sent the local agent to the insured party to cancel the policy; and this agent went to the insured party and informed him that the company had ordered him to cancel the policy, and said, "Will see if I can put it in some other company for a year," and the insured said, "All right. Be sure you put it in good companies." No premium was returned; nothing said about it. The policy was not actually surrendered. Judge Cooley delivered a labored opinion, and said: "The dealings of these parties had come to an end when Brown had responded to the notice of cancellation that it was all right, and directed the agent to procure new insurance. This company was not concerned with what should take place between Brown and Estee afterwards. Brown was looking to Estee for new insurance, and would be entitled to a return of the premium on failure to obtain it; and Estee would be expected to bring the amount into their own settlement, as they saw fit." The syllabus says: "The actual tender of unearned premium is unnecessary to the cancellation of an insurance policy, if the minds have met on the point that the policy is to be canceled; and, if the insured directs the insurance agent to procure other insurance, it is presumable that he means him to use for the purpose the money that he would have to return, and the direction would be a waiver of such tender." It was held that formal surrender of the policy was not necessary. Here there was a formal surrender. Miller made no actual condition. His words did not so import. Why did he not retain the policy until a new policy should be delivered, if he made it a condition? In the case of Hopkins v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 78 Iowa, 344, 43 N. W. 197, after reciting the following facts: "A policy provided that it might be terminated at any time on notice to the insured, and refunding or tendering a ratable proportion of the premium for the unexpired term. The evidence showed that the company's local agent, acting under instructions, notified the insured that the policy was canceled; that assured carried the policy to their office to surrender it, but defendant's agents did not call for it; it was not delivered; and that assured began negotiations for other insurance." Held, that those facts were sufficient to justify a finding that the policy had been canceled; and held, further, that "the assured, having acquiesced in the cancellation, though no payment of the premium or tender of the premium was made, is estopped to set up the nonpayment." "A policy which in terms provides that it may be terminated at any time at the option of the company is avoided from the time when the insured has notice that the local agent has received instructions that it would be no longer liable.

In such case direction to the agent to cancel the policy is, when communicated to the insured, as effectual to terminate the risk as would be the most express notice that the policy had been terminated." Springfield Co. v. McKinnon & Call, 59 Tex. 507. The moment Miller knew that the company elected to cancel, and he surrendered the policy, that moment liability ceased. No condition could be made. Miller made this law more emphatic still by giving up the policy. The case of Holden v. Putman, 46 N. Y. 1, 7 Am. Rep. 287, does not apply. It holds: "One party to a contract is not estopped from enforcing it by the execution of an instrument purporting to cancel the contract for a consideration, where none in fact is received by him, and the act is induced by false representation of the agent of the other party." The agent got the cancellation by falsely stating that he had already obtained other insurance. No cancellation existed, because of this downright fraud. It was an instrument procured by fraud, and had no legal effect.

Estoppel. Can Miller allow the company to rest in confidence for nine months, the policy all the time in its possession, having allowed the agent money to return the premium, and then for the first time after the fire set up a claim?

It was error to allow Miller to say he dealt with Lavender as defendant's agent as to the new insurance, giving his mere opinion of his own action.

Under these principles, instruction 1 (that the acts of an insurance agent within the scope of his authority bind the company), while good in the abstract, had no relevancy to the case, and was misleading to the jury. The authority of the agent was not at all in question, except as to making the so-called condition (there was none), and there was no evidence at all tending to show authority for that.

The plaintiff's instruction 2 is bad because it tells the jury that the policy could not be canceled without mutual consent, unless the right be reserved in it to cancel, and, if reserved, could only be done according to its terms, which must be strictly complied with, unless waived, and, if waived on a condition, that condition must be complied with. There is a power of cancellation in the policy. The instruction misleads by saying the terms of cancellation must be complied with, intending to rely on want of notice, when the evidence clearly showed waiver and consent cancellation; and it introduced the so-called condition into the case, as it could refer to no other condition than that, when in fact there was no condition, and, if there had been one between Miller and Lavender, it would not bind the company. The instruction did not fit the case as presented by the evidence, in law or fact, and was misleading. No. 3 is bad for substantially similar reasons. It also said there must be return of the premium, when the evidence showed that Miller left it in the hands of Lavender to buy insurance in another company. It was an arrangement between them. No. 4 is bad for similar reasons. It was also misleading. The evidence did not warrant it. I think these instructions contain elements inconsistent with defendant's instruction given.

The court refused defendant its instruction 1, to the effect that if Lavender applied to Miller to deliver him the policy, telling Miller that he had been instructed by the company to take up the policy, and that Lavender was agent for other companies, and Miller knew he was, and Lavender said he would write Miller insurance, in place of this policy, in another company, and Miller delivered to Lavender the policy in suit, then the delivery of the policy to be taken up by the company, and the delivery of the policy under such circumstances, was a waiver of the clause providing for five days' notice of surrender, and payment of return premium. Under principles above stated, this instruction should have been given.

Defendant's No. 2 was refused. It should have been given. It says that if Lavender, for the company, asked surrender of the policy for cancellation, and Lavender was agent for other companies, and Miller knew it, and he promised Miller to write other insurance without additional cost, then the surrender of the policy under such circumstances amounted, in law, to a waiver of five days' notice of cancellation, and the promise of Lavender to get other insurance could not make him agent of the defendant, but the agent of another company, and his promise would not bind the defendant.

The court refused defendant's instruction 4, to the effect that if the agent Michaels directed Lavender to cancel the policy, and Lavender applied to Miller for the surrender of the policy for cancellation, and Lavender was agent for other companies, and Miller knew this, and Lavender stated that he would write Miller insurance, in lieu of the policy in suit, in another company represented by him, without further cost, and then Miller surrendered the policy, and relied on Lavender to write him insurance in another company, and made no further inquiry of Lavender as to whether such other policy had been issued, and demanded no such policy prior to the fire, and after the fire did inquire of Lavender whether he had issued such new policy, and searched himself for such a policy, but found none, then Miller was estopped to deny that he surrendered the policy in suit, and the same was canceled before the fire. This instruction ought to have been given. Is it possible that Miller could, when told by the company that it desired the surrender of the policy for the very purpose of cancellation, waive notice, by not demanding it, surrender the policy, agree to look for insurance through his agent chosen to secure such new insurance, knowing that the company had possession of the policy and regarded it as surrendered for cancellation, and negligently rest for months without a hint of dissatisfaction to the company, and thus lull it into a feeling of security, and after the fire, for the first time, seek to put the loss upon the company? Would not this action and negligence on his part estop him from doing so? Why did he not let the company know that he deemed the policy still in force, and thus enable it to give notice of cancellation? The strong fact to show that Miller himself regarded the policy as canceled is that after the fire he went to Lavender to inquire about a policy in another company, and looked for one among his papers. Miller comes squarely out as a witness, and says he thought he had a policy until, after the fire, he looked in his safe, and could not find it. This shows he did not look to the defendant's policy. He says he forgot to attend to it. Is the defendant to compensate him for forgetfulness and negligence, when it has done nothing wrong? If he regarded the defendant company as bound to find new insurance in another company under the alleged conditional cancellation of the policy, why did he not demand the new policy in so long a time? It affords ground to say that he did not look to the defendant to find new insurance.

Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and new trial granted.

DENT, J. (dissenting). In Judge BRAN-NON'S opinion, he relies almost wholly on the claim that the defendant's agent had become the plaintiff's agent to secure him other insurance. He rejects plaintiff's evidence entirely on this question, and attempts to infer such agency from the declarations of the plaintiff's agent, whose testimony on the point is as follows: "I stepped into Mr. Miller's office and asked him for the policy; told him that the company had requested me to take it up; told him I would give him another policy, or write him in another company as good, and it would not cost him any more." He made the promise of a new policy before he received the old one, the plain object being to prevent the return of the premium. He neither returned the premium, nor requested the plaintiff to sign the cancellation form on the back thereof. He was acting as agent for the defendant. He induced the surrender of the policy, without repayment of the premium or cancellation, on the false promise of a new policy. Where does the plaintiff's agency come in? Does the deception practiced by the defendant's agent with its presumed knowledge transfer such agent from the defendant to the plaintiff, and at the same time authorize the defendant to keep the premium, contrary to the stipulations of its policy? The insurance defendant is undoubtedly bound by the misrepresentations of its agent, made to secure the policy without compliance with the terms thereof or the return of the premium. To hold otherwise is to relieve insurance companies from the ordinary rules governing principal and agent. The principal is bound by the false representations of the agent, though he neither authorized them nor was informed of them. Crump v. U. S. Mining Co., 7 Grat. 352, 56 Am. Dec. 116; Honaker v. Board of Education, 42 W. Va. 170, 24 S. E. 544, 32 L. R. A. 413, 57 Am. St. Rep. 847; Curry v. Hale, 15 W. Va. 867; Sheppard v. Peabody Ins. Co., 21 W. Va. 368; Mechem on Agency, § 739; Hern v. Nichols, 1 Salk. 289; Fitzherbert v. Mather, 1 T. R. 12; Locke v. Stearns, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 560, 35 Am. Dec. 382; Bank v. Kimberlands, 16 W. Va. 555.

Because defendant's agent did induce plaintiff to turn over the policy to him, without refunding the premium, by falsely promising to furnish him another in lieu thereof, there is no reason why he should be treated as plaintiff's agent. To accomplish this, not only must the agent's evidence be strained, but plaintiff's evidence must be rejected altogether. Plaintiff has a right to deny such agency, and also to testify against the same. There is nothing to work an estoppel against him. He has the right to say how he dealt with the defendant's agent, and to deny that he gave any commission to him to act in his behalf, and also to say what induced him to surrender the policy contrary to its terms. He has the right to give his understanding of the transaction, and, if he is contradicted, it is for the jury to say whether they believe him or not. The court has no just right to reject his testimony, and then infer, from circumstances that do not justify it, that plaintiff adopted the defendant's agent as his agent. The fact that the defendant is an insurance company does not justify a departure from the ordinary rule governing similar cases. On the question of the necessity of the return of the premium, the rule is stated to be that, as a condition precedent to the cancellation of the policy, in addition to giving the necessary notice, the insurer must return or tender the unearned premium. But where the policy does not require the prepayment of the unearned premium, it is but an incident not affecting the main object, and therefore it is not prerequisite. 16 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 875; Southern Ins. Co. v. Williams, 62 Ark. 382, 35 S. W. 1101; Manlove v. Ins. Co., 47 Kan. 309, 27 Pac. 979. In the latter case it was held that "the acts of the insurance company in deciding to close up its business, and notifying the plaintiffs that the company would not be liable on its policies issued to them, without returning to the plaintiffs the unearned cash premium paid by them to secure said policies, did not operate as a cancellation of said policies." The policy in controversy provides that "if this policy be cancelled as hereinbefore provided * * * the premium having been actually paid, the unearned portion shall be returned on surrender of this policy"; thus making the return of the unearned portion of the premium a condition precedent to the surrender of the policy. The plaintiff was induced to waive this obligation of the policy on the representation of the defendant's agent that he would furnish another policy without additional expense. The defendant undoubtedly had complete notice of this representation, for it retained the premium and received the policy without requiring plaintiff to sign the cancellation receipt blank on the back thereof. In short, it was a party to the false promises of its agent that induced the surrender of the policy without repayment of the unearned premium, and received and enjoyed the benefits of such false promises. It is said, however, that plaintiff was guilty of laches in not calling attention to the matter until after his property was destroyed by fire. Plaintiff rested under the assurance of defendant's agent that a new policy would be given him in lieu of the old one, and until such promise was fulfilled he had the right to feel safe under the old policy. It was for the defendant to look after and make good the promise of its agent, or to notify the plaintiff of the dissolution of such agency. If it had compelled the agent to make good the unearned premium, or required him to procure a release thereof from the plaintiff, he would have been forewarned, so as to have been able to secure other insurance. But the defendant trusted its agent, and plaintiff was led to trust him because defendant retained his premium. He believed he was insured, because he had paid for it, and his money was never returned. Judge BRANNON'S position is that the agent was the defendant's for the purpose of securing the policy and retaining the premium, but plaintiff's agent when he neglected to carry out the promises that secured the policy and the retention of the premium. When he tells the truth, he is the defendant's agent; when he makes false promises for defendant's benefit, he is the plaintiff's. This is wholesome argument for the defendant, who gets the premium without being responsible for the insurance; but it is bad for the plaintiff, who pays for the insurance, but gets it not. The defendant received and retained the premium for insuring plaintiff's property, and it should be held liable for the loss, unless it can show that the policy was unconditionally surrendered by the plaintiff for cancellation. Holden v. Ins. Co., 46 N. Y. 1, 7 Am. Rep. 238; 16 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 870. This it has failed to do.

STATE ex rel. MORLEY v. GODFREY, Mayor.

STATE ex rel. ATKINSON v. SAME
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 14, 1903.)

GAMING — MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — ORDINANCES — STATUTORY REGULATION.

1. Chapter 151 of the Code of 1899 fully covers and includes gaming and gaming devices, so far as the Legislature deemed it expedient to legislate upon the subject. It specifically defines what shall be offenses thereunder, and fixes fines and penalties for violations thereof.

2. Unless the charter of a city, town, or village confers upon it authority so to do, the council thereof has no right or power to pass an ordinance to regulate or prohibit gaming or gaming devices, or to prescribe and enforce penalties for a violation of such ordinance.

3. Held, that the ordinance passed by the council of the town of Bramwell on the 6th day of July, 1903, is unauthorized and void.

Brannon, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Applications by the state, on the relation of J. E. Morley, and on the relation of E. W. Atkinson, for writs of prohibition to A. I. Godfrey, mayor of the town of Bramwell. Writs granted.

H. A. Ritz and J. M. McGrath, for petitioners. J. F. Engle and F. W. Brown, for respondent.

MILLER, J. The town of Bramwell, in the county of Mercer, is a municipal corporation, chartered as such by the circuit court of that county, under the provisions of chapter 47 of the Code of West Virginia of 1899, and has no other charter. The respondent, A. I. Godfrey, is the mayor thereof, duly elected, qualified, and acting as such. On the 16th day of July, 1903, the council of said town made and passed an ordinance, with a preamble, in the words and figures following:

"Whereas, certain persons have, within the corporate limits of the town of Bramwell, openly engaged in gambling by operating a money-making device, known as 'Slot Machine,' to the manifest corrupting of the morals of the citizens of the said town: Now, therefore:

"Section 1. Be it ordained by the council of the town of Bramwell, that any person or persons, who shall keep or exhibit any gaming table, faro bank or keno table, or any slot machine or any table or machine of like kind, under any denomination, whether the game be played with cards, dice or otherwise, or shall be concerned in interest in keeping or exhibiting such table, bank or machine, shall be fined not less than $100.00.

"Sec. 2. A second conviction for the offense named in the first section of this ordinance shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100.00 and imprisonment in the town jail not exceeding 30 days.

"Sec. 3. Any person who shall play upon any table or machine mentioned in the first section of this ordinance and thereby either wins or loses any sum of money shall be fined not less than $10.00."

It further appears from the record that, at the time and since the passage of said ordinance, petitioner Morley was the proprietor of a hotel in Bramwell; that there was in the waiting room or lobby of that hotel a slot machine, upon which people were allowed to play; that said machine did not belong to Morley, but to petitioner Atkinson; and that Morley had permitted Atkinson to place the same in the hotel. On the 9th day of July, 1903, a warrant was issued by said A. I. Godfrey, as mayor of said town of Bramwell, against petitioner J. E. Morley upon the charge of keeping and exhibiting the said slot machine in violation of the provisions of said ordinance, and also a warrant against petitioner E. W. Atkinson upon the charge of playing upon said machine. Petitioners were arrested upon the warrants issued against them, respectively, as aforesaid, and taken before Godfrey, as mayor, and each required to enter into a recognizance to appear before said mayor at a time fixed to answer the aforesaid charges. Petitioners then presented their respective petitions to Hon. Joseph M. Sanders, judge of the circuit court of Mercer county, praying that writs of prohibition might issue to prohibit the said A. I. Godfrey, mayor as aforesaid, from trying petitioners upon said warrants for the alleged offenses therein charged. The writs prayed for were denied by said circuit judge, but upon presentation of similar petitions to a judge of this court a rule was awarded upon each petition against Godfrey, as mayor of the town of Bramwell, requiring him to show cause, if any he can, why writs of prohibition shall not issue against him as prayed for. The same question being involved in both cases, they are considered and disposed of together.

Petitioners allege that said ordinance is invalid; that the council of the town of Bramwell had and has no authority to pass such ordinance; that the warrants issued by said mayor as aforesaid thereunder were and are without legal authority, and are therefore void. They further contend that the subject of gambling and gambling devices is fully covered by state law, and that, the Legislature not having granted power to such municipal corporations to regulate it, the town is without authority to do so. Respondent, Godfrey, moves the court to quash the rule, and urges, in support of his motion, that the ordinance in question is authorized by a clause of section 28 of chapter 47 of the Code of 1899, by which it is required of the council of a city, town, or village to protect the persons and property of the citizens of such city, town, or village, and to preserve peace and good order therein. The cases of Moundsville v. Fountain, 27 W. Va. 182, Jelly v. Dils, 27 W. Va. 267, and Judy v. Lashley, 50 W. Va. 628, 41 S. E. 197, 57 L. R. A. 413, are cited by him.

In the two cases first mentioned, the question of the right of the towns of Moundsville and Parkersburg to require license under their respective charters from persons to sell spirituous liquors therein, and to punish offenders for unlawful sales, was determined in favor of the cities. In referring to those cases, Judge Poffenberger, in Judy v. Lashley, 50 W. Va. 628, 634, 41 S. E. 197, 200, 57 L. R. A. 413, says: "This position must not be confounded with the position announced in Moundsville v. Fountain, 27 W. Va. 182, and Jelly v. Dils, 27 W. Va. 267, holding that municipal corporations may punish for unlawful retailing of spirituous liquors, etc. The statute expressly gives power to such corporations to impose license taxes upon the privilege of making such sales, from which it results that the council must have power to enforce its regulations. That is a very different matter from the case under consideration." Those cases do not apply to the cases now before us.

Chapter 151 of the Code of 1899 devotes 12 sections to the offenses of gaming, lotteries, and lottery tickets. It defines the several prohibited acts, and fixes the respective fines and punishments for violations thereof. This chapter seems to legislate upon and fully cover the whole subject mentioned in its title. The Legislature having thus legislated, has the town of Bramwell power to make and pass the ordinance in question? Points 1 and 2 of the syllabus in Judy v. Lashley, supra, hold:

"The police power of a municipal corporation depends upon the will of the Legislature, and a city, town, or village can only exercise such police power as is fairly included in the grant of powers by its charter.

"Section 28 of chapter 47 of the Code [of 1899], by vesting in the councils of municipal corporations power and duty 'to protect the persons and property of the citizens of such city, town, or village, and to preserve peace and good order therein,' does not confer power to punish acts made criminal by the state law and fully covered thereby, except such as would be attended with circumstances of aggravation not included in the state law. Such power must be specifically and expressly given by the Legislature before it can be exercised by such corporation."

Said section 28 enumerates certain powers conferred upon the council. Section 29 further provides that, "to carry into effect these enumerated powers, and all others conferred upon such city, town or village, or its council, by this chapter or by any further act of the Legislature of this state, the council shall have power to make and pass all needful orders, by-laws, ordinances, resolutions, rules and regulations, not contrary to the Constitution and laws of this state; and to prescribe, impose and enact reasonable fines, penalties and imprisonments in the county jail or the place of imprisonment in said corporation, if there be one, for a term not exceeding thirty days, for a violation thereof. Such fines, penalties and imprisonments shall be recovered, and enforced under the judgment of the mayor of such city, town or village, or the person lawfully exercising his functions." There is no specific authority conferred by our statute upon cities, towns, or villages to regulate gaming or gaming devices.

In Gas Co. v. Parkersburg, 30 W. Va. 439, 4 S. E. 652, this court said: "It is a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others: First, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily and fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation, not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied. Of every municipal corporation the charter or statute by which it is created is its organic act. Neither the corporation nor its officers can do any act, or make any contract, or incur any liability, not authorized thereby. All acts beyond the scope of the powers granted are void. Much less can any power be exercised, or any act done, which is forbidden by charter or statute. These principles are of transcendent importance, and lie at the foundation of the law of municipal corporations. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 89 (55)."

In 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1140, the rule is thus stated: "The rule is general that the powers of a municipal corporation are to be strictly construed, and, if there is a reasonable doubt of the existence of a particular power, the doubt is to be resolved in the negative."

It is not necessary, for the determination of these cases, to decide whether or not the slot machine is included within the meaning of the sections of chapter 151 above stated. The ordinance under consideration places it in the same class as the gambling devices enumerated in section 1 of that chapter, and prescribes penalties for the violation of said ordinance. This the council, either by the express terms of the statute or by fair implication, had no legal authority to do.

For the reasons stated, the ordinance aforesaid was and is void and of no legal effect. The motion to quash said rule is therefore overruled, and the writ in each case is awarded as prayed for.

POFFENBARGER, J. (concurring). It has been suggested that the writ of prohibition does not lie in this case, although the ordinance under which the respondent is proceeding is absolutely void. The argument in support of this position is that the mayor, sitting as a judge, has the power to decide the question of the validity of the ordinance, incidentally, in determining the question of the guilt or innocence of the petitioner, and that, having power to begin the consideration of that question, he has jurisdiction within the meaning of the statute. Some decisions are contrary to that position. The first case that seems to be in conflict with it is that of McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134, in which a judge of a circuit court was restrained by the writ of prohibition from proceeding to condemn, upon the application of a railroad company, land for railway purposes within 20 feet of dwelling houses situated on a tract of land through which the railroad company was seeking to acquire a right of way. The statute in force at that time prohibited the taking of land within 20 feet of a dwelling house for railroad purposes, but whether it was in force or had been repealed was a controverted question in the case, upon which the court had to pass. It erroneously decided that the statute had been repealed. Upon the application for the writ of prohibition, this court held that the statute had not been repealed, and that, although the circuit court had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, it had exceeded its legitimate powers in awarding the condemnation of dwelling houses. In delivering the opinion, Judge Snyder, admitting that there was jurisdiction of the cause, said: "There are no circumstances under which such houses and land can be invaded. The question of the right to condemn such houses and land arose incidentally or collaterally during the proceedings, and the court, having no jurisdiction or power to condemn or invade the same, clearly exceeded its legitimate powers in appointing commissioners to invade such property. The action of the court in this matter was not an erroneous exercise of conceded jurisdiction, as was the case in the particulars hereinbefore considered, but was entirely without authority or jurisdiction." This clearly means that, in giving the property in question immunity from condemnation, and conferring upon it a status and character which rendered it secure from invasion or molestation by railway companies seeking rights of way, the Legislature had incidentally and indirectly imposed a limitation upon the judicial power of the state in respect to condemnation of lands for purposes of public use. In doing that, the Legislature had said in effect that no court should have power to condemn it. In deciding this case, the court does not seem to have regarded it as of the slightest consequence that the circuit court was called to determine whether or not the statute had been repealed. Nothing is said on that subject, as bearing upon the jurisdiction of the court. This decision proceeds upon the theory, apparently, that the circuit court was bound to know the limits of its authority. This court simply ascertained that the statute was in force, and that it did inhibit the act in question, and thereupon awarded the writ of prohibition.

A similar case is that of Wilkinson v. Hoke, 39 W. Va. 403, 19 S. E. 520, in which a writ of prohibition was awarded against a judge of a circuit court, prohibiting the enforcement of a judgment for costs in a case in which a statute declared that no judgment for costs should be rendered. It was a judgment in violation of a plain, positive statute; but it might be said that, as the court was called upon to decide whether costs should be awarded, it must consider the case before it in the light of the statute, apply the statute to it, and determine judicially whether the cause was such a one as was contemplated by the statute, and therefore, having the right to consider that question, it had jurisdiction. But this objection seems not to have been made.

Another case of the same general nature is that of Railway Co. v. Pinnacle Coal Co., 44 W. Va. 574, 30 S. E. 196, 41 L. R. A. 414, in which a writ of prohibition was awarded against a justice of the peace, restraining him from the enforcement of a judgment for freight paid to the railroad company in excess of the rates allowed by a supposed statute. The justice had erroneously decided that this statute was in force; but it had been repealed, as this court held upon the application for the prohibition. The writ was awarded upon the theory that there had never been before the justice any cause of action, or any matter for which he could possibly have rendered a judgment. As there was no statute limiting the rates to be charged by railway companies, and the cause of action set up by the plaintiff had no existence unless the statute was in force, the court could render no judgment without awarding something which the law did not give. That which was laid before the justice for his action did not amount to a cause of action, and, in taking cognizance of it, he transcended his powers, or assumed to have jurisdiction over that which could not constitute the subject-matter of jurisdiction for any court.

Another similar case is that of City of Charleston v. Beller, 45 W. Va. 44, 30 S. E. 152, in which a judgment for costs rendered against the city of Charleston in a criminal case, in violation of the statute, was prohibited by this court. Here, as in the case last above mentioned, the circuit court had nothing before it that could constitute a cause of action; for neither the common law nor any statute authorized costs against the city. It was also similar to the case of Wilkinson v. Hoke, because it was a judgment which the law prohibited.

Judy v. Lashley, 50 W. Va. 628, 41 S. E. 197, 57 L. R. A. 413, in which a writ of prohibition was awarded against the mayor of a town, proceeding under a void ordinance to enforce a judgment for a fine, is a cause almost like the one under consideration now. The only difference is that the application for the writ in Judy v. Lashley was not made until after judgment, while in this case it came before judgment. In that case, the question now under consideration was not raised. All the argument related to the validity of the ordinance, and it was not suggested that, although the ordinance was void, a proper case for prohibition had not been made.

These decisions hold that an inferior court cannot uphold its jurisdiction upon the ground that it has a right to consider, and is bound to consider, the law determining its jurisdiction. It will be observed that the law which set limits upon the jurisdiction in all these cases related to the matters with respect to which the court was called upon to act, and only incidentally restricted the power of the court, and did not relate directly to jurisdiction.

The case of Buskirk v. Judge, 7 W. Va. 91, may possibly be in conflict with them. A prohibition was applied for to restrain the judge of a circuit court from trying a man upon an indictment for murder, upon the ground that, at the date of the application, there was a statute in force which required that, in all cases of felony, the respondent should have a preliminary examination before the county court before he could be put on trial in the circuit court, unless such right were waived, and that he had not waived it, but had demanded it, and it had been refused. This court refused the writ, holding that the circuit court had jurisdiction to say whether the defendant was entitled to a preliminary examination, and that if, in passing upon that question, it erred in denying the right claimed, and put him upon his trial without such examination, the act of the court would not be in excess of its powers, nor beyond its jurisdiction, but simply an error, which would be corrected by the appellate court on a writ of error. Haymond, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said the writ was directed to the judge and parties to a suit in an inferior court, commanding them to cease from the prosecution thereof, upon the suggestion either that the case originally, or some collateral matter arising therein, did not belong to that jurisdiction, and that beyond these two grounds it seemed that the court would not interfere. Proceeding, he said: "When the matter is within the general jurisdiction of the court below, and in the conduct of the trial they have not exceeded their authority, the court above will not, on an application for a writ of prohibition, inquire whether they have decided right or not."

Which of these two propositions most nearly conforms to the principles of the common law relating to the subject of prohibition? If it appears that by the common law the scope of the writ of prohibition is broader than that given to it in Buskirk v. Judge, the result will tend to show that the proposition announced in the other cases is the true rule.

The rule of the common law was announced in Mendyke v. Stint, 2 Mod. 272, as follows: "First, that if any matter appears in the declaration which sheweth that the cause of action did not arise infra jurisdictionem, there a prohibition may be granted at any time; secondly, if the subject-matter in the declaration be not proper for the judgment and determination of such court, there also a prohibition may be granted at any time; thirdly, if the defendant, who intended to plead to the jurisdiction, is prevented by any artifice, as by giving a short day, or by the attorney's refusing to plead it, etc., or if his plea be not accepted or is overruled, in all these cases a prohibition likewise will lie at any time." This proposition is also laid down in 8 Bacon, Abr. 232. The second one of the propositions above laid down may cover the question here under consideration, but the cases illustrating its application were generally those in which it appeared that the inferior court had not jurisdiction of the subject-matter, because the subject-matter belonged to the jurisdiction of some other court. Thus, in Curling v. Long, Com. 261, a prohibition went from the King's Bench to the Chancery Court of Cinque Ports at Sandwich, inhibiting the trial by that court of a right by custom to charge four pence per pound for all freight taken from the pier of Ramsgate. The bill set up this right, predicated the cause of action upon it, and prayed a discovery. Holt, C. J., said the writ might go as to so much of the bill as pertained to the establishment of the right, saying: "You must not try that there." The court was permitted to proceed as to so much of the bill as related to the discovery. In Rowland v. Hockenulle, Ld. Ryd. 698, the Court of Exchequer of Chester, a chancery court, was prohibited from proceeding to try a question of freehold. In Delyve v. Proudfoot, 1 Show. 396, a prohibition was granted against the commissioners of policies of insurance, whose jurisdiction extended to suits by the insured against the underwriters. A suit at common law had been commenced in the King's Bench on the policy, and afterwards the defendants summoned the plaintiff before the commissioners to obtain a judgment there that the policy be delivered up on the ground of its having been procured by fraud. As the defense of fraud could have been made under the general issue in the King's Bench, that court had jurisdiction of the matter over which the commissioners attempted to take jurisdiction. Although the commissioners had jurisdiction of the class of cases to which that one belonged, they could not try that particular case, because another superior court, having concurrent jurisdiction of the class of cases, had taken actual cognizance of that one.

Several illustrations of the use of this writ will be found in 8 Bacon's Abr. 230, 231. There it is said: "If there be one entire contract above 40 shillings, and a man sue for it in a court-baron, severing it into divers small sums under 40 shillings, a prohibition shall be granted, because this is done to defraud the court of the king." Upon the same ground the writ went to the hundred court and to the court of the honor of Eye. These were all common-law courts, and not spiritual courts, as to which the writ was used far more extensively.

In Mayor, etc., of London v. Cox and others, L. R. 2 H. L. 289, the common-law principles governing the writ of prohibition are extensively discussed, in answering questions propounded by the House of Lords to the judges; and there it is clearly shown that prohibition lies where an inferior court does an act which is prohibited by the statute. St. Westm. I. enacted, "of great men and their bailiffs and others (the king's officers only excepted, unto whom especial authority is given), which at the complaint of some or by their own authority attach others passing through their jurisdiction with their goods, compelling them to answer upon them upon contracts, covenants, and trespasses done out of their power and their jurisdiction, when indeed they hold nothing of them, now within the franchise where their power is, in prejudice of the king and his crown and to the damage of the people, it is provided, that none from henceforth so do; and if any do, he shall pay to him that by this occasion shall be attached his damages double, and shall be grievously amerced to the king." Prohibition went against the "great men and their bailiffs" who violated this statute. The opinion in the case last referred to, at page 255, says: "The form of writ upon this statute is in the Register, and also in Fitzherbert, Natura Brevium, with the following comment: 'If bailiffs, mayors, or others who claim jurisdiction to arrest a man upon a plaint before them, or to attach his goods, etc., do arrest one for trespass or contract who was not within their jurisdiction, the party arrested, etc., shall have a prohibition directed unto them.'"

Further light is thrown upon the nature and use of this writ in the following quotation from the opinion in Mayor, etc., of London v. Cox and others: "In order to look straight at this question, we must first shut out certain sources of confusion which have introduced themselves into the argument; and for this purpose we must endeavor to state the law of prohibition distinctly upon points which were mixed up together in the discussion at the bar. As, for instance, it is obvious that our answer must be limited to cases in which there is an absence of jurisdiction, and the prohibition is asked for upon that ground because there are exceptions which, from their very nature, must be first raised in the court below. These occur in cases where there is jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and in which, therefore, prohibition will not go for mere irregularity in the proceedings, or even a wrong decision of the merits (Blaquiere v. Hawkins), but in which it will be granted for a denial or perversion of right, such, for instance, as refusal of a copy of the libel, in which case the prohibition is only quo usque, or refusal of a valid plea to a subject-matter of complaint within the jurisdiction, in which case, although, if the plea had been received, it might have been tried in the court below, yet, if it be refused, then upon its validity and truth being established in the court above, the prohibition is absolute (White v. Steele). In these cases there is entire jurisdiction over the subject-matter. Another class in which the exception must first be taken in the court below is that in which there is general jurisdiction over the subject-matter, but a defense is raised which the court is incompetent to try, as where, in a suit to repair a chancel, the impropiator pleads a custom for the parish to repair, or raises a question of parish or no parish, which must be tried by a jury. See Duke of Rutland v. Bagshaw. In such a case the prohibition goes so soon as it appears that the special court cannot proceed without trying the custom, or taking a step towards trying it, even though it be not yet in issue, or a plea thereof refused. French v. Trask; Byerley v. Windus. And in this class of cases the prohibition acts simply in aid of the special or inferior court, by trying what the court had no jurisdiction to try, and upon an affirmative decision the prohibition is absolute; but upon a negative decision there is a judgment of consultation, upon which the special or inferior court proceeds with the cause unhampered by the objection."

These authorities seem to put it beyond question that, if it appears on the face of the proceedings that the lower court had no right to try the case, there is sufficient ground to warrant the issuing of a writ of prohibition. In some of the cases the subject-matter of the action was not proper for the court; in others, although the case was of that general class belonging to the jurisdiction of the court, some collateral matter arose in the case, just as it did in McConiha v. Guthrie, over which the court had no control; and in others, the case made out was one belonging to the general class over which the court had jurisdiction, and no such collateral matter arose, but it appeared that the cause of action had not arisen within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. In all these cases, the inferior court was called upon to consider whether it might proceed or not. If that gave jurisdiction to such an extent as to render its decision merely erroneous, and subject to correction on appeal, then there could have been no prohibition in any case. Such clearly was not the common-law practice. The inferior court proceeded at its peril. If, in determining the question of its own jurisdiction, it erred, the writ of prohibition issued against it. It was bound to know the law setting the limits upon its jurisdiction, and could no more justify or uphold its jurisdiction, under the plea of ignorance of the law, than can an individual in reference to his contracts or his acts.

This writ has been used less extensively in Virginia and in this state than it was in England in earlier times. Up until 1855, it seems to have been awarded in only three cases in Virginia: Miller v. Marshall, 1 Va. Cas. 158; Hutson v. Lowry, 2 Va. Cas. 42; and Jackson v. Maxwell, 5 Rand. 636. In Miller v. Marshall, a justice of the peace was prohibited from trying an action involving the title to a freehold estate; a matter not belonging to the jurisdiction of the justice, but to that of the county and corporation courts. In Hutson v. Lowry, a justice of the peace was prohibited from proceeding in several actions in which a single debt had been divided into several parts for the purpose of attempting to give jurisdiction over an amount in excess of what the law permitted a justice to take cognizance of. Here again the matter shown in the complaint was not a proper subject-matter for the jurisdiction of the court, but belonged to that of a higher court. In both of these cases, the justice had the right to consider, and was bound to consider, whether he could proceed. He decided that question erroneously, the error related to his jurisdiction, and the writ of prohibition went against him. The same procedure was had in Bodley v. Archibald, 33 W. Va. 229, 10 S. E. 392. A similar case is that of Warwick v. Mayo, 15 Grat. 528, in which, upon a declaration in prohibition against the mayor of a city, the court held that: "In a proceeding before the mayor or other justice to impose a penalty upon a party for obstructing a street, if a claim to the freehold is set up in the defendant or in those for whom he acts, the mayor or justice has jurisdiction to try the fact whether the claim is bona fide made. In such case, if the claim is bona fide made, the jurisdiction of the mayor or justice is ousted. He cannot inquire into the validity of the claim, and he has no power in such cases to proceed to a summary conviction." This is a case in which an inferior court had general jurisdiction of the cause of action, and a collateral matter arose in the progress of it which he had no power or authority to try, and prevented his further proceeding in the case. It was not a matter which could not be tried at all, as was the collateral matter which arose in the McConiha Case, but one which was triable in another court. As the right which confronted the court in McConiha v. Guthrie is of a higher character, and absolute in its nature, one over which no court had power or authority, it would seem upon reason to have more effectually stopped the progress of the case than the collateral matter which arose in Warwick v. Mayo, or in the several cases cited from the English books.

A question very similar to this one is mentioned, but not decided, in Mayo v. James, 12 Grat. 17. Point 1 of the syllabus reads as follows: "The mayor of the city of Richmond has authority to try cases in which a party is prosecuted for the violation of a city ordinance. Quære, whether in such a case a prohibition will lie to his proceeding to try the case, on the ground that the ordinance is in conflict with an act of the General Assembly. And it seems it will not." The charter of the city conferred upon the mayor power to "take cognizance of such cases as may be tried before him under the laws of the state, and in all cases in which any ordinance or by-law of the city is alleged to have been violated." The argument was that he had power to decide whether the ordinance in question was valid or not, and it was no excess of jurisdiction to do so. Moncure, J., said: "I am inclined to think that this argument is well founded." But he added that it was unnecessary to decide the question. He based his opinion upon the cases of Home v. Earl Camden, 2 H. Bl. 533, and Arnold v. Shields, 5 Dana, 18, 30 Am. Dec. 669. Home v. Camden did not decide the question, but left it in the form of a query. That was a case of misconstruction of a statute by the prize court in admiralty, a court which proceeded not according to the common law. These courts and the spiritual courts were subjected to the most rigid supervision by the writ of prohibition. They were repressed and restrained by it in cases in which it was not applied to the temporal courts, because, when they misconstrued statutes or proceeded otherwise than according to the common law, they substituted for the common law the civil law and the law of nations, and the superior courts jealously guarded against that, prohibiting even where the inferior court had undoubted jurisdiction, and the right to construe the statute incidentally in deciding the case on its merits. It was not regarded as a case of excess of jurisdiction. A case later than that of Home v. Camden is Gould v. Capper, 5 East, 345, in which it was held that, where a spiritual court misconstrues a statute which results in a judgment contrary to the common law and according to the civil law, prohibition does lie; but it was admitted that it was not a case of excess of jurisdiction. Lord Ellenborough said, in the course of his opinion, in which he reviewed and analyzed numerous cases: "Adverting, I say, to these authorities and circumstances, we cannot feel ourselves warranted in holding that the grounds of granting prohibition are so narrow and limited as to be confined solely to cases of excess of jurisdiction." In Home v. Camden, 4 Term R. 22 (382), Buller, J., confirms this view. He said: "It is much to the satisfaction of the judges of the present times that the principles on which prohibitions are granted are clearly settled. For, on reading some of the cases that were determined in the last century, we cannot but see that they happened at a time when it was the fashion of the courts of Westminster Hall to run down the ecclesiastical courts." And Lord Chief Justice Vaughan himself said: "It does not seem as if this court had, in some of the cases, bordered on things that were spiritual, which should not have been done; and in one of the old cases, though it was admitted that the ecclesiastical court had jurisdiction, a prohibition to the court of delegates was granted merely to support the original sentence below."

Arnold v. Shields fully supports the proposition and opinion of Judge Moncure. He holds that a justice of the peace has jurisdiction to try the right to a penalty which a void statute purports to give, and that, in erroneously deciding that the statute is valid, he does not transcend his jurisdiction, but simply commits an error which is the subject of an appeal. In a later Kentucky case (Pennington v. Woolfolk, 79 Ky. 13) a statute conferring upon a county court power to assess and fix the value of property for purposes of taxation was held unconstitutional, and the county court prohibited from proceeding under it. In City of Owensboro v. Sparks, 99 Ky. 351, 38 S. W. 4, the court refused a writ of prohibition to prevent a municipal court from proceeding to punish offenses which void city ordinances purported to create, holding that the proper method of testing the validity of the ordinance is by appeal from the judgment of the police court. Ex parte Roundtree, 51 Ala. 42, holds that "this court will interfere by prohibition to restrain a circuit judge from sitting as the presiding judge of a statutory inferior court, when the act creating that court, and making him the presiding judge thereof, is declared unconstitutional."

In McInerney v. City of Denver, 17 Colo. 302, 29 Pac. 516, a writ of prohibition was awarded against a proceeding under a void city ordinance.

The Louisiana court has fluctuated in its decisions. In State ex rel. v. Judge, 39 La. 132, 1 South. 437, the court held that, "when a party is prosecuted for a crime under a law alleged to be unconstitutional, in a case which is unappealable, and where a proper plea setting up the unconstitutionality has been overruled by the judge, a proper case is presented for the exercise of our supervisory power in determining whether a judge is exceeding the bounds of judicial power in entertaining a prosecution for a crime not created by law." The decision in State ex rel. v. Judge, 44 La. 1100, 11 South. 683, holds the contrary, as does also State ex rel. v. Wilder, 49 La. 1211, 22 South. 661. In State ex rel. v. Rost, Judge, 49 La. 1451, 22 South. 421, the last point of the syllabus says: "Even in a case not appealable, it would not be too late, after conviction and sentence, to invoke relief at the hands of this court, through its remedial writs, from the effects of a statute void for unconstitutionality." Upon the whole, the Louisiana court seems not to doubt that in such case the writ lies, but it will not be permitted to go if there is a remedy by appeal. This makes it purely a discretionary writ, and upon this theory the decisions may be harmonized.

In Houseman v. Kent Circuit Judge, 58 Mich. 364, 25 N. W. 369, the court holds that "prohibition issues to restrain a court of equity from proceeding with the exercise of power conferred upon it by an invalid act."

In State ex rel. v. Simons, 32 Minn. 540, 21 N. W. 750, a writ of prohibition was allowed against a judge who was assuming to exercise powers which an invalid statute purported to give.

In Donovan v. Mayor and Council, 29 Miss. 247, 64 Am. Dec. 143, a prohibition was awarded against the marshal of a city, restraining him from selling hogs found running at large, under an ordinance directing it, which ordinance was held void for unconstitutionality.

In Zylstra v. Charleston, 1 Bay, 382, a prohibition was awarded against proceedings under a void city ordinance. In State ex rel. v. Simons, 2 Speer, 761, proceedings under a void statute were prohibited.

In People v. Splers, 4 Utah, 385, 10 Pac. 609, 11 Pac. 509, criminal proceedings before a justice of the peace under an unconstitutional statute purporting to give jurisdiction were prohibited.

In re Schumaker, 90 Wis. 488, 63 N. W. 1050, holds that "a writ of prohibition will not be granted against proceedings in the circuit court to incorporate a village, on the ground that the statutes authorizing such proceedings are unconstitutional. The ordinary remedies at law are ample." From the reasoning it is to be inferred that the writ was withheld, not because it could not be granted, but in the discretion of the court.

In Railroad Co. v. Commissioners, 127 Mass. 50, 34 Am. Rep. 338, the court held that "the owner of land taken by the manager of a railroad owned by the commonwealth, under a statute which does not make adequate provision for the payment of compensation for the land so taken, may have a writ of prohibition to the county commissioners to prevent them from proceeding with the assessment of the damages caused by the taking."

In Sweet v. Hulbert, 51 Barb. 312, a writ of prohibition was awarded to prohibit a county judge from appointing commissioners to carry into effect an unconstitutional statute providing for the issuing of bonds by a municipal corporation in aid of the construction of a railroad. In the syllabus it is said: "A writ of prohibition issues to forbid a court and party to whom it is directed from proceeding in any matter designated, then pending before it. It will lie to prevent the exercise of unauthorized power by an inferior tribunal, in cases where it has jurisdiction, as well as where it has not jurisdiction." This case seems to be very much like that of McConiha v. Guthrie. In the opinion it is said: "The property of the citizen cannot be taken from him without his consent, except by due process of law, or by eminent domain, or by taxation. Against every other mode he is protected."

While the question now under consideration is not discussed, nor particularly mentioned, in the case of Weston v. Charleston, 2 Pet. 449, 7 L. Ed. 481, that case seems to confirm the proposition that the writ lies against proceedings under a void ordinance. The city of Charleston levied an unconstitutional tax of 7 per cent. on stock of the United States. The common pleas court of South Carolina awarded a writ of prohibition against the collection of the tax. To the decision of that court a writ of error was awarded by what was called the "Constitutional Court of South Carolina," where the judgment was reversed. To that judgment the Supreme Court of the United States awarded a writ of error, and reversed the judgment of the Constitutional Court, thereby reinstating the writ of prohibition.

Thus it appears that the decisions are in conflict, and that there is a wide difference of opinion among the judges upon the question presented. But the decisions seem to preponderate in favor of the jurisdiction by prohibition in such case. As by the common law a writ of prohibition could be had upon the mere ground that the cause of action did not arise within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, or that the subject-matter of the action belonged to the jurisdiction of some other court, or that a collateral matter which was triable by some court, but not by that particular court, had arisen in the cause, all of which defects might have been treated as mere grounds of error, remediable by appellate proceedings, it would seem strange that a court could not be prohibited, when attempting to do those things which the law had placed entirely beyond the reach of all judicial power. It is true that the object of the writ in general was to restrain each court within its own jurisdiction, and thus secure order and harmony in the administration of justice. But it has been shown that this writ was used, not only to keep courts within their jurisdiction, but to defend and uphold the common law against the encroachments of other systems of law. Can it be supposed that the laws and courts which were constituted for the purpose of preserving and vindicating the rights of the citizen were objects of greater solicitude and more jealous care than the rights of the citizen himself? Bacon says that the object of prohibitions in general was the preservation of the rights of the king's crown and courts and the ease and quiet of the subject. If a court was subject to prohibition when it invaded the jurisdiction of another, took upon itself that which was triable, and was only in fault because of its encroachment upon the jurisdiction of another court, with much more reason it ought to be amenable to the writ of prohibition when it undertook to try that which no court could try.

This conclusion is somewhat strengthened by observations on the subject of jurisdiction expressed in the opinion in Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 282, 23 L. Ed. 914, which are as follows: "All courts, even the highest, are more or less limited in their jurisdiction. They are limited to particular classes of actions, such as civil or criminal; or to particular modes of administering relief, such as legal or equitable; or to transactions of a special character, such as arise on navigable waters, or relate to the testamentary disposition of estates; or to the use of particular process in the enforcement of their judgments. * * * Though the court may possess jurisdiction of a cause, of the subject-matter, and of the parties, it is still limited in its modes of procedure, and in the extent and character of its judgments. It must act judicially in all things, and cannot then transcend the power conferred by the law. If, for instance, the action be upon a money demand, the court, notwithstanding its complete jurisdiction over the subject and parties, has no power to pass judgment of imprisonment in the penitentiary upon the defendant. If the action be for a libel or personal tort, the court cannot order in the case a specific performance of a contract. * * * The decree of a court of equity upon oral allegations, without written pleadings, would be an idle act; * * * and the reason is that the courts are not authorized to exert their power in that way." These views are expressed upon the law relating to collateral attack upon judgments. In the law of collateral attack, everything is intended in favor of jurisdiction, where the judgment is rendered by a court of general jurisdiction. But even there a fatal defect or want of jurisdiction, such as is indicated in the language quoted above, makes the judgment absolutely void for want of jurisdiction.

Can it be possible, then, that before the court pronounces its void judgment, does an act which it has no power to do, prohibition does not lie, when it concededly lies in so many cases of less importance and gravity? This proposition has been solemnly laid down and asserted by this court in Ensign Co. v. Carroll, 30 W. Va. 533, 4 S. E. 782. In an action before a justice of the peace for the recovery of money due on contract, there had been two new trials, the last of which resulted in a verdict for $5.79. The law allowed no more new trials, nor any appeal. Then the judgment debtor filed a bill in equity, and, upon it, obtained an injunction to the judgment. That bill did not contain a single allegation of a kind or character to give jurisdiction in equity for a proceeding of that kind. A court of equity can enjoin a judgment, where there has been fraud in its procurement of such a character that it could not have been relieved upon in the action at law, and under some other peculiar circumstances. No such allegations appeared in the bill. There was nothing in it that gave the court so much as a pretext to say that it presented a cause of action within its jurisdiction. Upon an application to this court, a writ of prohibition was awarded against the judge who granted the injunction.

The other side of the rule is illustrated in 46 S.E.—13

the three cases of County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 87, 11 S. E. 747, County Court v. Armstrong, 34 W. Va. 326, 12 S. E. 488, and County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 362, 12 S. E. 490. In the first two of these cases writs had been obtained from the circuit court by parties who had no such interest in the proceeding pending in the county court as entitled them to a writ of prohibition. Moreover, at their instance, the circuit court, by appellate process, undertook to review the action of the county court in respect to a matter that was not a subject of review by any court. Writs of prohibition were promptly awarded against the judges of the circuit courts. In the last case the parties, who had endeavored to have the circuit court review these proceedings by certiorari and writ of error, sued out of the circuit court an injunction against the county court, on the ground that in proceeding to alter the location of a bridge, and build a new bridge, it was creating a debt in violation of the Constitution and laws. This was new and original matter, which had not appeared in the proceedings up to that time, and which constituted ground for an original proceeding in a court of equity. Then the county court applied for another prohibition, and this court, looking at the bill, and seeing that it purported to state a cause of action upon which a court of equity had authority and power to act, refused the writ of prohibition, without subjecting the bill to an examination to ascertain whether it was good on demurrer. It was enough that there was something in that bill calling for the exercise of the judicial power of the court. It had the right to say whether the bill was good or bad, having jurisdiction of that class of causes which the bill purported to set out. This was very different from the bill in Ensign Co. v. Carroll, which made no pretense of setting out a cause of equity jurisdiction, and which furnished nothing upon which the court had any power to act.

This view accords with the law relating to the acquisition of jurisdiction of the person, where the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter. If it has no jurisdiction at all over the person, it cannot proceed. There must be something in the form of process, and something in the form of a return of process, in order to give jurisdiction. If there is no pretense of either, then the court has no power to say it has jurisdiction. There is nothing for it to consider in that connection. But, if there is a defective process or defective service, then the court has power to decide whether the process or return is sufficient. There is no ground for a writ of prohibition; for, if the court has power to decide at all, its erroneous decision does not take away its jurisdiction. Works on Courts and Their Jurisdiction, p. 634.

In this case the complaint, upon which the mayor issued his warrant and undertook to proceed, set out that as an offense which the law does not recognize as an offense. It called for a prosecution in respect to a matter as to which no court has any authority to entertain a prosecution, and the court was bound to know this, because its jurisdiction and power was circumscribed and limited to that extent.

How far is the writ discretionary? This is determined by statute in some of the states. Our statute gives it as matter of right. Until 1882 our statute was the same as Act 1 Wm. IV, c. 21; but in that year it was amended. But the amendment is only declaratory of the common law, for the action of the court in allowing or refusing it was always reviewable. Home v. Earl Camden, cited; Forster v. Forster, L. R. 4 B. & S. 187; Mayor, etc., v. Cox, L. R. 2 H. L. 239. The writ is not favored by the American courts nor by the later English courts, and it is generally refused where the applicant has another adequate remedy.

The common-law rule is stated in Mayor, etc., v. Cox, cited, as follows: "There is, indeed, a distinction, after sentence, between a patent and a suggested defect; for if the party below, whether plaintiff or defendant, thinks proper, instead of moving for a prohibition, to proceed to trial in the special or inferior court, and is defeated, then, if the defect be of power to try the particular issue only ('defectus triationis,' as it has been called), the right to move for a prohibition is gone. If the defect be of jurisdiction over the cause ('defectus jurisdictionis'), and that defect be apparent upon the proceedings, a prohibition goes after sentence. Roberts v. Humby. If it be not apparent, but the party, instead of moving for a prohibition, pleads in the special or inferior court the facts ousting the jurisdiction, and such court improperly decides that it has jurisdiction, he may, notwithstanding such decision, upon satisfying a superior court that it was erroneous, obtain a prohibition. Thompson v. Ingham, followed in Chew v. Holroyd and Marsden v. Wardle. Where, however, the defect is not apparent, and depends upon some fact in the knowledge of the applicant which he had an opportunity of bringing forward in the court below, and he has thought proper, without excuse, to allow that court to proceed to judgment without setting up the objection, and without moving for a prohibition in the first instance, although it should seem that the jurisdiction to grant a prohibition in respect of the right of the crown is not taken away, for mere acquiescence does not give jurisdiction (Knowles v. Holden), yet, considering the conduct of the applicant, the importance of making an end of litigation, and that the writ, though of right, is not of course, the court would decline to interpose, except, perhaps, upon an irresistible case, and an excuse for the delay, such as disability, malpractice, or matter newly come to the knowledge of the applicant (see Case of the Admiralty). The objection in such case is that the applicant comes too late—not, as here, that he comes too soon; and the cases cited at the bar as to application after sentence are therefore inapplicable."

For the foregoing reasons, I concur in the decision.

BRANNON, J. (dissenting.) I dissent, because I do not think prohibition lies. The mayor had jurisdiction of cases of this general nature; that is, to entertain, hear, and determine prosecutions for the violations of town ordinances. And the fact that the ordinance is invalid does not go to say that he has no jurisdiction, but only that there is no law to call for judgment. There is the ordinance colorably warranting the prosecution, but upon hearing it turns out, in law, not to warrant it; but that does not show absence of jurisdiction to hear and determine, does not show that there was not jurisdiction to start with. If the rule is otherwise, then you can prohibit any court from entertaining a case where there is no law to warrant judgment, or where the act is for any reason invalid. The mayor has the right to begin to consider—right to pass on his own jurisdiction; and you prohibit him from doing just what the law commands him to do—consider and determine. Appeal is the regular remedy. This case does not present a question of jurisdiction, but only raises the question whether there is any law to warrant conviction for the particular act. In this court in late days prohibition is becoming appeal, writ of error, and certiorari, in anticipation of final decree or judgment. Jelly v. Dils, 27 W. Va. 267; Buskirk v. Judge, 7 W. Va. 91; dissenting opinion in N. & W. Co. v. Pinnacle Co., 44 W. Va. 583, 30 S. E. 196, 41 L. R. A. 414; County v. Boreman, 84 W. Va. 362, 12 S. E. 490; Haldeman v. Davis, 28 W. Va. 384. It is better that all courts go on to judgment, as presumably right decision will be attained, than to call them to a halt before we know whether they will decide right or wrong. Judge Moncure expressed a like opinion in Mayo v. James, 12 Grat. 17. See King v. Doolittle, 51 W. Va. 91, 41 S. E. 145. The Supreme Court of the United States holds this doctrine. It says there must be no other remedy. "Where an inferior court has clearly no jurisdiction of a suit, and the defendant has objected to its jurisdiction at the outset, and has no other remedy, he is entitled as a matter of right to a writ of prohibition." Smith v. Whitney, 116 U. S. 167, 29 L. Ed. 601. It makes no difference that the amount is too small for appeal. Ex parte Ferry Co., 104 U. S. 519, 26 L. Ed. 815. "Where there is a plain and adequate remedy by appeal, prohibition will not lie." In re Huguley, 184 U. S. 297, 22 Sup. Ct. 455, 46 L. Ed. 549. "But the sounder doctrine, and that sustained by the great preponderance of authority, is to the effect that prohibition only lies where the court either lacks jurisdiction of the subject-matter, or, having jurisdiction, exceeds it in some incidental matter or in rendering judgment, and no appeal or writ of error or other remedy is available at all, or, if available, is inadequate to meet the emergencies of the case, or to afford the relief to which the injured party is entitled." Spell, Extra. Relief, §§ 1725, 1727. I think these propositions are good law in Virginia. Supervisors v. Wingfield, 27 Grat. 329. "It will not lie to restrain an inferior court from exercising jurisdiction in a particular case, if such court has jurisdiction of cases of that kind." Haldeman v. Davis, 28 W. Va. 324. "Like all other extraordinary remedies, prohibition is granted only in cases where the usual and ordinary forms of remedy are insufficient to afford redress." High, Extra. Rem. § 770. Not to take the place of appeal. Id. § 771. "In the exercise of jurisdiction by prohibition, it is important to distinguish between the nature of the action which it is sought to prohibit, and the sufficiency of the cause of action stated in the proceedings." Id. § 767a. "Prohibition, being an extraordinary writ, cannot be resorted to when the ordinary and usual remedies, such as appeal, writ of error, certiorari, or other modes of review, or injunction, are available." 16 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 1130. I feel sure that Virginia, West Virginia, and other American law is, in great weight and better reason, against the writ in this case.

Carry the other doctrine to its logical results. If chancery takes up a case proper for a law court; if a circuit court entertains an indictment for an offense when the statute on which it is based is unconstitutional, or does not apply to it, or the common law makes it no offense; if a circuit court rejects a plea in abatement, and compels the defendant to defend a suit having no jurisdiction over him; if the writ in an action is void—in these and many other cases prohibition would lie. Why not?

OBER v. STEPHENS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 5, 1903.)

REAL ESTATE AGENT—CONTRACT—VALIDITY— LICENSE—PENALTY—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. The general rule is that a contract in violation of law is void; but where the statute requires a license "to practice the business of stock or other broker, by buying or selling for others, stocks, securities or other property for a commission or reward," and imposes a penalty for a violation thereof, a contract of real estate agent to sell real estate for another for commission or reward, in violation of such requirement, is not for that reason absolutely void.

2. Unless it clearly appear that the Legislature intended more, it will be held that the penalty imposed excludes all others.

Error to Circuit Court, Wetzel County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Action by M. V. Ober against John Stephens. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

McWHORTER, P. M. V. Ober brought his action before a justice of the peace of Wetzel county against John Stephens to recover "amount due for sale of real estate according to contract, $250," and recovered judgment for the amount claimed. Stephens appealed from the judgment to the circuit court of Wetzel county. When the case was called, the defendant tendered two pleas in writing, numbered 1 and 2. The first was a plea of non assumpsit; the second was to the effect that at the time plaintiff alleged that defendant employed him as an agent to sell for him defendant's farm for the commission claimed, and at the time the sale was made by plaintiff as real estate agent or broker and as alleged agent for defendant, plaintiff was a real estate broker and practiced the business of such broker by buying and selling, for others, real estate for commission and reward, and was also on both of the said occasions without a state license therefor, and was at the said time a citizen of the state of West Virginia and county of Wetzel, which plea was verified by the affidavit of the defendant. The plaintiff objected to the filing of said plea No. 2, which objection was sustained by the court; the court being of opinion that the matter set up in said plea marked No. 2 could be given in evidence under the general issue. The defendant excepted to the ruling of the court in rejecting the plea. A jury was impaneled to try the issue on the first plea, and in the course of the trial the defendant took several bills of exceptions. The defendant asked the court to give to the jury five several instructions. Numbers 1 and 2 were given. The first was to the effect that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff; that he could not recover unless it be shown by a preponderance of evidence that plaintiff made the contract sued on, as alleged by plaintiff; and the second that even if they believed from the evidence that defendant authorized plaintiff to sell his farm as agent, still plaintiff could not recover if the jury further believed from the evidence that all the terms or any of the material terms of the sale were omitted and not agreed upon by the parties. The third, fourth, and fifth instructions asked by the defendant were as follows:

"(3) The court instructs the jury that no person without a state license shall practice the business of a real estate broker by buying or selling real estate for others for profit or reward; and if you believe from all the evidence that the plaintiff was a real estate broker, without state license, at the time he claimed to have sold defendant's farm, or at the time that he claimed to have been authorized by defendant to sell his farm, for $250 for his services in making such sale, you will find for the defendant.

(4) The court instructs the jury that a real estate broker is one who buys or sells real estate for others for profit or reward, and that a real estate agent who buys or sells land for others for profit or reward is a real estate broker. (5) The jury are instructed to find for the defendant." Which instructions the court refused to give, and gave the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that if you believe from all the evidence and circumstances that the defendant, John Stephens, employed M. V. Ober to sell his farm at the price of twenty-five thousand dollars, and that plaintiff, M. V. Ober, did sell said Stephens farm at the price and upon the terms agreed upon in said contract of employment, and if you further find from all the evidence and circumstances of the same that said Stephens was to pay said Ober two hundred and fifty dollars for making said sale, then you should find for plaintiff"—for the plaintiff over the objection of the defendant. To the ruling of the court in refusing to give said three instructions for the defendant, and in overruling defendant's objection to the said instruction given for the plaintiff, the defendant excepted.

On the 27th day of May, 1902, the jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $250. The defendant moved to set aside the verdict because it was contrary to the law and the evidence, and grant him a new trial, of which motion the court took time to consider, and on the 14th day of June, 1902, the court set aside the motion and entered judgment in favor of plaintiff upon said verdict against the defendant, John Stephens, and John C. McEldowney, his security on the appeal bond. The defendant procured from one of the judges of this court a writ of error, assigning several errors.

The first and third assignments of error raise the question of the validity of the contract sued upon, by reason of the plaintiff practicing the business of real estate agent in buying and selling property for others for a commission or reward without having a state license therefor, as provided in chapter 82, Code 1899. It is contended by plaintiff in error that for the cause stated plaintiff Ober's contract is void, being in violation of law, and could not be enforced.

The first assignment is that the court erred in not permitting plea No. 2 to be filed. Under the ruling of the court admitting all the evidence under the general issue that could have been introduced by the defendant under the plea, this was immaterial.

The third assignment of error is in refusing to instruct the jury as set out in bill of exceptions No. 4—refusing the instructions of the defendant Nos. 3, 4, and 5, hereinbefore copied. The authorities touching the validity of the act are conflicting, many of those without this state holding in favor of the proposition of defendant—that the contract of plaintiff is void, being in violation of the statute which forbids any person "to practice the business of stock or other broker, by buying or selling for others, stocks, securities or other property for a commission or reward," without a license therefor. In Stevenson v. Ewing, 87 Tenn. 46, 9 S. W. 230, it is held that: "Real estate brokers are forbidden by Acts 1885 [p. 18], c. 1, § 46, to pursue their avocation without license; and an unlicensed broker who, in violation of this act, negotiates the sale of land for another, cannot recover any compensation for his services. The contract for compensation in such case is illegal and void." The section referred to provides that the occupation of real estate broker "shall be deemed a privilege and be taxed and not pursued or done without license." Much stress seems to have been laid in the opinion in that case upon the words of the statute "not pursued or done without license." This decision quotes with approval from Cooley on Taxation (2d Ed.) p. 572: "When a tax takes the form of a tax on the privilege of following an employment, convenience in collection will commonly dictate the requirement of a license, and the person taxed will be compelled to pay the tax as a condition to the right to carry on the business at all. In such case the business carried on without a license will be illegal, and no recovery can be had upon contracts made in the course of it"—and cites Johnson v. Hulings, 103 Pa. 498, 49 Am. Rep. 131, where it is held: "An unlicensed real estate agent subject to penalty for doing business without a license cannot recover compensation under a contract for such business;" and also Holt v. Green, 73 Pa. 198, 13 Am. Rep. 737, where it is held: "A commission broker who has not procured a license as required by the act of Congress of June 30, 1864, held not entitled to recover his commission in a state court." See, also, Buckley v. Humason, 50 Minn. 195, 52 N. W. 385, 16 L. R. A. 422, 36 Am. St. Rep. 637, and many other authorities to the same effect. The only West Virginia Case relied upon by the plaintiff in error on this point is the case of Jackson v. Hough, 88 W. Va. 236, 18 S. E. 575. This question was not there passed upon, as it did not clearly arise. While that was an action similar in its nature to the one at bar, the plaintiff, Jackson, was asked as a witness the question "whether he had license to engage in the business of real estate agent or broker"; the defendant insisting that the court erred in refusing this question to be asked. It is there said that it was not error, inasmuch as no evidence had been given or was proposed to show that plaintiff carried on the business of real estate broker, save the single sale in question. It is said in the opinion (at page 241, 38 W. Va., page 577, 18 S. E.): "If one should undertake or profess to follow that business, no doubt one sale would be sufficient to bring him within the letter and spirit of the statute; but one is not within its letter or spirit who, without any manifestation of carrying on such vocation, merely makes one sale." There is but a mere inference to be drawn from the language here used, that in case it had been shown that Jackson was a real estate broker, and without a license, the court might have held that he could not recover for his services as such.

There are many authorities without this state holding that such contract is not void, notably Ruckman v. Bergholz, 87 N. J. Law, 437; Fairly v. Wappoo Mills (S. C.) 22 S. E. 108, 29 L. R. A. 215; Mandlebaum v. Gregovich, 17 Nev. 87, 28 Pac. 121, 45 Am. Rep. 433; Trust Co. v. Hoffman (Idaho) 49 Pac. 314, 37 L. R. A. 509; Lester v. Bank, 33 Md. 558, 3 Am. Rep. 211. These decisions are based upon the theory that the object of the law in such cases requiring a license and imposing a penalty for carrying on a business which is legitimate and proper in itself is to raise revenue, and the penalty provided for carrying on the business stated without a license is exclusive, and not intended as prohibitory. In Clark on Contracts, Hornbook series, at page 388, in treating the subject the author says: "Sir William Anson states as the tests of prohibition, not only the purpose of the penalty, but also its continuity. His summary is substantially that, where a penalty is imposed by statute upon the carrying on a trade or business in a particular manner, it may be assumed prima facie that agreements made in breach of such statutory provisions are illegal and void; that if the penalty is imposed, not for the benefit of the public in general, but for the security of the revenue, it is possible that the agreement was only intended to be penalized, and not prohibited; that if, in addition to this, it appears that the penalty is imposed once for all upon the offending person, and not upon each successive agreement in breach of the statute continuously, it is almost, if not quite, certain that agreements so made are not intended to be vitiated." And cases there cited. However, it seems to me this point is well settled by this court in the case of Tie & Lumber Company v. Thomas, 33 W. Va. 566, 11 S. E. 37 (Syl. point 2), 25 Am. St. Rep. 925: "A contract made by a foreign corporation before it has complied with the statutory prerequisites to the right to do business in another state will not, on that account, be held absolutely void, unless the statute expressly so declares; and, if the statute imposes a penalty upon the corporation for failing to comply with such prerequisites, such penalty will be deemed exclusive of any others." In that case, at page 570, 33 W. Va., page 38, 11 S. E., 25 Am. St. Rep. 925, Judge Snyder, after saying it is clearly not the primary purpose of the Legislature, in passing such statutes, to render the contracts and dealings of such corporations which have not complied with the requirements of the statutes void and unenforceable, says: "Hence the decided weight of authority is that, where the Legislature has not expressly declared that this result shall follow from a failure to comply with the statute, the courts ought not to imply such a result unless this be necessary in order to attain the primary object for which the statute was enacted. Upon this ground it has been held that a contract made by a foreign corporation before it has complied with the statutory prerequisites to the right to do business will not, on that account, be held absolutely void, unless the statute expressly so declares; and if the statute imposes a penalty upon the corporation for failure to comply with such prerequisites, such penalty will be deemed exclusive of any others"—and cites Columbus Ins. Co. v. Walsh, 18 Mo. 229; Ins. Co. v. Salt Co., 31 Mich. 346; Hartford & Co. v. Matthews, 102 Mass. 221; 2 Morawetz on Corp. § 665. Section 30, c. 54, Code 1899, provides, first, that a foreign corporation may do business in this state "upon complying with the requirements of this section, and not otherwise"; then a specific penalty upon such corporation for its failure to comply with such requirements. There is no express declaration nor apparent intention on the part of the lawmakers that such failure to comply with the requirements of the statute should render the contracts of the corporation void, but they do expressly provide that such failure shall be punishable by fine, and the provision in regard to a person practicing the business of a broker, etc., is analogous to the case of the corporation. In the case just cited (Tie Co. v. Thomas), Judge Snyder cites with approval Bank v. Page, 6 Or. 431, where it is held: "The general rule is that a contract in violation of law is void. The only exception to the rule is that when a law imposes a penalty for the prohibited act, and it clearly appears that the Legislature intended no more than to impose the penalty for the violation of the law, a contract made in violation of the statute is not void." He further says: "The authorities on this question are reviewed in Morawetz on Corporations (sections 662-666), and that author announces as his conclusion therefrom that, 'unless it appear affirmatively that the Legislature intended to render the forbidden act or contract absolutely void in legal contemplation, it will not be so held'; citing Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621-627, 25 L. Ed. 188." It follows that the court did not err in refusing to give the instructions Nos. 3, 4, and 5, as set out in bill of exceptions No. 4.

The second assignment is that the court erred in permitting to be introduced as evidence before the jury, on behalf of the plaintiff, the paper writing marked "Exhibit 3," with plaintiff Ober's testimony, purporting to be a contract or agreement between the said M. V. Ober, agent for John Stephens and A. C. Ruby, for the sale of the farm to said Ruby, which is set out in bill of exceptions No. 6, and is as follows: "This agreement, made this 19th day of September, 1901, between M. V. Ober, agent for John Stephens, of the first part, and A. C. Ruby, party of the second part, witnesseth, that the said Ober, agent of John Stephens, has this day sold to A. C. Ruby the farm of said John Stephens, lying in Magnolia District, Wetzel County, West Virginia, being the same land purchased by John Stephens from Robert D. Leggett and D. M. Alexander, and also including a small piece of land owned by said Stephens in said District, containing 620 acres more or less, and the said Ruby agrees to pay the sum of $25,000.00 cash for said lands upon the execution and delivery of a good and sufficient deed for the same. And the said Ruby agrees to pay, upon the execution of a contract for said sale, the sum of $500; the remainder to be paid when the said deed is to be delivered. M. V. Ober, Agent for John Stephens. A. C. Ruby."

Plaintiff testified that on the 18th of September, 1901, he had a verbal contract with the defendant to sell his farm for him at $25,000, for which he was to pay him $250. It does not appear from his testimony that it was agreed just what the terms of sale should be. He says he spoke to L. M. Stephens, informing him that he had John Stephens' farm for sale at $25,000, when Stephens remarked he had a man who would take it at that. He said John Stephens told him to go ahead and sell the farm for $25,000, and he would give him $250, and that Stephens mentioned something about his tenants, and that plaintiff told him they would be taken care of; that the contract to sell the land first started on September 16th, and that Stephens told him after that, about Wednesday following—he thinks about the 18th—he told him again. He was asked how long after that it was until he sold the land to Ruby. He said he considered it sold then, through Mr. L. M. Stephens, and as soon as Mr. Stephens came to town, and Ruby was there, he said they would get them together and fix things up; that he met John Stephens and told him to bring the deed down; that Mr. Ruby came to witness' office, and he went over to the Eakin House and to Mr. Stephens over there, and said, "Now, Uncle John, I have sold that farm to Mr. A. C. Ruby here; he will pay you all cash or part cash;" and Ruby said, "If I don't pay all cash, I don't want no lien retained on the land; I want the land clear; I would rather give personal security;" and Ruby said, "Yes, sir; I will pay you all cash or part cash;" and Mr. Stephens said, "Well, all cash will be acceptable." Witness further said that Stephens called L. M. Stephens out and told him he wanted to see him; that witness did not know what their conversation was about. John Stephens did not return, but L. M. Stephens returned, and told witness what was said, and witness told Ruby, "Just let it rest, then." John Stephens testified that he told L. M. Stephens that it looked to him as if Mr. Ober wanted to force him to sell his land whether he was willing to or not, and that he said, "I wouldn't let him sell anything for me now; since he has tried to force this thing, he couldn't sell a dog for me." This is given as the conversation between John and L. M. Stephens when John called him out, and which was told to plaintiff by L. M. Stephens, who was associated with Ober in the transaction as stated by Ober. On plaintiff's cross-examination defendant offered a paper which was admitted to be a copy of a writing or power of attorney, which plaintiff presented to defendant and asked him to sign, which defendant declined to do, which is filed with and made a part of the deposition of plaintiff at instance of defendant, and which is as follows: "New Martinsville, W. Va., Sept. 18th, 1901. I hereby put my farm, consisting of six hundred and twenty acres more or less, situated and lying in Magnolia District, Wetzel County, West Virginia, and being the same land purchased by me from R. D. Leggett and D. M. Alexander, in the hands of M. V. Ober, for sale; and I hereby agree to pay the said M. V. Ober Three Hundred dollars if he succeeds in finding a purchaser or purchasers within thirty days from the date hereof, at the price of Twenty-Five Thousand Dollars ($25,000.00.) One-third of the purchase money to be paid cash in hand, the balance to be paid on such terms as the purchaser or purchasers and I can agree on, and I hereby agree to make a deed for said land to the purchaser or purchasers, whoever they may be, on the terms mentioned above."

The contract or agreement mentioned and set out in bill of exceptions No. 6, admitted as evidence, was entered into between the plaintiff and Ruby, the alleged purchaser, without the knowledge of defendant. Plaintiff testified that the contract was written some four or five days, or possibly a week, after the plaintiff, defendant, and Ruby were together, and it was dated back to that day, and that defendant was not present when it was written, and it is not claimed that defendant knew anything about the written contract. It will be observed there is no mention made in the written contract of taking care of any tenants who might be on the land, as was understood between the plaintiff and defendant, as shown by the testimony of plaintiff himself, as well as other witnesses. In Chapman v. Jewett (Va.) 24 S. E. 361, the Court of Appeals of Virginia holds that "verbal authority to sell land confers no power to execute a contract to convey"; and in Halsey v. Monteiro, 24 S. E. 238, by the same court it is held that "a real estate broker authorized to 'list' and 'place' property on commission has no authority to sign a contract of sale." While the plaintiff testifies that the sale was made before that time, on the 18th day of September he presented a written contract to be signed by Stephens, authorizing him to sell the land on different terms from those on which the alleged sale was made, which Stephens refused to sign. Plaintiff afterwards, on the 19th of September, executed the contract with Ruby, thereby manufacturing evidence for himself. The contract in question, being executed without the authority, verbal or written, and without the knowledge or consent of Stephens, in my view of the case, was not competent evidence, and should not have been permitted to go to the jury. Aside from this written contract, the evidence was conflicting, and it was for the jury to say whether the claim of plaintiff was sustained, and the admission of the written contract was prejudicial to the rights of the defendant; but a majority of the members of the court differ with me on this, and hold that under the rulings in Conaway v. Sweeney, 24 W. Va. 643; Kennedy v. Ehlen, 31 W. Va. 540-558, 8 S. E. 398, and cases there cited; 2 Minor, 850; 3 Minor, 153, and cases there cited; Mechem on Agency, §§ 88, 89—the paper was properly admitted. It is insisted by plaintiff in error that plaintiff's evidence fails to support the verdict, in that "it does not show or tend to show, nor does plaintiff undertake to prove, that the alleged purchaser was ready, willing, or able to purchase the lands either for part cash or all cash; no evidence at all of tender or pecuniary ability." It is true there is no evidence of tender or of pecuniary ability on the part of the purchaser, Ruby, to make the purchase and pay the money according to the contract; but there was an agreement to pay the price mentioned, and Ruby declared himself ready to pay all cash or part cash, and there was no question raised as to his ability. The parties, seller and buyer, were by plaintiff, Ober, brought together face to face, when the proposed purchaser expressed himself as ready to pay all cash, and his financial ability was not brought in question, so that the case does not come within the ruling in the case of Clay v. Deskins, 36 W. Va. 350, 15 S. E. 85, and other authorities cited and relied upon by plaintiff in error.

The fourth assignment of error is the giving of the instruction on behalf of the plaintiff, hereinbefore set out, which instruction is evidently founded upon the written contract between the plaintiff, as agent for the defendant, and the alleged purchaser, Ruby, as well as upon the oral evidence tending to prove the employment of plaintiff to make the sale, which contract in writing, being admitted as evidence, renders the instruction good, and it was properly given.

For the reasons herein stated, there is no error in the judgment, and the same must be affirmed.

NOTE BY POFFENBARGER, J. (concurring). I think the admission of the contract was not reversible error, if error at all. The issue was not whether a binding contract of sale had been made, or whether Ober had authority to execute a written contract for sale of the property. It was whether Stephens had agreed to pay him the amount he claimed for effecting a sale of the land, and the written agreement permitted to go to the jury only tended to prove that Ober had done more than he agreed to do, if his agency did not extend to the signing of a written contract of sale, and corroborated his testimony. The written contract is not manufactured evidence. It does not appear that Ober's authority ended with the successful effort to consummate the sale on the day on which he got the parties together.

FLUHARTY et al. v. FLUHARTY et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 12, 1903.)

DEED—CANCELLATION—JURISDICTION IN EQUITY.

1. W. and M., his wife, conveyed to their two sons, T. and E., their farm of 168 acres with general warranty, except that the grantees should pay to the grantors, within 60 days from the delivery of the deed, $100 each, in consideration that the grantees bind themselves to provide for and take care of the grantors during their natural lives, respectively, "and to furnish them whatever necessities they may need as it regards eatables or clothing, medical aid, etc., and to furnish them a good nurse whenever they may need one and they depart this life to have them buried accordingly to the rules of civilized society"; and it was provided further that, if the grantees should fail to perform any of their several agreements "when it is possible for them to do them, then this deed is to be null and void and revert back to the said grantors with full possession. Said grantors hereby reserve possession of the above named land until the death of each of them."

Held, that a court of equity will take jurisdiction of a bill filed by the heirs of W., deceased, to set aside and cancel the conveyance for failure on part of the grantees to comply with the conditions of the conveyance.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Bill by Jesse Fluharty and others against Thornton Fluharty and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

T. N. Parks, for appellants. C. Powell and U. N. Arnett, Jr., for appellees.

McWHORTER, P. William Fluharty and his wife, Meletha Fluharty, by deed dated the 16th day of May, 1884, conveyed to Thornton Fluharty and Ellis Fluharty, in consideration that the said grantees would provide for and take care of the grantors during their respective lives, and furnish them whatever necessities they might need, as regarded eatables, clothing, medical aid, etc., and to furnish them a good nurse whenever they might need one, and at their death to have them "buried accordingly to the rules of civilized society," a tract of 168 acres of land lying on Lewellen's Fork of Flat Run, with general warranty, except that the grantees should pay to the grantors, within 60 days from the delivery of the deed, $100 each; and a further provision was contained in the deed that if the grantees should fail to perform any of their several agreements "when it is possible for them to do them, then this deed is to be null and void and revert back to the said grantors with full possession. Said grantors hereby reserve possession of the above named land until the death of each of them."

William Fluharty died on or about the 9th day of November, 1893, intestate. On the 28th day of May, 1897, Ellis Fluharty conveyed to U. N. Arnett, Jr., and Charles Powell, in consideration of the sum of $2,000, paid in hand, the one undivided half of said tract of 168 acres. At the February rules, 1900, Jesse Fluharty, Michael Fluharty, and J. W. Fluharty filed their bill in equity in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Marion county against Thornton Fluharty, Ellis Fluharty, and the other heirs at law of said William Fluharty, Meletha A. Fluharty, the widow, and U. N. Arnett, Jr., and Charles Powell, alleging that at the time of making said deed by the said William Fluharty and his wife they were well advanced in years and growing feeble with age, and unable physically to till and otherwise manage said land so as to make a livelihood for themselves; that they were almost wholly dependent on said land for support for themselves, and had no investment that would bring an income, and only possessed of such personal property as was necessary for farm operations and home comforts, worth not more than a few hundred dollars; that the controlling reason for making said deed was to secure to said vendors a home and support in their old age, and for that purpose said deed contained a provision to the effect that the grantees therein, the defendants Ellis and Thornton Fluharty, agreed to provide for and take care of the grantors during their natural lives, respectively, and to make such provision for them as was set out in the deed, and within 60 days they were to pay the grantors $100 each, and, if they failed to perform any of the agreements named in said deed when it was possible for them to do or keep them, then the land was to revert back to the grantors, with full possession thereof, and the grantors reserved possession of said land until the death of each of them. The bill further alleged failure to comply with the conditions on the part of the grantees, Thornton and Ellis Fluharty, in every particular, and also filed with their bill a contract dated May 17, 1884, signed and acknowledged by the said William Fluharty and Meletha Fluharty, his wife, reciting the conditions of the deed to be performed by the said grantees, and also further agreeing, on the part of said William Fluharty and his wife, that if for any unavoidable cause the parties of the second part should fail to perform the obligations and conditions contained in the deed, so that it should be set aside, then they agreed to make to each one of them, Thornton and Ellis, a deed for 50 acres of land; alleging that the provisions in the contract to convey 50 acres of said 168 acres of the tract on conditions therein named was null and void, and could not be enforced, for the reason that there was no consideration moving said William Fluharty to support such promise, and the further reason that said agreement to convey the 50 acres to each one of said parties was made on condition that said Thornton and Ellis fail for any unavoidable cause to perform the conditions thereof; that the failure to perform and keep the provisions of said deed and contract was not unavoidable, but was willful and without excuse in law or fact; that the land is valuable for farming purposes, and is supposed to possess oil under the same, and is worth $35 to $50 per acre; that said deeds to Thornton and Ellis Fluharty and from Ellis to said Arnett and Powell were clouds on the title to said land, and that plaintiffs had a right to come into a court of equity to have the same removed, and that they were remediless in the premises save in a court of equity; and prayed that said deeds from William Fluharty and wife to Thornton and Ellis Fluharty and said agreement between the same parties be declared null and void and wholly set aside and annulled, and that said deed from said Ellis Fluharty to U. N. Arnett, Jr., and said Powell be also set aside and annulled, and the land be decreed to belong jointly to the several heirs at law of the said William Fluharty, subject to the dower interest of said Meletha A. Fluharty therein, and for general relief. The deeds and contract referred to were filed as exhibits with the bill. The defendants Thornton Fluharty and U. N. Arnett, Jr., and Charles Powell demurred to plaintiffs' bill, which demurrer was sustained, "and the plaintiffs not desiring to amend their bill it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that plaintiffs' bill be, and is hereby, dismissed," and further decreed for costs against plaintiffs, from which decree plaintiffs appealed.

Plaintiffs say that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the plaintiffs' bill and dismissing the same, and in holding that if a cause of action existed and accrued to petitioners' ancestor, William Fluharty, in his lifetime, the same did not survive his death so as to give the heirs at law the right to sue.

The only question here for consideration is whether or not the demurrer was properly sustained. The plaintiffs and appellants have filed no brief in the cause. Appellees have filed a brief, and have argued pretty elaborately in support of the decree upon the theory that the bill is one for the removal of cloud upon the title, and cite many authorities to show that one out of possession cannot maintain a bill in chancery to remove a cloud from his title against a claimant who may be in possession of the land. The bill does allege that the deed of William Fluharty and wife to Thornton and Ellis Fluharty, and the deed from Ellis to the defendants Arnett and Powell, are clouds upon the title to the said land, and that the plaintiffs have a right to come into a court of equity to have the same removed. This will be regarded as surplusage. As it casts a shadow upon the title which a cancellation of the deeds would clear away, in that sense it would be the removal of a cloud from the title; but, strictly speaking, a bill to remove cloud from title of one in possession only refers to an adverse title, and not title derived from the same source.

The prayer of the bill is for the cancellation and declaring null and void the agreement and the deeds mentioned. It is contended by appellees that this was a cause of action personal to William Fluharty, and did not survive to his heirs. Here is an estate vested on condition to be divested on failure of vendees to comply with the conditions, and the bill alleges failure in every particular on the part of the vendees. 2 Washburn on Real Property (6th Ed.) § 940, says: "The doctrine of estates upon condition seems to have been originally derived from the feudal law, and grew out of the conditions upon which fiefs were granted. If the tenant neglected to pay or perform his services, the lord might resume his fief. It is upon this ground that conditions are held to be reserved to the grantor or his heirs only, and he and they alone can avail of the right of resuming the estate for a breach. And the grantor's remedy for such breach is by a resumption of the estate granted." And section 75, 1 Tiffany on the Modern Law of Real Property: "The right to take advantage of a condition subsequent belongs, at common law, exclusively to the grantor or lessor and his heirs, and he cannot reserve such right to others, even by express stipulation." And in note 544 to said section it is said: "The heir of the grantor is entitled to avail himself of the benefit of the condition, though he is not specially named in the reservation thereof"—citing Bowen v. Bowen, 18 Conn. 535; Jackson v. Toppling, 1 Wend. 388, 19 Am. Dec. 515. In the last-mentioned case (Syl., point 1) it is held: "Where a deed is made by a father to his son in consideration of a covenant on the part of the grantee to maintain the grantor and pay his debts on condition that if he fails to do so the grantor shall have a right of re-entry, the grantee may insist upon having the justice of an alleged debt of the grantor established before paying it; but if he refuses to pay after it has been established by a board of arbitrators there is a breach of the covenant and condition in the deed." And it is further held in the syllabus of said case: "Where the grantee has conveyed the premises to another, an action to enforce the forfeiture may be brought against the latter, who merely represents his grantor." And further: "Grantor's heir may avail himself of such covenant upon breach thereof, after his ancestor's death, though he be not expressly named." See, also, Co. Litt. 201a, Butler's note 89. So that it appears clear that either the grantor or his heirs could cancel the deed for failure to execute the conditions. After the grantor had brought suit to cancel the deed for a failure to comply with the conditions, he could not be defeated on the ground that it was a suit to remove cloud from his title. While it is a fact plaintiffs are out of possession, they cannot bring their action of ejectment because their possession is deferred by the life estate; but they may at any time bring their suit to cancel the deeds for failure of grantees to comply with the conditions of their grant. Wilfong v. Johnson, 41 W. Va. 283, 23 S. E. 730, was a case where a sister conveyed a tract of land to her brother, who agreed, by accepting the deed, to support their aged father and mother during their natural lives, and that he would bind himself thereto by a written contract after the conveyance should be made. The brother having failed to perform the conditions, the sister brought suit. It was held (Syl., point 2): "The brother, having accepted the conveyance, and having been put in possession of the land, failed and refused to support his father and mother, but made haste to sell and convey the land, and thereby to render any enforcement of his undertaking ineffectual. Held a sufficient ground to rescind the contract and set aside the deed." In Goldsmith v. Goldsmith, 46 W. Va. 426, 33 S. E. 286 (Syl., point 2), it is held: "A deed made in consideration of maintenance, where there has been a failure to furnish maintenance, will be set aside, more especially where it has a clause of forfeiture for such failure." Also, equity entertained jurisdiction for the purpose of setting aside a similar deed in the case of Farnsworth v. Noffsinger, 46 W. Va. 410, 33 S. E. 246; and Pownal v. Taylor, 10 Leigh, 172, 34 Am. Dec. 725, was a case in which the owner of a tract of land conveyed the same to his nephew in fee subject to the maintenance and support of the grantor and his sister. The deed contained a covenant by the grantee for such maintenance and support, and that the land was to be bound therefor into whose hands soever it might come; but the deed did not state that it was upon condition that such maintenance and support be furnished, nor was there any clause providing for a re-entry by the grantor. It was held: "The provision for maintenance and support constitutes merely a charge upon the estate which may be enforced in equity, not a condition for breach of which the grantor can re-enter as of his former legal estate"—clearly indicating that, had there been a condition for such maintenance and support, the grantor would have been entitled to a rescission and re-entry. And in Lowman v. Crawford, 99 Va. 688, 40 S. E. 17, it is held: "If the consideration of a conveyance be the care and support of the grantor for life, the covenant to support and maintain creates a continuing obligation on the part of the grantee, for the breach of which the remedy at law is not complete and adequate. Equity has jurisdiction to annul and set aside the conveyance, and to put the parties in the position they occupied before the conveyance. In the case in judgment, the conveyance was not upon a condition subsequent, and there was no clause of re-entry, but it was made in consideration of care and support, and the evidence justified the setting aside of the deed, and the reinstatement of the parties to their former position." This was a case in which there was no condition subsequent contained in the conveyance, nor provision for re-entry of the grantor on failure of grantee to perform; yet the court took jurisdiction in equity to render to the grantor relief which he could not have in a court of law. In the case at bar there is a provision that on failure of the grantees to comply with the conditions the deed of conveyance shall be null and void, and the land revert back to the grantors with full possession.

The demurrer should have been overruled. It follows that the decree of the court sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill must be set aside and annulled, and the cause remanded for further proceedings to be had therein.

ZINN v. ZINN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 16, 1903.)

OIL LEASES—ADVERSE CLAIMS TO LAND—ROYALTIES—CONVEYANCE OF TITLE—QUIETING TITLE—EQUITY—JURISDICTION.

1. If two adverse claimants thereto make independent leases to the same company for the oil and gas under a certain tract of land in consideration of oil royalties and gas rentals reserved in each of such leases, the subsequent lessor cannot sue the prior lessor in equity to recover from him the royalties and rentals received by him under his lease.

2. A claimant out of possession cannot convey his title to the holder of the adverse title in possession, and then sue the grantor of such adverse title in equity to cancel the title papers of such adverse title as a cloud on the title which he has conveyed to the holder of such adverse title.

3. Allegations of irreparable damages, which show on their face that they are mere pretexts, will not sustain a bill in equity.

Poffenbarger, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ritchie County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Bill by M. G. Zinn against G. P. Zinn and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant Zinn appeals. Reversed.

Davis & Son and G. W. Farr, for appellant. Roberts & Carter and Sherman Robinson, for appellee.

DENT, J. Granville P. Zinn appeals from a final decree of the circuit court of Ritchie county rendered on the 28th day of February, 1901, in a chancery suit therein pending, instituted by M. G. Zinn against him and others for the purpose of determining the title to one-eighth royalty in a certain tract of land, of which appellant was seised and possessed in fee simple. The suit resulted in favor of the plaintiff. Appellant assigns numerous errors. The first in importance is the overruling of the demurrer to the bill for want of equity.

The bill alleges, in substance, that Thomas P. Zinn, being the owner of a certain 24, more or less, acre tract of land, on the 21st day of March, 1896, conveyed to Preston G. Zinn the oil and gas underlying the same, by deed duly acknowledged, but not admitted to record until the 10th day of August, 1899; that on the 1st day of August, 1896, Thomas P. Zinn conveyed to the appellant the same tract of land, without reservation of the oil and gas, by deed duly acknowledged and admitted to record on the 29th day of August, 1896; that on the 21st day of November, 1898, Granville P. Zinn, appellant, leased said land for oil and gas purposes to the Carter Oil Company, by lease duly recorded; "that afterwards, to wit, on the 8th day of November, 1899, the said Preston G. Zinn ratified and confirmed said lease for said premises for oil and gas purposes to the Carter Oil Company by an instrument in writing duly executed and acknowledged, and filed for record in the office of the clerk of the county court of Ritchie county;" that the Carter Oil Company, in pursuance of its said lease (thereby meaning the lease from appellant, then in possession of said land), began operations for oil and gas, and in August, 1900, obtained a well producing 150 barrels per day; that appellant at the time of his deed had notice of Preston G. Zinn's unrecorded deed for the oil and gas, and that he took a conveyance of the whole land without reservation with intent to deprive Preston G. Zinn of his rights to the oil and gas; that, since oil had been obtained, the appellant had been receiving the one-eighth thereof wrongfully from the Eureka Pipe Line Company, selling the same and appropriating it to his own uses, and has refused the same to plaintiff, although demanded by him by virtue of a deed therefor made to him by Preston G. Zinn on the 13th day of June, 1900; that appellant's deed is a cloud on plaintiff's title to such royalty; that other wells are about to be drilled which will produce oil in large quantities, and that plaintiff will be irreparably damaged if appellant is permitted to receive such royalties, and will be put to a multiplicity of suits to maintain his rights. He therefore prays that defendants be required to answer, that his title to the oil and gas royalties and rentals under the lease be declared paramount to the appellant's, and that the appellant be required to pay over to him the amount thereof already received, and permit plaintiff to receive the same in the future. The bill, in short, is simply a demand that appellant, by virtue of plaintiff's superior legal title, shall pay plaintiff the gas and oil royalties already received, and surrender all future claim thereto. This is a mere pecuniary demand for the rents and royalties received by the appellant, and is not maintainable under the alleged heads of equitable jurisdiction.

The title to land is not in controversy. All plaintiff received by his deed from Preston G. Zinn was an assignment of the oil royalties and gas rentals, as Preston G. Zinn had already conveyed all his interest to the oil and gas in place to the Carter Oil Company, who, having found oil and gas, were in possession thereof under and by virtue of the prior lease made by Granville P. Zinn, the adverse claimant, to them. Hence, the title to the oil and gas was completely vested in the Carter Oil Company by the adverse lease.

es. All that plaintiff has any claim to whatever is the oil royalties and gas rentals reserved in the lease of Preston G. Zinn, and all he claims by his bill is these oil royalties. This is mere pecuniary demand for the royalties already received by appellant, and is not maintainable under the alleged heads of equitable jurisdiction. As a suit to remove or cancel Granville P. Zinn's deed as a cloud on the grounds that Granville P. Zinn received his deed with notice of Preston G. Zinn's unrecorded deed, it cannot be maintained, for the reason that plaintiff has not now nor ever had any title to land, and is not now nor ever was in possession of such land. Christian v. Vance, 41 W. Va. 754, 24 S. E. 596; Moore v. McNutt, 41 W. Va. 695, 24 S. E. 682.

A bill in equity does not lie to remove a cloud on or settle the title to personal property, unless it is of peculiar value or under peculiar circumstances. Zanhizer v. Hefner, 47 W. Va. 418, 35 S. E. 4; White v. Stender, 24 W. Va. 615, 49 Am. Rep. 283; Baker v. Rinehard, 11 W. Va. 238. Appellant might have been held as trustee of the legal title for the benefit of the plaintiff had the plaintiff's suit been instituted before both legal and equitable title to the oil merged in the Carter Oil Company. Now the only claim that plaintiff sets up against appellant is, not the wrongful withholding of the legal title, but the wrongful withholding of the oil royalties, for which damages at law furnish a full compensation. One suit at law will settle the right to the rents and royalties as between appellant and plaintiff, and the question of multiplicity of suits is not involved, and, if it were, the right should be first determined at law. Hogg's Equity Principles, § 350. There is no question of irreparable damage or waste involved, as Preston G. Zinn, by his lease to the Carter Oil Company, Granville P. Zinn's lessee, then in possession, sanctioned his right to remove the oil and gas and agreed to receive a rental therefor. The case of Bettman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 433, 26 S. E. 271, 36 L. R. A. 566, is not applicable. In that case the right to remove the oil and gas was involved, as producing irreparable damage to real estate. Eakin v. Hawkins, 48 W. Va. 364, 37 S. E. 622, was a suit between those claiming a co-tenancy in the oil and gas production, and the question here involved was not raised. In the cases of Moore v. Jennings, 47 W. Va. 181, 34 S. E. 793, Eclipse Oil Co. v. South Penn Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 84, 34 S. E. 923, and Trees v. Eclipse Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 107, 34 S. E. 933, the question of the wrongful extraction of the oil was involved, and the last case was founded on the doctrine of co-tenancy.

In the present case the plaintiff does not dispute the right of the Carter Oil Company to produce the oil and gas, and he is not trying to stop such production, but he is only claiming that after it is produced he is entitled to the royalty reserved by Granville P. Zinn, the appellant, on his lease. There is no attempt to stay waste or prevent irreparable damage to real estate. Nor does the bill show that an equitable accounting is necessary. The lease under which the plaintiff claims the right of royalty, being from Preston G. Zinn to the Carter Oil Company, provides that the royalty oil shall be delivered in the pipe line to the credit of the lessor. The bill alleges that the Carter Oil Company has delivered such royalty into the possession of the Eureka Pipe Line Company in accordance with the above provision, and the Eureka Pipe Line Company has accounted for it to the appellant by virtue of the appellant's lease to the Carter Oil Company. The plaintiff's assignor agreed that the royalty might go into the possession of the pipe line, and to receive it from that company according to account thereof. He nowhere claims that such account has not been properly kept and rendered. He does not claim that he ever demanded his royalty either from the Eureka Pipe Line Company or the Carter Oil Company. Therefore, he has set up no grounds whatever for an accounting between himself and the Carter Oil Company or the Eureka Pipe Line Company. Swearingen v. Steers, 49 W. Va. 312, 38 S. E. 510. All the plaintiff seeks is that the appellant shall pay to him the royalties received by appellant from the Eureka Pipe Line Company, the amount of which is easily ascertainable from the latter company. All the equitable grounds alleged are mere pretexts for the purpose of foisting on equity a jurisdiction it does not possess. If plaintiff wants the oil in kind, and it can be identified, detinue will furnish him an ample remedy. Hall v. Reed, 15 B. Mon. 479. He argued that the oil should go into the pipe line, and therefore he cannot complain if it is not separated in kind so that detinue will lie. If he establishes his right, the pipe line holds it for him according to his agreement. If he wants to sue for a wrongful conversion, trover is his proper remedy. If he wants only the value thereof in money, assumpsit will give him relief. The Carter Oil Company, knowing of the existence of these two titles to the oil in place, had the right to reject the one and purchase the other, or had the right to avoid litigation and delay to purchase both, and, from the exhibits filed, this is what it did do. 6 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 711. By so doing, unless some arrangement exists not disclosed by the record, it agreed to pay two separate royalties, one to each of the adverse claimants. The bill alleges that Preston G. Zinn "ratified and confirmed said lease for said premises for oil and gas purposes to the Carter Oil Company by an instrument in writing duly executed and acknowledged, and filed for record in the office of the clerk of the county court of Ritchie county, a duly certified copy of which is herewith filed, marked 'Exhibit D,' and made a part of this bill of complaint." An examination of the exhibit filed shows it to be a straight lease from Preston G. Zinn to the Carter Oil Company, reserving royalty, and makes no reference whatever to the Granville P. Zinn lease. The allegation of the bill, therefore, must mean that the legal effect of the last lease obtained by it was to ratify and confirm in the Carter Oil Company the title already held by it under the first lease. The reservation of the royalties in the two leases are separate and distinct, and there is nothing on the face of the leases to show that they were one and the same, nor does the bill contain such allegation. Hence the bill and exhibits show a double reservation of royalties, being a separate reservation to each of the lessors. Such being the case, one lessor cannot sue the other for the separate royalty received by him, for he is entitled to receive it by his separate lease, and there is no privity of contract between them. The Carter Oil Company having purchased both titles, the plaintiff, having passed everything but the royalty, has no right to sue appellant in equity for his royalty on the ground that appellant's title conveyed to the Carter Oil Company is bad. If the Carter Oil Company, which owns the title, is satisfied, no one else has the right to complain. Nor does it have the right to buy up adverse titles at will without ouster and recourse therefor on appellant. Jones v. Richmond, 88 Va. 231, 13 S. E. 414; Marbury v. Thornton, 82 Va. 702, 1 S. E. 909.

All remedies touching the oil in place as real estate as between the original claimants are extinguished by the merger of the adverse titles thereto in the Carter Oil Company. The remedies for the oil royalties and rents of both plaintiff and appellant are governed and controlled by their respective leases, and for breaches thereof they should look to the Carter Oil Company, and not to each other, unless the appellant has been guilty of an unlawful conversion of the plaintiff's royalties. The remedy in such case would be at law, and not in equity. Whether the Carter Oil Company can plead failure of consideration, etc., as to either lease, under section 5, c. 126, Code 1899, it is improper to consider at this time, as neither the facts nor the proper parties are properly impleaded before the court. In the case of Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 164, the court held that a temporary injunction might issue to preserve real estate intact until the title thereto could be settled at law. But it did not hold that an injunction was necessary to prevent the delivery of oil lawfully extracted to a solvent claimant thereof until the rightful ownership thereof could be investigated. Injunction in such case is wholly unnecessary, and might be productive of much greater harm than good. If the receiver of the oil is solvent, a suit at law will furnish ample remedy and protection: If insolvent, notice to the Pipe Line Company or an action of detinue would prevent its delivery if it can be had in kind. Plaintiff does not ask this. In the present case the bill does not question the solvency of the appellant. If the plaintiff has a good claim for these royalties either against the appellant, the Eureka Pipe Line Company, or the Carter Oil Company, his legal remedies are adequate and complete. The bill is based on mere equitable pretext, void of foundation in fact. Hale v. White, 47 W. Va. 700, 35 S. E. 884; Greathouse v. Greathouse, 46 W. Va. 21, 32 S. E. 904.

The decree complained of is reversed, and the demurrer for want of equity is sustained, and the bill is dismissed without prejudice to the plaintiff's right to maintain any proper suit he may be advised to bring.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting). The bill does not contest the right of the Carter Oil Company to develop the land and take the oil and gas therefrom. The assignor of the plaintiff, by his lease, authorized this. The defendant Granville P. Zinn, the appellant here, also executed a lease granting the same right. No question of the right to the possession of the land is presented. The bill does not seek to enjoin trespass to real estate. The plaintiff shows that the royalties had been paid and are paid to Granville P. Zinn, and that he ought not to receive them because they belong to the plaintiff. It is useless to inquire or determine whether there is any liability for additional royalty on the part of the oil company, for none is claimed in the bill. It shows that the oil company is taking all the oil except the one-eighth, and its right to do so is not questioned. So the controversy is between M. G. Zinn and Granville P. Zinn, and the subject of that controversy is the royalty oil. These two parties are adverse claimants of that one-eighth. M. G. Zinn claims it under the deed executed by Thomas P. Zinn to Preston G. Zinn, bearing date March 21, 1896, conveying to Preston G. Zinn only the oil and gas under the land. Granville P. Zinn claims it under the deed executed by Thomas P. Zinn to him August 1, 1896, conveying the tract of land with covenant of general warranty to Granville P. Zinn, and without any exception or reservation of the oil and gas under it. Preston G. Zinn failed to record his deed. Granville P. Zinn claims to have had no notice of the deed made to Preston G. Zinn. M. G. Zinn, by an assignment and transfer from Preston G. Zinn, dated June 15, 1900, has acquired whatever right Preston G. Zinn had to royalty, and he insists that his title to the royalty is superior to that of Granville P. Zinn because the latter had notice of the deed executed by Thomas P. Zinn to Preston G. Zinn.

If M. G. Zinn has an adequate remedy at law, then there is no jurisdiction in equity. His bill shows that he has demanded this royalty from Granville P. Zinn, and that the latter has ignored his demand, denied that he had any title to it, taken the oil, and converted it to his own use. If the plaintiff can show that the royalty belongs to him, and not to Granville P. Zinn, he can undoubtedly recover in an action at law. Its value is certainly ascertainable, and would be the measure of damages. "Trover, at common law, was an action on the case, whereby the owner of personal property recovered damages against a person who committed the wrong of conversion with respect to that property." 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 712. "The fact that the plaintiff might have brought his action ex contractu does not prevent him from suing in trover for a conversion." Id. 724. "Where the defendant has sold or otherwise disposed of the property, the plaintiff may waive the conversion and sue in assumpsit." Id. 792. Assumpsit lies to recover money received by the defendant tortiously, or under duress of the person or goods; to recover the fees of an office usurped by another; to recover the value of goods which the defendant by fraud induced the plaintiff to sell to an insolvent person, and afterwards obtained them for his own benefit; and to recover back rents tortiously received. Hogg's Pl. & Forms, 39. In such cases, the plaintiff waives the tort and sues for the value of his property.

But it occurs to me that the remedies by action at law for damages are inadequate. In order to assert it, the plaintiff must give up his property. He has a right to the specific property itself or a share in the property to be set apart to him in kind, and ought to have a remedy by which he can obtain the property instead of its mere value as damages. In the case of rent or an annuity, the thing to which the claimant has the right is money, and one kind of money is as good as another if it be of the same value. Hence, as long as he has a remedy to obtain the money, that being the only thing in question, his remedy is adequate. But here the bill demands a share of the oil, not only that which has already been produced and remains unsold, but also of that to be produced hereafter. The law clearly affords him no remedy whatever for that. He cannot sue in detinue so as to test the right of property for two reasons: First, because he is not entitled to the whole of the oil in question and cannot sue for the whole of it. Assuming that he has title to the one-eighth, the Carter Oil Company has title to the other seven-eighths. Treating them merely as co-tenants, each would be entitled to the possession, and one could not maintain a possessory action against the other. Second, the plaintiff being entitled to only a share in the oil, he can no more identify any particular oil which belongs to him than he could identify his 100 bushels of wheat after it had been poured into an elevator and mixed up with 1,000 bushels of some other person's wheat. Under such circumstances, an action of detinue would not lie, and the right to possession of the property could not be asserted. The only right he has is to demand a share of the oil. In other words, he is entitled to partition of personal property as to the oil produced, and of an incorporeal hereditament or right as to the oil remaining in the land and undeveloped. Both of these are subjects of partition, and partition of them can be had only in a court of equity. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1160; Smith v. Smith, 4 Rand. 95, 102. Brook, P., said in Smith v. Smith: "Supposing it to be a legal, and not an equitable, interest; no partition between tenants in common of personal estate could be made at law. A partition in kind could not be made there, each party having equal right to the possession of the whole. Whether the title was legal or equitable, therefore, in this case, a court of equity was the proper tribunal for a partition of it." Treating of concurrent equity jurisdiction where the remedy at law is inadequate, Pomeroy says, at section 185: "In the same class must be placed suits which are maintainable, under some special circumstances, for the partition of chattels, and analogous to those for the partition of land." Here it may be objected that equity has not jurisdiction because the plaintiff, who seeks to be admitted to a share in the oil, claims adversely to one of the defendants, and the only controversy is that between them over the share in the oil. Ordinarily, courts of equity, in partition suits, will not determine adverse titles, but, where the subject of partition is personal property, this rule does not apply. The obvious reason is that, as has been shown, there is no legal action or remedy by which the right of property can be determined. Under this head, Freeman on Co-Ten. & Par., at section 426, says: "This class embraced all those cases in which the plaintiff's title to the property was denied by the defendant. When real estate was the subject of partition in chancery, and the plaintiff's title was put in issue, he was required to establish it at law. But there was no method by which a co-tenant of personalty could litigate his title with another co-tenant. Therefore, when, in a partition in chancery, the defendant denied the title of demandant to personal property, and claimed such property in severalty, the demandant was not sent to law to establish his title. He was not required to attempt an impossibility."

Equity, having jurisdiction for partition, may decide all questions, even those of legal title, the determination of which is necessary as incident to the granting of the relief to which the plaintiff shows himself entitled

SECOND NAT. BANK OF MORGANTOWN
v. RALPHSNYDER et al.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1903.)JUDGMENT—CORRECTION—WRIT OF ERROR—ACTION ON NOTE—DECLARATION—ANSWER —CONTINUANCE—SURPRISE.

1. A judgment, rendered after a demurrer has been filed by the defendant and overruled, is not one by default, and a motion to correct for judicial error, made after the close of the term at which the judgment was rendered, is properly overruled.

2. Though such motion cannot be entertained, a writ of error to the judgment may be allowed.

3. In declaring upon a written instrument, it is sufficient to set forth the promise or obligation according to its legal effect.

4. When, upon the amendment of a declaration at bar, the defendant is allowed four days, on his own motion, in which to plead, he cannot complain of the brevity of the time allowed, especially if in fact about twenty months thereafter elapsed before judgment was rendered against him.

5. Where a defendant, after the overruling of his demurrer, has failed for such length of time to plead, had two continuances, and merely procures the filing of affidavits showing illness and necessary absence, without pleading or in any way disclosing a defense, and without making a formal motion for a continuance, there is no error in failing to continue the case and rendering judgment.

6. Applications for continuances are addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and a judgment will not be reversed for the refusal of a continuance when it appears that the defendant has unreasonably delayed the disclosure of any defense, and sets up none at the time of the motion, and the facts and circumstances are such as may have satisfied the court that he is merely seeking delay.

7. Surprise grounded upon accident, mistake, or violation of agreement, not brought to the attention of the trial court before the adjournment of the term at which a judgment, after an appearance, was rendered, cannot be relied upon or noticed in the appellate court.

Error to Circuit Court, Monongalia County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Action by the Second National Bank of Morgantown against Alpha Ralphsnyder and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

C. M. Ralphsnyder and T. N. Parks, for plaintiffs in error. Cox & Baker, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. On the 30th day of April, 1900, the Second National Bank of Morgantown instituted an action of debt in the circuit court of Monongalia county against Alpha Ralphsnyder, George M. Ralphsnyder, I. C. Ralphsnyder, W. M. Ralphsnyder, and N. B. Cox for the recovery of the sum of $625 upon the joint and several promissory note executed to said bank by the said defendants, bearing date September 16, 1899, and payable in 180 days from the date thereof. At the next rules the declaration was filed and the common order entered, and at June rules the defendants, by counsel, appeared and filed a demurrer to the declaration. On the 16th day of June, 1900, the plaintiff, as well as the defendants, appeared in court, and there was a joinder in the demurrer to the declaration, and each count thereof. Then, on motion of the plaintiff, the declaration was amended at bar by the insertion of the word "note," which had been inadvertently omitted from one clause of the declaration. Thereupon the demurrer was renewed, and the court overruled it. Then, on motion of the defendants, leave was granted them until the following Wednesday in which to plead. The next order was made on June 24, 1901, showing merely a continuance by consent. On the 11th day of October, 1901, the case was again continued on the application of the defendants, and at their costs. On the 20th day of February, 1902, a judgment was rendered for the sum of $698.87. Prior to the rendition of the judgment, however, the affidavits of Mack Roby, I. C. Ralphsnyder, and George M. Ralphsnyder, purporting to show grounds for continuance, were filed; and the order so shows, but it does not show any motion for the continuance. Nor does it show an appearance or the filing of any plea at that time. No plea was ever filed at any time. The order giving judgment recites that "the defendants, being solemnly called, came not, to require a jury; and, the plaintiff requiring none, the plaintiff proved its case in open court." Nothing further was done at that term. On the 6th day of May following, an execution was issued, and on the 3d day of June, 1902, an order was made in vacation staying the execution for the hearing of a motion to quash it. On the 14th day of June, 1902, the motion was heard and overruled, and on the 16th day of the same month a motion was made to set aside the judgment and grant a new trial, for several reasons set forth in the notice. The motion was supported by several affidavits setting forth alleged grounds of defense to the action, but on the 20th day of the same month the motion was overruled. To the rulings of the court on the motion to set aside the judgment, exceptions were taken, and duly embodied in bills of exception, which were made part of the record; and on the 16th day of July, 1902, a writ of error was awarded by a judge of this court.

The motion to set aside the judgment and grant a new trial, made long after the close of the term at which the judgment was rendered, was properly overruled. That judgment was not one by default, in which a judicial error might be corrected upon motion, under section 5 of chapter 134 of the Code of 1899, as there had been an appearance by all the defendants. A judgment in a case in which there has been an appearance is not a judgment by default. Holliday v. Myers, 11 W. Va. 276; Carlson's Adm'r v. Ruffner, 12 W. Va. 297; Smith v. Knight, 14 W. Va. 749; Compton v. Cline, 5 Grat. 137; Richard- son v. Jones, 12 Grat. 53; Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Grat. 107; Stringer v. Anderson, 23 W. Va. 482. In Holliday v. Myers, supra, the defendants appeared and pleaded to the action, and then voluntarily withdrew their plea, and suffered plaintiffs to prove their cause of action. Their mere appearance was held sufficient to make the judgment one rendered upon proof of the cause of action, and not a judgment either by default or by confession, within the meaning of the statute. This view of the judgment in this case is strengthened by the recital in the order that the plaintiff proved its case in open court. If not strictly within the definition of a judgment of nil dicit, it very closely resembles such a judgment, which is defined to be one rendered against a defendant who fails to put in a plea or answer to plaintiff's declaration by the day assigned. Bouv. L. Dict.; Black on Judg. § 79; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 541; Stewart v. Goode, 29 Ala. 476. In Storey v. Nichols, 22 Tex. 87, the court said: "A judgment by nil dicit is held by this court to possess a stronger implication in favor of the plaintiff's claim than an ordinary judgment by default. It is regarded as partaking of the nature of a judgment by confession as well as by default." Under our decisions, it would hardly be regarded as a judgment by confession. A judgment by default it could not be, because of the appearance. It is probably more than a judgment by nil dicit, because it is a judgment upon proof, as well as upon the failure of the defendants to say anything against the entry of the judgment. At any rate, it is a final judgment. In chancery causes the rule is different. After the overruling of a demurrer, and expiration of a rule to answer, a decree entered is appealable only as to matters settled by the demurrer, and is by confession as to errors committed in respect to matters subsequent to the demurrer. Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533. This rule does not apply to actions at law. "The language of the statute in regard to equity cases is essentially different from that in reference to actions at law. Any appearance of the defendant in the latter case prevents the judgment from being by default." Steenrod v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 133, 137; McGraw v. Roller, 53 W. Va. 75, 44 S. E. 248.

Such being the character of the judgment, a long line of decisions hold that, after the adjournment of the term at which it was rendered, the court has no power or authority to disturb, alter, or set it aside, except to a very limited extent authorized by the statute. Green v. Railway, 11 W. Va. 686; Ruhl v. Ruhl, 24 W. Va. 279; Crim v. Davisson, 6 W. Va. 465; Hall v. Bank, 15 W. Va. 328; Morgan v. Railway Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. 588; 1 Freeman on Judg. § 696; 7 Rob. Pr. (New) 127. Section 1 of chapter 134 of the Code of 1899 provides that, on motion after reasonable notice, the court or the judge in vacation may reverse or correct a judgment or decree for any clerical error or error in fact for which the judgment or decree may be reversed or corrected on writ of error coram nobis. Certain corrections of clerical mistakes may also be made under section 5 of the same chapter. But the error complained of here, if any, is one of law, not of fact, and is judicial, not clerical, as appears from the grounds for the motion as set forth in the notice, namely, that there was a just defense to the action, as shown by the affidavit filed at the time judgment was rendered; that, upon the affidavits filed, a continuance should have been allowed; that the judgment is for more than the defendants owe; that the court allowed interest after tender of the amount due; that the note was not due at the time suit was brought; that defendants' counsel, a nonresident attorney, had no notice of the bar meeting at which it had been determined to set the case for trial; and that the judgment was a surprise. At the time the judgment was rendered there was no plea denying the amount called for by the note, or any part of it, nor setting up any tender, nor showing any reason why the amount was not due, as by the terms of the note itself it appeared to be. The note bearing date September 16, 1899, was payable 180 days after date, and the suit was brought more than 7 months after the date of the note. The whole case made upon this notice is, in substance, a complaint against the action of the court in refusing a continuance. Whether, upon the showing made, the defendants were entitled to a continuance, was a question of law; and if, in disposing of it, the court erred, that error having been carried into a final judgment, not upon default, and, the term having closed, the motion to set aside or reverse for that error came too late.

If, however, the court erred in that respect, or in overruling the demurrer, relief may now be had upon the writ of error, disregarding all the proceedings in the court below upon the motion for a new trial. Ordinarily, where there is a judgment by default or after trial by jury, proceedings for error will not be entertained by this court until after a motion has been made in the court below to set the judgment aside, and there can be no good reason why the same rule should not apply in the case of a judgment such as we have here. Of course, the rule, if so applied, would cut off proceedings for error in such cases. But why should a writ of error be entertained in such case? Having come into court and demurred, the defendant refuses to do more. He refuses to plead or make any defense, and allows judgment to go without even so much as a motion made in proper time to set it aside. Why should not such negligence or obstinacy justly preclude him from further consideration by the court? But the rule seems to be that, if error be committed in passing upon the pleadings and other matters substantially distinct from the trial itself, a writ of error may be maintained notwithstanding no motion has been made in the trial court to set aside the judgment. Thus in State v. Thompson, 26 W. Va. 149, while the failure of the state to object to the overruling of its motion for a new trial prevented a reversal of the judgment for error committed in the trial, the court passed upon the motion to quash the indictment. In Proudfoot v. Clevenger, 33 W. Va. 287, 10 S. E. 394, a writ of error to a judgment rendered upon a demurrer to evidence was entertained, although no motion to set aside the judgment had been made in the trial court. Here the errors complained of relate to the sufficiency of the declaration and the propriety of the action of the court in refusing a continuance, and not to rulings made during the course of the trial. They are such, therefore, as may be considered in the present state of the case.

All that is urged against the declaration on demurrer is that it alleges that "the defendants, and each of them," promised to pay, etc., while the note reads, "We or either of us jointly and severally promise," etc., and the omission of the formal words, "For this, to wit, that heretofore," usually found in the declaration. It is sufficient to set forth the instrument sued upon according to its legal effect. 1 Chit. on Pl. 305, 367. This is a joint and several note, and therefore binds the defendants, and each of them, and that is the exact language in which the promise is alleged. This criticism of the declaration is therefore wholly groundless. It is useless to inquire as to whether the omission of the words, "For this, to wit, that heretofore," in the first count, renders the declaration bad, because, in the second count, which is sufficient, these words are inserted. For these reasons, the demurrer was properly overruled.

The next complaint is that only four days were allowed the defendants in which to plead. Of this they cannot complain, for the simple reason that it was granted upon their own motion, as shown by the order; and, if error was thereby committed, it was induced by the defendants themselves. A party will not be heard to complain of an error which he has invited or induced by his own conduct. 3 Cyc. 242. If this were not a sufficient answer, it could be further said that the plaintiffs in error have not been prejudiced by the shortness of the time allowed by the order, for they had from the date of that order, June 16, 1900, until the 20th day of February, 1902, a period of one year and eight months, in which they could have filed their plea, if they had desired to do so. About one year after the overruling of the demurrer a continuance was had by consent, from which it appears that neither the court nor the plaintiff unduly urged these defendants to trial. Nearly four months after that they obtained another continuance upon their own motion, and still no plea was filed. Under the statute, they are only entitled to one month in which to plead. Code 1899, c. 125, § 5.

In the brief it is insisted that the demurrer stands legally as if it had not been passed upon by the court, for the reason that at the time it was overruled the judge of the court was ill and not in attendance, and Hon. John W. Mason was sitting as judge in his place, and between the date of the overruling of the demurrer and the day on which the defendants were required to plead the regular judge died. Whether the orders were signed up from day to day is not stated, but it is said that the special judge had no authority to sign the records of the previous day after the death of the regular judge. None of these facts appear in the record, but, if they did, it does not follow that the demurrer is not overruled. The rendition of judgment, in legal effect, overruled the demurrer. State v. Hall, 40 W. Va. 455, 21 S. E. 760; Fleming v. Oil Co., 37 W. Va. 645, 17 S. E. 203; Hood v. Maxwell, 1 W. Va. 219.

Did the court err in refusing a continuance? The record shows no formal motion for a continuance. It discloses nothing that might be considered a request for a continuance, except the affidavits filed, in one of which the affiant George M. Ralphsnyder, attorney for the defendants, "asks the court to continue said suit until the next term of the circuit court for said Monongalia county." The letter transmitting the affidavits to Joseph Moreland simply requested him to have the case continued for the term. He was not an attorney in the case, and had no authority to file any plea or to do anything other than procure a continuance. These affidavits merely set forth the serious illness of the defendant Alpha Ralphsnyder, and the necessity for the attendance of his sons I. C. Ralphsnyder and George M. Ralphsnyder at his bedside. The only representation as to any defense is found in the affidavit of I. C. Ralphsnyder, which says on that point merely "that the defendants have a proper defense to said suit." These affidavits set forth the materiality of the testimony of the absent parties, and the impossibility of proving the same facts by any other witness; and, had they shown any effort at all on their part to prepare a defense to the action, the court below would, no doubt, have granted a continuance. But there had been long delay, and the record fails to show in any formal or legal way that they had, or claimed to have, any defense. Not only had the case stood for nearly two years without the entry of any plea, or any indication upon the record that there was any defense to the action; but the record shows that, at the time judgment was rendered, nobody appeared, for the order recites that the defendants, being solemnly called, came not. But the affidavits which had been tendered upon the preceding day were filed by the defendants. This is rather contradictory, for it is difficult to say how defendants could be both in and out of court at the same time. It probably means that the affidavits were sent to Mr. Moreland to be filed by him for the defendants, but that he had no authority to do anything else. In other words, that he had no authority to file a plea and set up any defense to the action. From the papers filed on the motion for a new trial, this appears to have been the true situation. In passing upon the motion for a continuance, the trial court, no doubt, considered the long-continued failure of the defendants to disclose any defense, as well as the absence of anybody at that time to make such disclosure, and came to the conclusion that the defendants were making no effort to prepare for trial, but, on the contrary, were seeking delay. Where the court is satisfied that a party is merely fighting off the trial, instead of preparing for it, refusal of a continuance is held to be proper. "Applications for continuances are addressed to the discretion of the court, and much must be left to the tribunal which has the parties before it; and it must determine, from a variety of circumstances occurring in its presence, whether applications for continuance are made in good faith, or are merely intended to protract the controversy, and, even when made in good faith, a reasonable degree of diligence should be exacted." Flott v. Commonwealth, 12 Grat. 578. "Where the circumstances satisfy the court that the real purpose in moving for a continuance is to delay or evade a trial, and not to prepare for it, then, though the witnesses have been summoned, and the party has sworn to their materiality, and that he cannot safely go to trial without them, the continuance should be refused." Hewitt v. Commonwealth, 17 Grat. 827. To the same effect, see Mendum v. Commonwealth, 6 Rand. 704; Harris v. Harris, 2 Leigh, 584; Marmet Co. v. Archibald, 37 W. Va. 778, 17 S. E. 299. That the failure of the defendants did not consist of mere want of diligence in procuring the attendance of witnesses is not overlooked. The persons whose absence was necessitated by the illness of Alpha Ralphsnyder were defendants. Being parties, there was no necessity for process to bring them into court as witnesses. The summons commencing the action brought them in for all purposes, and the affidavits may have sufficiently accounted for their absence. Nevertheless the defendants were in default. They had failed to put upon the record as evidence of their good faith that they had any defense to the action, and had persisted in withholding their defense to a point which justified a conclusion on the part of the court that they had no defense, and were merely resorting to pretexts and subterfuges to prevent the entry of judgment against them. In Logie v. Black, 24 W. Va. 2, 21, Judge Green says: "It may be regarded as settled law in Virginia and in this state that where a party has obtained one or more continuances at prior terms of the court, and the court, in the exercise of its discretion, refuses to again continue his case, even when he has apparently brought himself within the general rule which ordinarily entitles a party to a continuance, the appellate court will not reverse such case because of the refusal of the circuit court to grant such continuance, unless the party complaining makes out a very strong case, and the appellate court sees that the party has suffered from an abuse by the circuit court of its legal discretion. Some appellate courts have gone farther than ours and have held that they would not review the exercise of such discretion by the inferior court, whose opportunities of exercising its discretion in such case must greatly exceed that of the appellate court. We have, however, determined that the exercise of such discretion is reviewable, but under such circumstances the leaning of the court will be strong to support the action of the circuit court." Under the circumstances, it cannot be said that the circuit court has abused the discretion vested in it concerning continuances. If, upon the application of parties who have been so long in default and so grossly negligent of their interests, and apparently so unwilling to assert their defense and come to an issue, an appellate court will reverse a judgment founded upon such negligence and apparent obstinacy, the trial courts will be compelled in the future to proceed with great caution in forcing unwilling litigants to submit their cases.

Apprehending and forestalling the possible assumption on the part of counsel of the oversight by the court of the representation contained in the affidavits filed on the motion for a new trial concerning an alleged pending compromise as the reason for the failure to file a plea, it is noted here that no pending compromise or any other matter by way of excuse for failure to file the plea was brought to the attention of the court at the time it refused the continuance. On the ground of surprise, the pendency of a compromise might have been urged even at that late day as ground for continuance, but it was not; and it was too late after the adjournment of the term to make it available for a continuance or the setting aside of the judgment, and it cannot be urged here, for the reason that, in order to be available here, it must have been in the record at the time the court below took the action complained of, so as to make that action erroneous. This court cannot grant relief upon matter sought to be introduced into the record long after the judgment had been rendered, and the record of the cause in the court below had been so thoroughly completed and made final that it could not there be altered. This court has no original jurisdiction of bills in equity for relief against judgments on the ground of surprise, accident, or mistake. If a compromise was pending, it was known to the defendants, and they were bound to bring it to the attention of the court in order to make it available. In the same connection, it is urged that, by reason of the ignorance of the attorney for the defendants of the bar meeting at which the case was set for hearing, defendants were surprised and misled. No such claim was made in either of the three affidavits filed in support of the alleged motion for a continuance, nor even now are the rules presented in violation of which it is said the case was set for hearing. Clearly, there is nothing in these contentions.

The action of the court in overruling the motion to quash the execution was excepted to, and assigned as a ground of error in the petition for the writ of error; but nothing is said on that subject in the brief, from which it may be inferred that these assignments have been abandoned. However, nothing indicating any error in this connection appears in the record. The execution is dated May 6, 1902, more than 60 days after judgment, with interest thereon from the date thereof, and for the costs which the clerk, taxed at $43.30. The costs were properly inserted, because the judgment gave costs, leaving the taxation thereof to the clerk, which is usual and proper.

For the reasons aforesaid, the judgments complained of are affirmed.

McCLUNG et al. v. SIEG et al.

March 22, 1902.)

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—LIABILITY OF DISTRIBUTEES—SUBSEQUENT PAYMENT OF DEBT—CONTRIBUTION—PROPERTY SUBJECT—ATTACHMENT—AFFIDAVIT—ORDER OF PUBLICATION.

1. Where an administrator, having no notice of a debt against the estate of his intestate, makes distribution of the estate, and is afterwards compelled to pay the debt, and there is no fraud or improper conduct imputable to him respecting either creditor or the distributees, he may, in equity, compel the distributees to refund to him the amount of the debt, interest, and costs which he has been compelled to pay, and his expenses in the defense of the suit, although he has taken no refunding bond.

2. When the principal administrator of an estate has been appointed and resides in another state, and an ancillary administrator has been appointed in this state, and such ancillary administrator has, in ignorance of a debt against the estate of his intestate, turned the assets over to the principal administrator, and the principal administrator has made complete or partial distribution thereof, and the ancillary administrator is compelled to pay such debt out of his own funds, and is not guilty of any fraud or improper conduct, he is entitled to reimbursement by the distributees, and he is not compelled to go to the foreign jurisdiction to obtain such relief, if any of the distributees have property within this state sufficient to reimburse him, and he may proceed by foreign attachment against such property, but his recovery against the distributee will be limited to the amount which the distributee has received from the estate.

¶ 1. See Executors and Administrators, vol. 22, Cent. Dig. §§ 1319, 1320, 1323.

3. While it is necessary, when all of the distributees are within the jurisdiction of the court in which the administrator is entitled to proceed for such relief, that all of them shall be made parties, to the end that they shall contribute ratably, and that it may not be in the power of the administrator to throw the whole liability upon one of them in the first instance, yet, when they are not all within the jurisdiction of the court, he may sue such of them as are within the reach of the court's process, and, if they are all nonresidents and any of them have property within reach of such process, it may be subjected by attachment in a suit in equity.

4. The administrator's right to reimbursement is not limited to payment out of the specific money or property received from the estate by the distributee, and any property belonging to the distributee, which is liable for his debts generally, may be subjected, but not for a larger amount than he has received from the estate.

5. Where the affidavit for attachment and other papers in the cause show that the defendants are nonresidents, and no order of publication has been taken on the return day of the process, the plaintiff is entitled to a reasonable time in which to perfect his suit by order of publication, and the suit does not abate immediately upon the return of the process and failure to take the order of publication.

6. A general appearance by any of the non-resident defendants renders an order of publication unnecessary as to such of them as appear.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pendleton County; R. W. Dailey, Jr., Judge.

Bill by D. G. McClung, administrator of James M. Sieg, against John S. McNulty and others. Decree for plaintiff, and certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Flournoy, Price & Smith, for appellants.
B. B. Heiner and Reynolds & Forman, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. This is a suit in equity brought in the circuit court of Pendleton county by D. G. McClung, administrator of James M. Sieg, deceased, whose domicile was in Virginia at the time of his death, against John S. McNulty, the Virginia administrator of said Sieg, as such administrator and in his own right, the widow and heirs at law of said Sieg, and S. B. McClung, for the purpose of compelling Frances V. Sieg to refund to the West Virginia administrator out of her distributive share the sum of $1,028.62, the amount of a judgment and cost of defending the suit, for a debt of which the administrator had no notice at the time he made distribution, or, to be more accurate, permitted the Virginia administrator to collect the assets in West Virginia and make the distribution, if, legally speaking, distribution has been made. It is claimed by McClung that the fund which he has attached in the hands of S. B. McClung is a part of the uncollected assets of the estate of his intestate, although the Virginia administrator had, long before the bringing of this suit, turned that fund over to Frances V. Sieg, the widow, as part of her distributive share, and released S. B. McClung, the debtor, and McClung had executed a new note for the amount payable to Frances V. Sieg. So the debt which S. B. McClung owed to James M. Sieg, plaintiff's intestate, remained in the hands of McClung at the time this suit was brought, but was claimed by Frances V. Sieg. Mrs. Sieg had received from the domiciliary administrator in all $2,551 up to February 1, 1895, and there yet remained due her, on account of her distributive share as shown by the record, $873.88 at that time; but, of the amount so received by her, $1,101 was the amount in the hands of S. B. McClung, which he did not collect, but for which she took his note. McClung owed her, on account of some transaction between them, $100, with interest from June 8, 1896. This last sum seems not to have been any part of the estate of James M. Sieg. Mrs. Sieg, McNulty, and the heirs of James M. Sieg being nonresidents, an order of publication was taken against them, and Mrs. Sieg appeared and filed her separate demurrer and answer to the bill, but there was no appearance for any of the other parties, except S. B. McClung, who filed his answer as garnishee in the attachment proceeding. From his answer and the pleadings and evidence in the case, the court found that there was due from him to Frances V. Sieg the sum of $1,103.17, with interest from the — day of —, 1891, subject to a credit of $300 as of February 9, 1894; $100, December 18, 1894; $300, February 2, 1896; $100, January 5, 1895; $300, February 10, 1896; and that he was also indebted to her in the further sum of $100, with interest thereon from June 8, 1896, and on the 10th day of November, 1899, made a decree requiring S. B. McClung to pay over to D. G. McClung, the plaintiff, the amount due from him to Frances V. Sieg as assets of the estate of James M. Sieg, deceased, subject to the payment of any debts against said estate. It is from said decree that this appeal was taken.

It seems that the facts in reference to the debt paid by D. G. McClung, administrator, after the funds belonging to the estate of his intestate, except those in the hands of S. B. McClung, had by his consent been collected and taken out of the state by the Virginia administrator, and the money in S. B. McClung's hands had been turned over to Mrs. Sieg as part of her distributive share, are such as would entitle the plaintiff, upon proper proceedings in a court of equity, with the necessary parties in court, to compel reimbursement by the distributees and heirs, although no refunding bond was taken from them. McClung was appointed as administrator in 1876, and there was a large amount of money in the state of West Virginia due to his intestate which he might have collected; but, as it appeared that there were no debts of any consequence due from him to persons residing in this state, McClung permitted C. P. Jones, who had been the law partner of Mr. Sieg in his lifetime, and who was familiar with his business, to collect, as attorney for plaintiff, nearly $6,000, and pay it to McNulty. After this had been done, and the McClung debt had been turned over to Mrs. Sieg, a judgment was rendered against D. G. McClung, administrator, in the circuit court of Pocahontas county, in June, 1893, for the sum of $712.15, with interest from the 20th day of October, 1892, for a debt due from the estate of his intestate. In April, 1897, a decree was entered in a chancery suit in Pendleton county requiring said McClung to pay the said judgment, then amounting to $904.07, out of his own funds. This was satisfied by him on the 5th day of May, 1897, and, with the interest and costs, then amounted to $945.17. In addition to that, he had been compelled to pay out $83.45 in defending these suits, making his total outlay $1,028.62.

The debt which McClung was compelled to pay seems to have been stubbornly contested on his part, and there is no evidence of any fraud or improper conduct imputable to him in that connection, and the debt did not appear until after the assets had passed out of his hands. Under such circumstances legatees may be compelled to refund, and the same rule is, of course, applicable to distributees of an intestate's estate. Jones v. Williams, 2 Call, 103; Burnley v. Lambert, 1 Wash. 312; Gallego's Ex'r v. Lambert, 3 Leigh, 465; 1 Tuck. Com. 425; Robertson v. Archer, 5 Rand. 319, where, although the court refused a decree for refunding because the claim was too old, the principle is admitted and the legatees were compelled to give refunding bonds for the benefit of the executors as to claims of any other creditors that might exist; Bower's Ex'r v. Glendenning, 4 Munf. 219. Here the court holds that "if, without fraud or collusion, a decree be rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction against an executor, he may bring his suit in equity against the legatees for contribution to satisfy such decree." This court announces the same doctrine in McEndree v. Morgan, 31 W. Va. 521, 8 S. E. 285.

But it is seriously contended that, in order to compel reimbursement, the executor or administrator must sue all the distributees or legatees, so that the burden of refunding will fall upon them in proportion to what they have received from the estate, and that the suit cannot be maintained against Mrs. Sieg alone, she being the only one of the distributees who has appeared. The others are all nonresidents, and, if Mrs. Sieg cannot be held in this suit, the administrator will be compelled to go to a foreign jurisdiction to enforce his claim. In Virginia he might be able to make them all defendants in one suit, but he insists that this court will not compel him to go out of the state for that purpose. It is undoubtedly true that, ordinarily, all the legatees or distributees should be parties. "The creditors have a double remedy: First, against the executors at law, in which case the executors have their remedy in equity against the legatees to compel them to refund; or secondly, the creditors may in equity pursue the estate in the hands of the legatees; and, in either case, all the legatees must be made parties, that the charge may not fall upon one, but may be equally borne by the whole. But if this direct mode against a particular legatee was permitted, it would put it in the power of the creditor to mark out the person in the first instance to sustain the whole weight." Burnley v. Lambert, 1 Wash. 313; Scott v. Halliday, 5 Munf. 103; Sampson v. Bryce, Id. 175; Lewis v. Overby's Adm'r, 31 Grat. 601. But the circumstances of this case are unusual and extraordinary in this, that Mrs. Sieg is the only distributee (assuming that the legal title to the fund in McClung's hands was held by her when it was attached) who had any property in this state that could be subjected to the claim of the administrator. But for that circumstance, he would have had no remedy against her here. Had they all been residents of the state of West Virginia, or all had property within the jurisdiction of the court, it would have been the duty of McClung to sue them all and make them contribute ratably to his reimbursement. As it is clear that for want of means to bring any of them except Mrs. Sieg within the jurisdiction of the court plaintiff can proceed against her only, shall it be said that he is deprived of his remedy against her because jurisdiction of the balance of the distributees cannot be obtained? If that be true, and the distributees were domiciled in different states, he could not obtain relief against any of them. Such is not the tendency of the decisions nor the spirit of the law. In Ryan's Adm'r v. McLeod, 32 Grat. 367, where it was sought to subject real estate in the hands of heirs to the payment of their ancestor's debts, one of them had sold his portion to a bona fide purchaser and had become insolvent, and the portions of the other heirs were subjected to the payment of the whole of the debts. The same principle is applied in Lewis v. Overby's Adm'r, 31 Grat. 601. Although these cases are not exactly in point, they show that, where it is impossible to make the heirs contribute ratably, the portion which cannot be collected from one of them because of his insolvency may be charged against the others. The case is analogous to that of a joint demand, as to which it is necessary that all the obligors be made parties. In those cases the nonresidence of part of them does not preclude judgment as to such of them as can be legally served with process. Nor is it any objection to proceeding by attachment as to any of them who may happen to have property within the jurisdiction of the court. "Where, in an action or suit against two or more defendants, the process is served upon part of them, the plaintiff may proceed to judgment as to any so served, and either discontinue it as to the others, or from time to time, as the process is served as to such others, proceed to judgment as to them until judgments be obtained against all." Code 1899, c. 125, § 52. If Mrs. Sieg is compelled to pay the whole of this judgment, she will be entitled to contribution from the other distributees of the estate. "Legatees are liable to refund, even at the suit of other legatees, in some cases. As where the assets were originally deficient, and all are bound to abate in proportion; there, if the executor pays one in preference to the rest, they may exhibit their bill and compel him to refund." Tuck. Com. 425; Toll. 341. "In all cases legatees are liable to refund at the suit of creditors if there is a deficiency of assets." Tuck. Com. 425. The same principle that makes it necessary to make all the distributees parties, where the administrator is entitled to be reimbursed, and all can be made parties, entitles one legatee, who is compelled to refund the whole amount to the personal representative, to have contribution from all the others. Manifestly, it is a hardship upon Mrs. Sieg to compel her to refund the whole of this debt to the administrator. But as she may compel the other distributees to contribute and relieve her of all of it except what she is equitably bound to pay, it would be a much greater hardship upon the administrator to deny him relief, for in that event he has no remedy. Although it is claimed that he should have gone to the state of Virginia to have instituted this suit, where he could have brought all the distributees in to answer his bill, that contention is not in conformity with the principles of law. Where a plaintiff may resort to either of two different forums in the same jurisdiction, the one to which he does go will not turn him away simply because he may obtain relief elsewhere. This being true, it will be difficult to find a satisfactory reason for the refusal of a court, having power and authority to give relief, to entertain the plaintiff's bill on the ground that he may obtain relief in a foreign jurisdiction. No precedent for such action has been cited or found.

These views are strengthened by the following legal propositions: "Each independent sovereignty considers itself competent to confer, whenever there is occasion, a probate authority, whether by letters testamentary or of administration, which shall operate exclusively and universally within its own sovereign jurisdiction, there being property of the deceased person, or lawful debts owing, within reach of its own mandate and judicial process." Schouler's Ex. & Adm'r, § 165. One of the main purposes of the appointment of an ancillary administrator is the subjection of the assets of the decedent to the payment of his debts due the citizens of the local sovereignty. "In practice, the local sovereignty, state or national, permits letters to issue upon the estates of deceased nonresidents, mainly for the purpose of conveniently subjecting such assets to the claims of creditors entitled to sue in the local courts, and for appropriating whatever balance may remain to the state or sovereign, by way of distribution, in default of known legatees or kindred." Id. § 166. While, by comity, the courts of the jurisdiction in which the property is found will recognize the rights of nonresident legatees and heirs, and will permit any surplus, after paying the local indebtedness, to be paid over to the domiciliary administrator or executor, it is only done in a spirit of comity and as a matter of judicial discretion. The local sovereignty may compel them to come into its own jurisdiction to receive what belongs to them. "The rule to thus pay over is not, however, absolute; on the contrary, the transfer will not be made if deemed, under the circumstances, improper; and legislative policy is to secure the rights of its creditors and citizens at all hazards. * * * For the spirit of comity does not require that citizens shall be put to the inconvenience and expense of proving and collecting their claims abroad when there are assets at hand." Id. § 174. Another matter worthy of consideration in this connection is that the West Virginia administrator could not, as such, sue in the courts of Virginia, if at all, without making settlement there of his administration accounts, and it may be doubted whether he could sue at all in Virginia, where there is another administrator of the same intestate, except as a creditor. If not actual obstacles, there are inconveniences standing in the way of this plaintiff if he should be turned out of the courts of this state and compelled to go to Virginia to enforce reimbursement.

Another contention is that the fund in the hands of S. B. McClung cannot be treated as assets of the estate of plaintiff's intestate because it has been turned over to Mrs. Sieg. If it were uncollected and unadministered assets, there is no ground upon which this suit could be resisted. But it is claimed that it has been collected, with the consent of the plaintiff, by the Virginia administrator, and distributed by him, and that, in consequence thereof, the West Virginia administrator, not having paid it to Mrs. Sieg, cannot be reimbursed out of that fund. Under the principles of law governing the relations of ancillary and domiciliary administrators, the collection and distribution of the West Virginia assets by the Virginia administrator, with the consent of the West Virginia administrator, is equivalent to such collection and distribution by the West Virginia administrator. The Virginia administrator could make no collections here, except with the consent of McClung. Schouler's Ex. & Adm'r, § 173.

But it is contended further that the greater part of the money in the hands of S. B. McClung and claimed by Mrs. Sieg never was the property of plaintiff's intestate, but that it belonged to Mrs. Sieg herself. She is the sister of S. B. McClung, and, on the partition of the real estate of their father in 1867, there became due to her from her brother $250 as owelty of partition. Her husband loaned McClung some additional money, and took his note payable to himself for his own money and the money due his wife. The $100 hereinbefore mentioned is money that Mrs. Sieg loaned her brother, S. B. McClung. Granting, for the purpose of discussion, that all this money belonged to Mrs. Sieg and never was a part of the assets of James M. Sieg, it is liable to be subjected to the payment of plaintiff's claim. Her liability to refund is contractual in its nature, and not only the specific fund or property which she received for her distributive share, but any other property belonging to her and found in the state of West Virginia, which, by its nature, may be subjected to the payment of her debts generally, is liable. The only limitation is that she shall not be compelled to pay back more than she has received from the estate. There is no possibility of her being compelled to do that in this case, for the reason that she does not deny having received from the estate $2,551, while the plaintiff here only claims $1,028.62. There is certainly no rule which limits the recovery so as to make it payable only out of the specific funds or property received by the distributee. No authority for any such limitation is offered.

Upon the authority of Steele v. Harkness, 9 W. Va. 13, it is claimed that the suit had abated and the court lost jurisdiction, because an order of publication was not taken upon return of the process but was subsequently taken. The case of Steele v. Harkness does not apply here, for the reason that it does appear here, as it did not appear there, by affidavit, that the defendants, except S. B. McClung, were nonresidents. At any rate, the case of Brown v. Gorsuch, 40 S. E. 376, decided at the last term of this court, settles this question, for it is there held that in such case the plaintiff shall have a reasonable time in which to perfect his proceedings by order of publication. Moreover, this record shows that the original summons was returnable on the first Monday in June, 1897, and that a copy of it was delivered to a member of Mrs. Sieg's family on the 20th day of May, 1897. But that service was probably not good, for the reason that the return does not show in what county the service was made. On the 8th day of June, 1897, which was the return day of the first summons, a second summons was sued out, and a copy of that was, on the 12th day of June, 1897, delivered to Mrs. Sieg at her residence in Highland county, Va. This was equivalent to an order of publication. At some time in the year 1898 Mrs. Sieg appeared and filed her demurrer, for it appears that on the 20th day of June, 1898, the demurrer was overruled. In the printed record there is a paper called a separate demurrer and answer of Mrs. Sieg, but there is no order filing her answer. Her appearance gives the court jurisdiction as to her. Lumber Co. v. Lance, 41 S. E. 128, decided at this term. But in overruling the demurrer the court referred the case to a commissioner, without giving a day to answer. This is assigned as error. According to Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625, 37 Am. Rep. 794, and Goff v. McBee, 47 W. Va. 153, 34 S. E. 745, it was error. But it cannot possibly be prejudicial, for that order was interlocutory, and did not affect the merits, and Mrs. Sieg had more than a year after that in which to file her answer before final decree. In the two cases referred to, final decree was made immediately upon filing the answers. This case, in respect to that order of reference and the answer, is like the case of Foley v. Ruley, 43 W. Va. 513, 27 S. E. 268, where it is held that mere order of reference, deciding nothing, may be made without answer. Manifestly, it was not the duty of the plaintiff to compel Mrs. Sieg to answer, and, while the court made no order giving her time, the record shows that she did have more than a year after her appearance in which to file her answer. Hence she cannot complain of her own failure to answer.

The decree of the 10th day of November, 1899, requiring S. B. McClung to pay over the money to D. G. McClung, administrator, was erroneous, for the reason that at that time the court had not judicially determined how much the plaintiff was entitled to require Mrs. Sieg to refund. It was not a suit to recover unadministered assets, but one to compel reimbursement, and she could not be required to pay over to him more than was necessary to reimburse him. By that decree the report of the commissioner, formerly made in the cause, was recommitted without confirmation. However, on the 9th day of April, 1900, after the commissioner had again reported, the court confirmed his report, and found that, after applying on the claim of the plaintiff all of the money which had been paid to him by S. B. McClung under the former decree, there yet remained due him and unpaid $421.98. The appeal and supersedeas were not obtained until the 9th day of April, 1900. Thus, before the erroneous decree was appealed from, the court had determined the amount to which the plaintiff was entitled, and applied the fund in controversy to its satisfaction. Hence the error in the decree of November 10, 1899, was substantially corrected by another decree before the appeal was taken. At any rate, it is made certain by said subsequent decree that the error in the former one was not prejudicial. To warrant a reversal, the error complained of must be prejudicial. Clark v. Johnston, 15 W. Va. 804.

There being no error in the decree, it is to be affirmed.

On Rehearing.

This case was decided, and the foregoing opinion filed, on March 22, 1902. A rehearing was allowed, on petition of appellant, because of a doubt as to whether she ought to be held for more than a ratable proportion of the debt, to be determined by the ratio which the amount received by her from the estate bears to the whole amount distributed. This question was extensively discussed on the reargument, and a number of cases cited in support of the contentions of the parties, respectively, but no case expressly deciding the point has been produced. Clark v. Williams, 70 N. C. 679, seems to support, to some extent, the argument of counsel for appellant, and will be noticed later on. It is everywhere held that a suit for reimbursement by the personal representative, or by a creditor against the distributees, for the payment of his debt, must be in equity, and that all the distributees must be made parties, and that the decree should be against each distributee for his ratable proportion of the debt. From this it is argued that such ratable proportion is the limit of the liability of each distributee, and that he cannot be held for more. An equally strong argument, based upon the same premise, might be made for the contrary of the proposition. If the liability is not joint but several, each distributee being required to pay no more in any event than such share, why the necessity for suing all? Upon a joint and several contract the parties to it may be sued jointly, or each may be sued separately. Where the undertaking is joint, they must all be sued together, and the decree is against them all for the whole amount, and, if necessary, one of them may be required to pay the entire amount. If the liability of the distributee is limited to a ratable proportion of the debt, why may he not be sued separately? Why the necessity for suing all together? To this it was answered that a settlement of the administration account and proof of the debt against the personal representative are prerequisites to a decree. This is true, but it is not the reason assigned by the courts; for they say all the distributees must be made parties, in order to prevent the burden of the whole debt from falling upon one, or such of them as the creditor may elect to proceed against. This is forbidden, because it is inequitable, and it does not indicate the limitation of liability contended for. On the contrary, when the courts say all the distributees and legatees shall be made parties, in order to prevent the creditor from requiring the payment of an undue amount from one of the parties, they indicate that there is no limit of liability, short of the amount received, except the equitable principle of contribution, which here concerns the remedy more than the right. They treat the amount received by the distributees as a fund belonging to the estate and liable to the payment of the debt, and the distributees are brought in as the joint holders of that fund, or as being liable for the payment of the debt, by reason of their having received from the estate money or property which ought to have been applied to the payment of the debt. Then the court, having them all before it, in order to settle and determine the rights of all the parties by a single decree, ascertains how much each should pay, to the end that the equities between the distributees themselves may be adjusted and settled, as well as the equity between the creditor or personal representative on the one side and all the distributees on the other. It makes two settlements by a single decree, and ends all controversies.

This principle is adverted to by Judge Staples in Ryan's Adm'r v. McLeod, 32 Grat. 367, 374. He says: "Our attention has been called, however, to an opinion of Judge Tucker, found on page 113, vol. 2, of his commentaries, in which he states, 'There is much reason and some authority for the doctrine that each heir should be held responsible only for his portion of the debts.' And he cites as authority the cases of Mason's Devisees v. Peter's Adm'rs, 1 Munf. 437; Foster & Wife et al. v. Crenshaw's Ex'rs, 3 Munf. 514; Hopkirk v. Dennis et al., 2 Munf. 326. It will be found, upon examination, the first two cases only decide that the lands of all the devisees should bear their ratable proportion of the debts in the first instance, instead of decreeing against one and turning him around upon the others for contribution—a principle universally conceded and repeatedly acted upon by this court. The last case, that of Hopkirk v. Dennis, holds the very reverse of what Judge Tucker supposes. There it was conceded that one of the devisees had wasted his portion of the estate, and was insolvent. The court held that the chancery court erred in not decreeing that the other devisees should pay the insolvent devisee's portion, in due and ratable proportions, to the extent of the lands devised."

The case just quoted from was cited in the former opinion as affirming the proposition decided in Hopkirk v. Dennis. Some other cases were there cited to the same effect, and it is argued that they do not apply because the proceedings were against the heirs in respect to real estate descended and devised, instead of legatees and distributees to whom the personal estate had been paid over, leaving debts unpaid. And it is said that each heir is liable for the whole amount because the statute expressly makes him liable. But it is to be noted here that, notwithstanding the liability of each heir to the extent of the value of the land which descended or was devised to him, all the heirs must be made parties, so that the principle of contribution may be enforced and applied in such suit, and the liability placed where the court can see that it ultimately belongs, so that the rights of all the parties may be settled once for all, and not by piecemeal. As some of the judges say, a court of equity always puts the saddle on the right horse in the first instance. This illustration shows that there is nothing in the argument of limited liability, founded upon the requirement that all the distributees shall be made parties and contribute ratably to the payment of the debt. It is true that at common law the real estate of a decedent was liable in the hands of heirs for record and specialty debts only, and that the statute now makes the real estate liable for all debts. It makes it assets for the payment of debts in case of a deficiency of personal property. The effect is merely to place real estate on the same footing as personal property respecting the debts of the decedent after the personal estate has been exhausted, and proceedings to enforce payment of a debt out of real estate in the hands of the heirs are conducted upon the same principle as that which governs the enforcement of payment out of the personal property in the hands of legatees or distributees.

Another argument is based upon the statute authorizing personal representatives to require the execution, by distributees and legatees, of bonds with security, conditioned to refund due proportions of any debts or demands which may afterwards appear against the decedent and of the costs attending their recovery. Adopting the same line of argument, the court, in Clark v. Williams, 70 N. C. 679, reaches the conclusion that, where refunding bonds have not been taken and one distributee has become insolvent, the others are not required to make up his portion of the debt. This is exactly the opposite of what the Virginia court holds respecting real estate in the hands of the heirs. The reason assigned for the decision is faulty. What is the effect of this statute when the personal representative puts it in force? It lays upon each distributee the same burden that a court of equity would ultimately put upon him, and makes him give security for the payment of the amount. It goes to the end of any possible future assertion of a demand against the distributees by suit in equity, and requires each one to give bond with security to do that which a decree, settling the rights of all parties in respect to any outstanding and unpaid debts against the estate, would require him to do. It in no way indicates or determines the nature or extent of the primary liability of a distributee, or his liability when no bond has been given. As a bond with security is exacted by this statute, the case stands upon an entirely different footing. The statute does not limit the liability without requiring bond with security. This argues, if anything, that, in the absence of security for his due proportion of the debt, the liability of the distributee would be greater, otherwise the outstanding debt might not be paid. It would not be, in case of the subsequent insolvency of any one or more of the distributees, if each is only liable ratably. Security by each for the payment of his share is a provision against such contingency.

The view adopted by this court seems to be supported by authorities as well as reason. In Sanders v. Godley, 23 Ala. 479, the court said: "The chancellor will render a decree in favor of complainant against the respective parties for their several portions as aforesaid, and allow them some short delay for the payment of the same, and shall further decree that, if the whole amount be not paid by such time, execution may issue against any or either of said parties defendants, to the extent of the property respectively received by them, until the whole is paid." The Virginia court makes no distinction between the legatees and heirs in respect to the payment of the debt of a decedent. "Where legatees are called upon to refund at the suit of a creditor, the general principle is that all must be before the court, and the burden apportioned among them, if it can be done, without material delay or injury to the creditor. But if some of the legatees are insolvent, the others will be required to make good the deficiency to the extent of what they have received." Leake's Ex'r v. Leake et al., 75 Va. 792 (Syl. point 9). The South Carolina court clearly affirms the same principle. Lanier v. Griffin, 11 S. C. 565, holds: "The demand of a creditor of testator against the legatee, who has received his legacy, leaving a debt of the testator unpaid, without available assets for its payment, is, in equity, in the nature of an action for money had and received. * * * Held, further, that the legatees and devisees were liable to the ward to the extent of assets received, but that no personal liability attached to the executors. Held, further, that the legacies were liable to respond before the lands specially devised could be applied, and that the decree should have established the liability of all the legatees and devisees inter sese to contribution."

The authorities fully sustain the proposition that the liability of the distributees rests upon the theory of assets of the decedent's estate in their hands as a trust fund. That being true, each one is primarily liable to the extent of the amount of the fund held by him. "That a creditor may follow assets in the hands of the legatees, to whom they have been delivered in ignorance of the creditor's demand, has been an established principle of this court from the earliest period of the decisions in which we have any traces." Lord Cottenham, in March v. Russell, 3 Myl. & Cr. 81. "If a creditor does not come in till after the executor has paid away the residue, he is not without remedy, though he is barred the benefit of that decree. If he has a mind to sue the legatees to bring back the fund, he may do so." Lord Eldon, in Gillisple v. Alexander, 8 Russ. 136. "But the legatees and distributees, although there was an original deficiency of assets, are not at law suable by the creditor. Yet he has a clear right in equity, in such a case, to follow the assets of the testator into their hands as a trust fund for the payment of his debt. The legatees and distributees are in equity treated as trustees for this purpose; for they are not entitled to anything, except the surplus of the assets after all the debts are paid. Besides, they, in the case put, being ultimately responsible to pay the debt to the executor out of such assets, if the executor should be compelled to pay it to the creditor by a suit at law, may be made immediately liable to the creditor in equity." Story's Eq. Jur. § 1251. "In the course of the administration of estates, executors and administrators often pay debts and legacies upon the entire confidence that the assets are sufficient for all purposes. It may turn out, from unexpected occurrences, or from debts and claims made known at a subsequent time, that there is a deficiency of assets. Under such circumstances they may be entitled to no relief at law. But in a court of equity, if they have acted with good faith and with due caution, they will be clearly entitled to it upon the ground that otherwise they will be innocently subject to an unjust loss from what the law itself deems an accident." Id. § 90.

It is urged that, conceding the jurisdiction and power of the courts of this state to subject, to the payment of this debt, the fund received by Mrs. Sieg, it ought not to be done, because it is inequitable, and the plaintiff ought to be required to go into another jurisdiction in which the remedy is more complete. This phase of the case has been discussed in the former opinion. It is true that in Dickinson v. Hoomes' Adm'r, 8 Grat. 353, 416, Judge Moncure says: "But cases may sometimes occur in which, all things considered, it may be more convenient to turn over the parties to a foreign jurisdiction;" but the plaintiff here is proceeding in the courts of the state in which he was appointed administrator, and the process of whose courts was used for the collection of the assets which formed the trust fund for the payment of this debt. In this state his accounts are to be settled according to the law of this state. To turn him around to a foreign jurisdiction may be as inconvenient and as inequitable as to require this distributee to pay the debt here. Even in Dickinson v. Hoomes, heirs residing in Virginia were made to account for the value of lands in the state of Kentucky which had descended to them.

We do not believe there is anything in this case which, on equitable principles, requires the courts to decline to take jurisdiction of it. Hence the decree should be affirmed.

THOMAS v. WHEELING ELECTRICAL CO.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 12, 1903.)PLEADING—SURPLUSAGE—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY—ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANIES—DEFECTIVE INSULATION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—WRONGFUL DEATH—DAMAGES.

1. It is only necessary to state facts, and never is it necessary to aver matter of law, in a declaration. Hogg's Plead. & Forms, 59.

2. Surplusage in pleading does not vitiate. Hogg's Plead. & Forms, 59.

3. Where there is no controversy as to the facts or inferences that may be fairly drawn from them, the question of negligence is one of law for the court. Where such is not the case, the question is for the jury.

4. It is the duty of electric companies to use very great care to keep the insulation of its dangerous wires perfect at places where people have a right to go for work, for business, or for pleasure.

5. When injury to a person comes from contact with a live electric wire from bad insulation at a place where there ought to be good, safe insulation for safety to persons, it is a case of negligence on the part of the electrical corporation, rendering it prima facie liable.

6. If one take hold of an electric wire at a place where it ought to be safely insulated for safety to persons, and is injured by reason of defective insulation, he not knowing its defect, he is not, from so doing, guilty of contributory negligence forbidding recovery of damages.

7. One coming in contact with a live electric wire in discharge of duty will not, on account of so coming in contact, be guilty of contributory negligence, if it was the duty of the corporation to properly insulate the wire at the place of injury, and it has neglected to do so, and the person knows not the defect of insulation.

8. In places where electric wires should be insulated for safety to persons, one may assume that they are so insulated, if he knew not to the contrary.

9. A corporation or person operating a plant for electric lighting must anticipate injury as likely to happen to persons from contact with its wires by reason of defective insulation at places where the law requires such insulation.

10. The verdict of a jury in an action for death from wrongful act cannot be set aside for excessiveness in an amount under $10,000, their assessment being final, unless the verdict be the result of passion, prejudice, partiality, or corruption on the part of the jury.

11. The refusal of a court to permit a witness to answer a question will not be considered in the appellate court when it is not stated or shown what it was expected the answer would be, unless the question very clearly imports what such answer must be.

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County; H. C. Hervey, Judge.

Action by W. F. Thomas, administrator, against the Wheeling Electrical Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Caldwell & Caldwell and J. A. Howard, for plaintiff in error. J. J. Coniff, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. On the front of the Grand Opera House, on the corner of Market and Twelfth streets, in the city of Wheeling, is a balcony 8 feet long, 3 feet wide, 30 inches high, with a rail 8 inches wide. Out from the building at the street curb stood a pole, and from it two wires conveying electricity for light, belonging to the Wheeling Electrical Company, extended by a sharp angle to a bracket on the north wall of the opera house. These wires passed close to the rail of the balcony, 18 or 20 inches from it, one 6 inches above the other. The balcony is used for people to go out upon through a window of the opera house opening upon it. There had been a converter or transformer on this balcony from which two wires ran to the main wires just mentioned; but the transformer was removed, and the two wires connecting it with the wires outside the balcony were cut away at the point of their union with the two wires outside the balcony, and in doing so the defendant left the ends of the wires stick out, and did not properly wrap them, and did not cover them with tape, and the old insulating material did not cover the point, and was worn and dangerous. It was clearly shown that the wires in this condition were extremely dangerous; this was not a disputed fact, the officers of the company stating on the stand that they were so dangerous that contact with them would kill. They remained in such condition a long time, without inspection. An opera company which had leased the building for a term had been performing in it, and had tacked advertising banners on the balcony, and, when about to close its performance there, employed Earl J. Thomas, 21 years of age, 5 feet 11 inches high, to gather these banners on Market street, and he went out upon this balcony to untack from the balcony some banners which had been tacked upon it, one of them on the north end of the balcony by which the wires ran, the banner being tacked on the top rail and on the lower part of the balcony. While engaged in this work, between 7 and 8 o'clock of the night of 2d November, he came in contact with one of the electric wires. He was seen grasping the wire with his left hand, his right hand on the left wrist, leaning against the corner of the brick wall at the junction of balcony and wall, apparently fastened or transfixed by the shock, and when jerked away by a person who went to his rescue fell lifeless to the balcony floor. He was apparently dead while standing against the wall with the wire in his hand. Whether he took hold of the wire to steady himself when intending to reach down to loose the lower corner of the banner, or how or why he took hold of it, does not appear. He was simply seen grasping it, fastened to it. The upper corner of the banner had been loosed by him. His administrator brought an action against the company to recover damages for his death, and by the verdict of a jury recovered

$7,500, on which judgment was rendered. The company brings the case here, assigning 43 errors.

Complaint is made that the second count states the duty resting on the defendant as too high and stringent. That is mere allegation of law, and immaterial. Pleadings should state facts, not law. Facts only are necessary to be stated, not arguments and inferences. Where a declaration, after stating facts, alleges that it thereupon became the duty, etc., the allegation is to be understood as a mere legal liability supposed to result from the facts, and as an assertion that the defendant became bound in law to a legal liability, and not as a substantive allegation. The allegation of duty is superfluous where the facts show a legal liability, and is useless where they do not. 1 Chitty, Plead. 236; 2 Chitty, Plead. 476. It is not claimed that the facts stated in this count do not raise a duty. The matter complained of is surplusage. It would not vary or prescribe the proof. "It is only necessary to state facts, and never is it necessary to aver matters of law in a declaration." "Surplusage never vitiates a declaration, and is treated as if it had never been inserted therein." Hogg's Plead. & Forms, 59; Andrews' Stephens' Plead. 411.

The defendant complains of the following instruction given for the plaintiff: "The court instructs the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to not only protect any portion or portions of its wires in close proximity to the north end of the balcony, mentioned in evidence, that may be exposed, by proper insulation, so that persons coming in contact therewith in the performance of their work would not be injured, but it was also the duty of the defendant, by proper inspection from time to time, to see that said insulation was kept in a proper condition." It is said that this instruction takes for granted that the wire was exposed and not properly insulated. I do not think so. It simply states a legal proposition, and does not intimate an opinion on the facts. Other instructions told the jury that it must pass on those facts on the evidence.

It is further argued that the instruction misleads. It is claimed that it should have incorporated the principles of instruction 12 in Snyder v. Wheeling Electrical Co., 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. 733, 39 L. R. A. 499, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922, that it should have submitted the question whether the defendant was bound to anticipate injury to any one from the position of the wire, or that persons would come in contact with it in performing any work. As we said in the Snyder Case, an electrical company, using a dangerous power, is required to use very great care and diligence to avoid danger. It is bound to anticipate danger and properly insulate its wires, and inspect and keep them so, at certain places, but not everywhere. It is bound to expect certain accidents in certain ways or from certain causes, but not all accidents from every cause. Whether a place is such, under the evidence, as to require insulation, is generally a question for the jury. Whether, if such a place, the accident is such that might have been anticipated, is a question of fact for the jury. But sometimes negligence is a question of law for the court. "Where there is no controversy in regard to the facts or inferences that may be fairly drawn from them, the question of negligence is one of law for the court." Woolwine's Adm'r v. G. & O. R. Co., 36 W. Va. 329, 15 S. E. 81, 16 L. R. A. 271, 32 Am. St. Rep. 859; Johnson v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 570; Ketterman v. Railroad Co., 48 W. Va. 606, 37 S. E. 683. It is undisputed that the balcony was for persons to go upon, and that they did go upon it, and that the wire was distant only 20 inches from its railing; and was thus in close proximity to the balcony. "A company maintaining electrical wires over which a high voltage of electricity is conveyed, rendering them highly dangerous to others, is under the duty of using the necessary care and prudence at places where others may have the right to go, either for work, business, or pleasure, to prevent injury. It is the duty of the company, under such conditions, to keep the wires perfectly insulated, and it must exercise the utmost care to maintain them in this condition at such places." Joyce on Electric Law, § 445; 1 Thompson on Negligence, § 800; Brown v. Edison (Md.), 45 Atl. 182, 46 L. R. A. 745, 78 Am. St. Rep. 442; Perham v. Portland Co. (Or.), 53 Pac. 14, 24, 40 L. R. A. 799, 72 Am. St. Rep. 730; Clements v. Louisiana Co. (La. Ann.), 11 South. 51, 16 L. R. A. 43, 32 Am. St. Rep. 348; W. U. Co. v. State (Md.), 33 Atl. 763, 31 L. R. A. 572, 51 Am. St. Rep. 464; Snyder v. Elec. Co., 43 W. Va. 661, 28 S. E. 733, 39 L. R. A. 499, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922. Persons on the balcony might thoughtlessly lean over or stretch out the arm and come in contact with the wire. A workman repairing the balcony or painting it, or hanging show banners on it or removing them from it, might come in contact with it. These considerations tell us that the court did not err in telling the jury in this instruction that insulation was, at this balcony, a duty imposed by law upon the defendant. It took from the jury only one question, that is, whether the defendant was under duty, at the balcony, to insulate its wires, and inspect them and keep them insulated. It does not intimate that the defendant was bound to anticipate the particular accident. It is argued that the instruction implies that the defendant must anticipate accident. It does not do this. I think that where the place is one that demands insulation of wires, there the company is held to anticipate contact with the wires; for it is the fact that persons may there come into such contact that imposes the duty of the insulation. When injury to a person is received at such a place from want of proper insulation, the company using the wires is prima facie liable, unless there be contributory negligence. It is a clear duty to insulate in such places. It is true that sometimes, I may say generally, one is only bound to anticipate such combination of circumstances and accidents and injuries as he may reasonably forecast as likely to happen, taking into account his own past experience and the practice of others in similar circumstances, together with what is inherently probable in the condition of the instrument (wires in this case) as it relates to the conduct of the business. So we said in Snyder v. Electrical Co., 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. 733, 39 L. R. A. 490, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922. But where law requires a particular precaution for safety, and if damage flow from its omission makes it a cause of liability, the above rule does not apply. In other words, the law demands insulation, and if damage arise from its want the law gives action for its omission. Therefore, when the defendant failed to insulate, it was bound to anticipate accident from that failure. It must foresee that it is likely to happen. The accident is the result of the neglect—the probable from it. These views sustain the court in giving plaintiff's instruction 1, and refusing defendant's 14 and 15. The former says that though the defendant did fail to insulate and inspect, yet that if injury by contact with the wire under the circumstances of the case was not, and could not be, foreseen by an ordinarily prudent and careful man as reasonably likely to flow from failure to insulate and inspect, then the injury was not the proximate cause of such failure, and the jury should find for the defendant. The other instruction is substantially the same. Notice in instruction 12 in the Snyder Case the words "together with what is inherently probable in the condition of the wires as they relate to the conduct of its business." Even under this the defendant would, in this case, be bound to anticipate accident. Would it not, in the conduct of its business, be bound to look for accident from known defect of wires, from an omission of a plain duty imposed upon it by law?

The plaintiff's instruction 2 is contested. "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that Earl Thomas was attempting to release the banner on the north side of the balcony mentioned in evidence, and leaned over the balcony in such a way that he was brought in close proximity to the wire of the defendant, and that by some accident his hand came in contact with said wire, and that said wire at the point of contact was improperly insulated, and that he thereby received from said wire the shock of electricity which caused his death, and further believe that he received such shock of electricity by reason of the failure of the defendant to properly insulate its wires at the point where Earl Thomas came in contact therewith, then the jury should find a verdict for the plaintiff." It is said there was no evidence that by accident the hand of Thomas came in touch with the wire. Whether he purposely did so, or his hand unintentionally came in contact, or whether he did so to steady himself, or to save himself from falling, were questions for the jury on the evidence. It is said that it took from the jury the question whether he received his death from "the" shock of electricity, instead of "a" shock. This is too refined a criticism. The words "if they believe from the evidence" applied to this cause, and left it to the jury to say whether death came from the shock of electricity.

Instruction 3 seems proper—"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that one of the wires of the defendant, in close proximity to the north end of the balcony mentioned in evidence, was not properly insulated, and that Earl Thomas was attempting to release the banner on the north end of said balcony, and leaned over said balcony, and, without negligence on his part, was thereby brought in contact with said wire where it was improperly insulated, and by reason of such contact received a shock of electricity from said wire which caused his death, then the jury should find a verdict for the plaintiff."

Instruction 4: "The court instructs the jury that even if they believe from the evidence that Earl Thomas knew of the presence of the wire of the defendant company near the balcony mentioned in evidence, and further believe that when in the act of releasing or attempting to release the banner on the north end of said balcony he was brought in such close proximity to such wire that he took hold of the same to support himself, this fact will not excuse the defendant from liability if the jury believe from the evidence that Earl Thomas did not know that it was dangerous to touch said wire, and that he, in taking hold of said wire, received such a shock of electricity by coming in contact therewith that his death was caused thereby, and provided further that the jury believe such shock was caused by defective or improper insulation of said wire at the point where Thomas came in contact with it." It is said there was no evidence going to show that Thomas took hold of the wire to support himself, and there was no need for him doing so, the rail of the balcony being in front of him, and he would not seize a wire 30 inches away. Now, the jury had from evidence and the nature and circumstances to say how Thomas came to take hold of the wire, to form a conclusion upon that question, by inference from the circumstances, and this objection cannot be held good. It is also said that the jury could not find that he did not know it was dangerous to take hold of the wire, he having had experience in working with electric wires. If a wire is insulated, there is little or no danger in taking hold of it, as all persons of experience know. Hence the courts have said that, as it may be presumed that in places where there should be there is such insulation, a person is not guilty of contributory negligence in taking hold of one, if the person do not know of defective insulation. It was dark at the time of the occurrence. Griffin v. United Elec. Co., 164 Mass. 492, 41 N. E. 675, 32 L. R. A. 400, 49 Am. St. Rep. 477; Clements v. La. Elec. L. Co. (La.) 11 South. 51, 16 L. R. A. 43, 32 Am. St. Rep. 348; Brown v. Elec. Co. (Md.) 45 Atl. 182, 46 L. R. A. 745, 78 Am. St. Rep. 442; Joyce on Electric Law, § 445. It is said the last part of the instruction does not tell the jury that it must find from the evidence as to insulation. The instruction opens with the requirement that they find facts from evidence, not from guess; such is the purport of the instruction. Can we surmise that the jury did not know this?

Plaintiff's instruction 5: "The court instructs the jury that if they find for the plaintiff they shall assess such damage as they think fair and just, not exceeding ten thousand dollars." This is in the language of section 6, c. 103, Code 1899. Certainly there can be no error in an instruction in the words of the law. It seems to be urged that the instruction should not have been given in this form, but that the court should have instructed that the jury must give only compensative damages for pecuniary loss, and not for solace or consolation, to the father, who gets the recovery as sole distributee, and it does not appear that the deceased contributed to the father's support. In connection with the instruction it is urged that the construction given this statute in Turner v. Railroad, 40 W. Va. 675, 22 S. E. 83, and Sample v. Light, 50 W. Va. 474, 40 S. E. 597, 694, 57 L. R. A. 186, is not the proper construction. Those cases hold that in actions for death under the statute no damages found by the jury can be deemed excessive to set aside the verdict, its determination being absolute and exclusive as to what amount is fair and just, unless the verdict evinces passion, prejudice, partiality or corruption in the jury. Authorities are cited from other states to show that in them the statute only contemplates actual, pecuniary loss. The construction given a statute similar to ours in two Virginia cases cited by Judge Dent in the Turner Case agrees with that case. As shown in the Virginia cases, and by Judge Snyder in Searle v. Railroad Co., 32 W. Va. 377, 9 S. E. 251, our statute differs from the English act and the acts of other states in that those acts give damages for "pecuniary injuries resulting," whereas our statute omits those words, limiting recovery to compensation for "pecuniary injuries," and says that "in every such action the jury may give such damages as they shall deem fair and just, not exceeding ten thousand dollars." Code 1887, c. 103, § 6. Observe, the statute is broad. It says, "whenever the death of a person shall be caused by a wrongful act, neglect or default, * * * the person who, or the corporation which, * * * shall be liable." Id. § 5. It applies to persons and corporations, making them equally liable, and the power given the jury applies to both. There is no discrimination. We are cited to Ricketts v. Ches. & O. R. Co., 33 W. Va. 433, 10 S. E. 801, 7 L. R. A. 354, 25 Am. St. Rep. 901, holding that corporations are not liable to punitive damages for wrongs, but only compensatory damages, even where the act is wanton, willful, and malicious on the part of those acting for the corporation, unless the act is expressly or impliedly authorized or ratified by it. Such seems to be the better rule, though there are cases to the contrary. Lake Shore Co. v. Prentice, 47 U. S. 101, 13 Sup. Ct. 261, 87 L. Ed. 97; Spellman v. Richmond R. Co. (S. C.) 14 S. E. 947, 28 Am. St. Rep. 858, 876; Warner v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal.) 45 Pac. 187, 54 Am. St. Rep. 327; B. & O. R. Co. v. Barger (Md.) 45 Am. St. Rep. 319, and note; 1 Sedgw. on Dam. § 380. This is because corporations act only through agents, and are held to be incapable of malice and wantonness. Many cases, however, hold that as they act only by agents, if not held as individuals for their acts, they would enjoy an immunity above others by that rule, and might do great wrong without the ability in courts to deter others by making an example of them. However the Legislature has power to subject them to punitive damages, and we think that it has done so in this act. It is an exception to the general rule. Moreover, the jury in this case was not confined to damages at once ensuing to the father of Thomas. It could include probable pecuniary damages that might ensue in future; for the father was a workingman, and might come to great age and want, might be a paralytic. So we cannot say this verdict is clearly punitive for smart money. Searle v. Railway Co., 32 W. Va. 377, 9 S. E. 248. We cannot overrule the Turner case. We regard it sound law under the statute. But it is said that even under that case we ought to set aside the verdict, because its amount shows it to be the child of passion, prejudice, or partiality. It may be a hard, severe verdict in amount; but if the jury has almost unlimited discretion, we hardly see our way to interfere. There is nothing de hors the record to show such passion, nothing but the circumstances of the case; and the case being one of death, we do not see our way, in view of the power of the jury under the Turner Case, to set aside its actions. That would seem generally to render the meaning given the statute in these cases nugatory. Rare must be the cases where the court can interfere for passion, prejudice, or partiality. The power of juries under this statute being so wide, it is not improper to address to them the admonition tion to be cautious, fair, just, and reasonable in fixing damages.

Exception is made to the action of the court in refusing instructions asked by the defendant. It asked 22, and was granted 10. A number of those refused presented the theory of contributory negligence by Thomas as a defense. In the first place, the court gave four instructions fairly and sufficiently presenting this defense, and others touching it were merely repetitive. In the next place, contributory negligence was not admissible really in the case; at any rate, upon writ of error we can see that we ought not to reverse on that ground, because it was not an adequate defense, and, if the jury had found for it, the verdict would have been wrong. The evidence clearly shows, even the evidence of the defense, that the defendant left the wire uninsulated, and the original insulation had become old and dangerous. Thomas was at work on the balcony removing banners put there, by consent of the lessee of the theater, to advertise a show exhibiting in the opera house, and thus Thomas was there of right. He did not know of the defective insulation. It was dark, between 7 and 8 o'clock in a November night. There was some light in the street, and a little light at the theater window, not its main entrance, not enough to detect the bad insulation. Thomas had some experience with electric wires, but that told him that wires were usually covered and safe, and, under the law given above, he had a right so to assume. Add to this decisions of courts that to touch a wire, ignorant of defective insulation, is not negligence. How, then, can we attribute negligence to Thomas to atone for the gross, long-continued neglect of a company at this public place to use the ordinary care of protecting the wire? One touching a wire where the insulating material is worn off is not guilty of contributory negligence if he did not know its condition. Griffen v. United Elec. Co. (Mass.) 41 N. E. 675, 32 L. R. A. 400, 49 Am. St. Rep. 477. One taking hold of an electric wire badly insulated, ignorant of it, not denied recovery. Giraudi v. Elec. Co. (Cal.) 40 Pac. 108, 28 L. R. A. 506, 48 Am. St. Rep. 114. Contributory negligence is not imputed to one who fails to look out for danger when there is no reason on his part to apprehend it. Every one has a right to presume that another, owing a special duty to guard against danger, has performed it. Engel v. Smith (Mich.) 46 N. W. 21, 21 Am. St. Rep. 549. I consider this law sound, and very apt in this case. "One coming in contact with an electric wire in the necessary discharge of duty will not on that account be guilty of contributory negligence, if it was the duty of the corporation owning such wire to keep it insulated, and it has neglected this duty, and there was nothing in the appearance of the wire to indicate to the person injured such neglect, though he had been cautioned to be careful of the wires and to keep away from them." Clements v. La. Elec. L. Co. (La.) 11 South. 51, 16 L. R. A. 43, 32 Am. St. Rep. 348. "Nor will contributory negligence be ascribed to an innocent person because he failed to suspect that a corporation exposing dangerous wires on a side of a building would neglect properly to insulate them." 1 Thompson on Negligence, §§ 190, 800. This is a very late and fine work of high authority on an important subject. "In many situations a man is justified in law in acting on the presumption that other men have acted lawfully, rightly, carefully, and properly, until he is in some way admonished to the contrary. For example, a workman employed to load, ride on, and unload an elevator is not necessarily negligent in assuming that the elevator is safe." 1 Thompson on Negligence, § 180. Of course, under these principles, there is no error in refusing an instruction requiring the jury to find for the defendant.

The defendant makes many exceptions to the refusal to allow certain questions to be answered, some of which seem not to be much relied upon. Seeing that there was a very full presentation of both sides in the evidence to the jury, and as the case is not to be retried, and they involve no important or new principles, we shall not discuss them to any extent. It is complained that the court ought not to have allowed Feinler, Richardson, and Wilson to testify that they knew of no inspection of the wires by the company. They were about the building, and had opportunity for investigation. It was proper to go to the jury for what it was worth.

It is complained that the court would not allow questions to be answered as to whether banners had not previously been often safely put on and taken from the balcony. I do not see that this is admissible. Certainly not sufficient in materiality for reversal. It only tends to show negligence in Thomas, and, as we have seen, that defense cannot prevail. In fact, evidence to prove this was before the jury. As to many questions we may guess the expected answer, and what was intended to be proven, but it is not shown. Unless a question necessarily imports an answer, we must be told what it was proposed to prove, else we cannot say that the witness could give any answer, or what answer would have come, and cannot tell of its materiality. We could not be asked to reverse under such circumstances. Jackson v. Hough, 38 W. Va. 236, 18 S. E. 575; Greever v. Bank, 99 Va. 547, 39 S. E. 159. The question specified in assignment 15 was answered, and the answer was not excluded. This objection applies to assignments 10, 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24. But I may remark, as to the claim that some of the questions aimed likely to show that the damage came from the wire of another company, that the evidence is clear and unanswerable that Thomas was seen with his hand on defendant's wire, and that this killed him, as he was leaning against the wall just there, and when he was pulled away dropped dead, and the defendant's wire was incontestably bad. What else could have killed him? Such proposed evidence would have been without force before the jury, and its rejection is without materiality on writ of error. We can see this plainly. The theory, too, that deceased might have been injured by having a stick, ironed at ends, and thus produced the injury, is utterly without force.

For these reasons, with some reluctance as to the amount of the judgment, we affirm it.

OLD DOMINION BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. SOHN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Nov. 14, 1903.)

TAX SALES—SEPARATE PART OF LOT—VALIDITY—DEED—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—RIGHT TO OFFICE—NOTARY—JUDGE—ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

1. A separate part of a city, village, or town lot cannot be sold under the provisions of chapter 31 of the Code of 1899. As to such lot, the sale must be of the whole lot or of an undivided interest therein.

2. Where the sale, as to such lot, is described in the memorandum of sale as " $\frac{1}{2}$ of lot 35x120," and in the report of sale as " $\frac{1}{2}$ lot," the quantity sold is an undivided one-half of the lot.

3. In such case the purchaser must cause a survey and report to be made by the county surveyor before obtaining a deed; but the provision of section 17, c. 31, of the Code of 1899, requiring division of the land, is not applicable. It applies only to purchasers of separate quantities or parts of tracts of land, other than city, village, or town lots.

4. Power to sell real estate for nonpayment of taxes must be expressly conferred by law.

5. If the sense of a statute be doubtful, such construction should be given, if possible, as will not conflict with general principles of law.

6. Of two constructions of a statute, either of which is warranted by the words of an amendment, that is to be preferred which best harmonizes with the general tenor and spirit of the act.

7. In construing a statute every word in it must be given its full effect, if that can be done consistently; but, if full effect cannot be given, it must be made effective as far as possible.

8. A statute may be construed contrary to its literal meaning, when a literal construction would result in an absurdity or inconsistency, and the words are susceptible of another construction which will carry out the manifest intention of the Legislature.

9. Words in different parts of a statute must be referred to their proper connections, giving each in its place its proper force.

10. The offices of notary public and judge of a criminal court are incompatible.

11. One who forfeits his right to an office of which he is the incumbent, by accepting another which is incompatible with it, and afterwards performs the functions of the office forfeited, is an officer de facto, and his acts, done before removal from such office, are valid as to persons other than himself.

12. A certificate of acknowledgment, made by a notary public who had accepted the office of judge of a criminal court, is valid.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Bill by the Old Dominion Building & Loan Association against Nathan Sohn. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. A. Ritz and J. M. McGrath, for appellant. W. Walter McClaugherty, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. On the 12th day of December, 1899, Nathan Sohn purchased a lot in the city of Bluefield, as delinquent for the nonpayment of the taxes thereon, at a sale made by the sheriff of Mercer county. In the memorandum and receipt given to him by the sheriff, and in the sheriff's report of sale, said lot is described as having been sold in the name of Irene Cooper for the nonpayment of the taxes thereon for the year 1897, as being 35 by 120 feet in size, and situated in Bluefield. In the memorandum and receipt the quantity of land sold is designated as "1-2 of lot 35x120 Bluefield," and in the report of sale as "1-2 lot." On the 22d day of December, 1900, J. W. Bailey, deputy for E. W. Bailey, surveyor of lands for said county, made a report to the clerk of the county court, which was admitted to record, describing the lot by its location and bounds and record evidence of title, and further showing that there is a house situated on it, that it is impossible to lay off, to said Sohn, the interest purchased by him, without running through said house, and that he, the surveyor, had made no division of said lot. On the 20th day of February, 1901, the clerk of the county court of said county made a deed to Sohn, reciting the delinquency and sale of the land, the purchase by Sohn of "an undivided one-half interest" in said lot, the lapse of more than one year since the time of said purchase, the nonredemption of said lot, and the report made by the surveyor.

This suit was brought by the Old Dominion Building & Loan Association to set aside said deed as illegal and void for the following reasons: First, that, under his purchase, Sohn was not entitled to have a deed for an undivided one-half of the lot, but only for one-half of the lot according to area, not value, and so laid off as not to include the improvements, if practicable; second, that Hugh G. Woods, before whom the deed was acknowledged as a notary public, had, before the date of said acknowledgment, vacated his office by accepting the office of judge of the criminal court of said county, and had no authority to take the acknowledgment; third, that in fact said lot was not delinquent for nonpayment of taxes for the year 1897, as all taxes thereon for said year had been paid.

There was a demurrer to the bill, which the court overruled, and then the defendant answered, and depositions were taken, and upon the hearing the plaintiff tendered the amount of taxes, interest, and costs which the defendant had paid to the sheriff, with interest at 12 per cent. per annum on the aggregate, and offered to pay any additional costs or charges to which the defendant might be entitled, which tender and offer the defendant declined, and thereupon the court entered a decree setting aside the deed, from which decree the defendant has appealed.

In determining whether the purchaser was entitled to a deed for an undivided one-half of the lot, it is necessary to consider the statute governing the sales of delinquent town lots and the execution of deeds therefor. As they now stand sections 8, 17, 19, and 24 of chapter 31 of the Code of 1899, relating to these subjects, are inconsistent and contradictory. To be more explicit, it may be said that section 17 is contradictory of the other sections named. Section 8, prescribing what shall be sold, says: "The sale shall be of each tract of land, or city, village, or town lot, or of such separate quantities or parts of such tract, or of such undivided interest in such lot as shall be sufficient to satisfy the whole of the taxes." This statute separates real estate into two classes—tracts of land and lots. Tracts may be sold in their entirety, or separate quantities, or parts thereof, may be sold. City, village, or town lots may be sold in their entirety, or undivided interests therein may be sold, but there is no provision for the sale of separate quantities or parts of town lots.

Past legislation on this subject makes this interpretation of the statute clear. Section 6 of chapter 37 of the Code of 1860 of Virginia (Code 1868, W. Va. c. 31, § 8) reads as follows: "The sale of tracts of land shall be of each tract separately, or of such quantity or part thereof, as shall be sufficient to satisfy the taxes thereon, with interest and commission as aforesaid, and its proportion of said expense; and the sale of town lots, shall be of each lot separately, or of such undivided interest therein as shall be sufficient to satisfy the taxes thereon, with such interest, commission, and proportion of expense." This section was amended by chapter 206, p. 258, of the Acts of 1871, and made to read in part as follows: "The sale shall be of such tract of land, or town lot, or of such separate quantities or parts of such tract or undivided interest in such lot as shall be sufficient to satisfy," etc. Chapter 117, p. 312, of the Acts of 1872-73 re-enacted said section as found in the Acts of 1871, in so far as it relates to the sale; and chapter 130, p. 391, of the Acts of 1882 amended and re-enacted said section 8, and made it read as it now stands in the Code. That section, read in the light of said previous legislation, and the history of legislation concerning the mode of making sale of delinquent lands and lots, as well as by its terms, clearly means that each town lot shall be sold as a whole or an undivided interest therein shall be sold, and gives no authority for selling a separate quantity or part thereof.

Section 19 of chapter 31 of the Code of 1899 prescribes the form of the deed to be made by the clerk of the county court to the purchaser in the case of a sale of a tract of land or a part thereof. The final clause of that section says: "If the purchase was of a city, town or village lot, or a part thereof, or an undivided interest therein, the above form must be varied according to the facts."

Section 24 says that a deed may be made for an undivided interest in a town lot. The first part of that section reads as follows: "Where two or more tracts or parts of tracts, or city, town or village lots, charged to the same person, or persons, with taxes, for the same year, or years, shall have been sold for taxes and purchased by the same person at such sale, the purchaser thereof, or his heirs, devisees or assigns may obtain from the clerk of the county court several deeds for each tract or part of a tract, and city, town, or village lot, or undivided interest therein, or for any number of them less than the whole, or he may obtain one deed for the whole of them as he may prefer; but every such deed shall describe each tract and part of a tract, and each lot and undivided interest in a lot separately; and such deed when so made for several tracts and parts of tracts, and several lots and undivided interests in several lots, shall be as valid and as effectual to pass to the grantee therein the title, legal and equitable to every such tract, and part of a tract, and to every such lot and undivided interest in a lot, as a separate deed for each would have been if such separate deed had been made to such grantee."

The form of deed prescribed by section 19, applicable to tracts of land, provides for the conveyance to the purchaser of "a tract of land (or ——— acres, part of a tract of land, or the undivided ——— part of a tract of land, as the case may be)," etc.

It will be observed here that although no sale of an undivided interest in a tract of land is authorized, the form of deed provides for the conveyance thereof; and that, although there is no authority given by section 8 for the sale of a part of a town lot, section 19 speaks of a purchase of a part of a town lot. It will be further observed that this confusion and contradiction of section 8 found in section 19 is not carried into section 24. That section harmonizes with section 8.

But the confusion does not stop here. Section 17 says: "The purchaser of a part, or an undivided interest of any tract or city, town or village lot of land, so sold and not redeemed within one year as aforesaid, his heirs or assigns, before obtaining a deed therefor shall, at his or their expense, have the quantity or undivided interest so purchased, surveyed and laid off at his or their expense; the said quantity so laid off to be bounded in part by either or any of the lines of the tract, at the option of the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, so as not to include the improvements on the same (if it can be avoided), and to be in one body, the length whereof shall not be more than double the breadth, where that is practicable. A plat and description thereof shall be returned to the clerk of the county court of the county in which the sale was made, and said clerk shall record the same in the deed book along with the deed to the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, if one be made." This proceeds upon the theory that there can be a sale of a part of a city, town or village lot of land. Moreover, it must be determined whether it means that, in the case of a purchase of an undivided interest, the purchaser can have a deed therefor until he shall have had the same laid off—that is, partition made by the surveyor—although the form of deed in section 19, as well as the express provision of section 24, provides for a conveyance of an undivided interest. A surveyor might with great propriety be authorized to lay off so many acres of a tract, but there could be no reason for the assumption that he is especially fitted or qualified for the division of the tract of land according to quantity, quality, and value, as would be necessary in the case of laying off to the purchaser an undivided interest.

Prior to the act of 1882, the sections concerning the survey, report, and deed were in perfect harmony with the section authorizing the sale. Section 17 of chapter 117, p. 317, of the Acts of 1872-73 provided that the purchaser of a part of any tract of land sold and not redeemed within one year, his heirs or assigns, should have the quantity purchased laid off at his or their expense, and that when the entire tract of land was sold, and not redeemed, the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, should have a report made by the surveyor. No survey or report was required in the case of the purchase of a town lot or an undivided interest therein. As to such a purchase, section 19 provided as follows: "If the sale be of a town lot, or of an undivided interest in such lot, and a report be made by a surveyor describing the same, and such report be ordered by the clerk of the county court to be recorded, the deed shall refer to the said report. But when, in case of a sale of a town lot, or of an undivided interest in such lot, there is no such report, the clerk of the county court shall, nevertheless, execute a deed therefor to the purchaser, if he desires the same."

In determining what Sohn purchased, if anything, at the sale at which he claims to have purchased an undivided one-half of the lot, the statute as it now stands, together with the prior statutes in pari materia, must be considered, and by the principles governing the construction of the statute it must be ascertained what the sheriff had power to sell. Did the Legislature intend, by the changes made in the statute by the act of 1882, to confer upon him authority to sell a part of a town lot? If so, does the statute as it now stands effectuate that intent? A comparison of section 8 of the Acts of 1882 with the same section of the Acts of 1872-73 shows that the former not only re-enacted the latter, but amended it also. Several changes were made in it, but the language determining what should be sold was not altered. Section 24 of the present statute was made up by consolidating, amending, and re-enacting part of section 23 of the act of 1872-73 and the whole of section 24 of that act; and the language above quoted from said section 24 of the present statute, carefully distinguishing between tracts of land and town lots, is entirely new and not found in the old statute. This careful preservation of the language, conferring authority to sell and prescribing the mode of sale, which had been carried in the statutes of Virginia from a date so remote as 1832, when sales by the sheriff for delinquency were first authorized, and in those of this state to the present time, strongly argues that there has been no intention to depart from it or to alter. But the language used in sections 17 and 19 militates against this view, and indicates that the Legislature had a contrary intention, for those sections assume that purchases of parts of town lots can be made. But do they authorize such a sale? They do not do so in express terms. Section 17 says the purchaser of a tract or undivided interest of any tract or city, town, or village lot of land shall have the same laid off. This assumes that there may have been a sale of a part of a town lot. Section 19 says, if the purchase was of a city, town, or village lot, or a part thereof, or an undivided interest therein, the form of the deed shall be varied according to the facts. This is likewise an assumption or supposition only. The most that could be said for this language is that it gives implied authority to sell part of a town lot.

Can such a power arise by implication? Statutes authorizing tax sales are always strictly construed. "Where summary proceedings are authorized by statute, the effect of which is to divest or affect rights of property, the rule holds good that they are to be strictly construed. The power conferred must be exercised precisely as it is given, and any departure will vitiate the whole proceeding. It is, indeed, a general rule that all statutes conferring special ministerial authority by which any man's estate may be affected must be strictly pursued." Sedg. Stat. Con. 302. In this work, on page 303, it is said that the validity of statutes authorizing sales of land for nonpayment of taxes was at first seriously questioned on the ground of their being in conflict with the constitutional provision which in most, if not all, the states, guarantees to every citizen "the protection of the law of the land," and that, while this objection has been overruled and the power sustained on the grounds of immemorial usage and state necessity, it has been held in all cases that it must be strictly pursued, and that its exercise will be vigilantly watched. Such being the nature of the power of sale of lands for nonpayment of taxes, and the rule of construction applicable to statutes conferring it, it seems clear that it cannot arise by mere implication, but must be expressly conferred. This view is supported by Blackwell on Tax Titles, § 551, where it is said: "The officer who executes the power of selling land for taxes can exercise no implied power whatever. He acts in hostility to the owner of the estate, and not as his agent, and he must pursue his authority literally." Section 125 of the same work says, in part: "It is a naked power, which in this instance may be defined to be a power operating upon an estate, in which the officer who executes it has no manner of interest, and over which he has no control other than that which the law has expressly delegated to him. It is a statutory power, depending alone upon the will of the sovereign, and not upon the consent of the owner. The statute creates the power, selects the agent to execute it, and prescribes the formalities which shall attend its execution."

To sustain such a power on the theory of implication would violate another well-settled rule of construction. The statute is inconsistent in its terms. In such case "regard must be had to all the parts of a statute, and to the other concurrent legislation in pari materia, and the whole should, if possible, be made to harmonize; and, if the sense be doubtful, such construction should be given, if it can be, as will not conflict with the general principles of law, which it may be assumed the Legislature would not intend to disregard or change." Suth. Stat. Con. § 287. The reason for withholding the power to sell a part of a town lot is obvious. The purchaser may select the part he buys. His selection is only limited to the extent that it must be bounded in part by either or any lines of the tract, and not be more than twice as long as it is wide, where that is practicable, and not include the improvements, if that can be avoided. Under this, the front only of a valuable lot might be so taken as to render the residue practically valueless, or a valuable building may be cut into. These are the considerations upon which the section of the statute authorizing the sale and prescribing the mode thereof has withheld from the sheriff the power to sell a part of a town lot. For 70 years this authority has been withheld, and such construction should not be given the statute as to contravene so important a principle of statutory law, when another can be given without it, and one of two different constructions must be adopted. While gross negligence is not to be imputed to the Legislature (Sedg. Stat. Con. 366), no rule of law prevents the court from attributing an inconsistency to the accidental or inadvertent misuse of words in a statute. This conclusion is adverse to the theory advanced by counsel for the appellee. The purchaser took an undivided interest in the lot, if anything.

It will be observed that his purchase is not described in the memorandum and receipt and report of sale as an undivided one-half of the lot. These papers say the purchase was for one-half of the lot. As has been shown, the power of sale must be strictly pursued. It cannot be departed from in any material respect. Is the omission of the word "undivided" material? Is it fatal to the sale and the deed? To say that it is would be to restrict the language, and make it mean less than its terms import. One-half of the lot means the one-half of the lot according to quantity and value, not merely according to its area. If the word "undivided" had been prefixed, it could have meant only that one-half of the lot had been sold, but that the lot had not been severed so as to give sole possession and enjoyment of the one-half to the purchaser thereof. It would have neither enlarged nor restricted the meaning of the words "one-half of lot." While the selling officer can exercise no implied power, it is to be observed that he had express power and authority to sell an undivided interest. Having such power, there is a presumption in favor of his having properly exercised it. "In Ives v. Lynn [7 Conn. 505], where it did not appear affirmatively in the deed or return of sale that no more land was sold than was necessary to raise the amount of taxes due upon the entire tract offered, the court held that it was a presumption of law that the collector performed his duty, and conducted the auction fairly and properly; and in the absence of proof rebutting this presumption the sale was sustained as far as this point was concerned." Blackwell on Tax Titles, § 542. The presumption of a sale of an undivided one-half is aided by the failure of the statute to give power to sell anything but an undivided interest in a town lot, and the further consideration that nothing is laid off prior to the sale for any purchase. The severance from the whole tract of a part of a tract purchased at a tax sale is made long after the sale. Upon these considerations, the conclusion that an undivided interest was sold is irresistible.

An undivided one-half of the lot having been purchased, was it essential to the procurement of the deed to have this laid off as prescribed by section 17 of chapter 31? That section says the purchaser of a part or an undivided interest of any tract or city, town, or village lot of land shall have the same surveyed and laid off in the manner therein prescribed before obtaining a deed therefor, and section 18 says if the purchase be of an entire city, village, or town lot, no survey or report thereof need be made. If sections 17 and 18 are to be literally applied.

there must be a partition in the case of the purchase of an undivided interest—partition to be made by the surveyor. These sections import that there shall be no conveyance of an undivided interest. But it has been seen that section 24 contemplates and authorizes a deed for an undivided interest, as does also the form of deed prescribed by section 19. Here is a flat contradiction and irreconcilable inconsistency, upon a consideration of the letter of the statute alone. Such a condition of the statute calls upon the court for construction. One part of it says there shall be partition. Other parts say there need not be partition. There cannot be partition in the manner prescribed by this statute without a violent innovation upon the general law of partition—an innovation which does violence to the principles underlying that law. Compulsory partition is the exercise of judicial power and functions. Obedience to the letter of this statute makes it a mere ministerial function. It authorizes the county surveyor to make the partition without any inquiry as to his fitness and capacity for the performance of such duty, and without any judicial supervision of his action. Where there is inconsistency and the sense of the statute is doubtful, a construction should not be given that is in conflict with the general principles of law. It may be assumed that the Legislature did not intend to disregard or change them. Suth. on Stat. Con. § 287. The statute must be construed as a whole, and all parts thereof given effect, if possible. Every word must have some effect, if possible, but words may be restrained and limited to an effect less than that which they literally import. "A construction which must necessarily occasion great public and private mischief must never be preferred to a construction which will occasion neither, or not in so great a degree, unless the terms of the instrument absolutely require such preference. Of two constructions, either of which is warranted by the words of the amendment of a public act, that is to be preferred which best harmonizes the amendment with the general tenor and spirit of the act amended. A statute may be construed contrary to its literal meaning, when a literal construction would result in an absurdity or inconsistency, and the words are susceptible of another construction which will carry out the manifest intention." Suth. Stat. Con. § 323.

There is another principle or rule of construction which, applied to this statute, enables the court to give some effect to the language of sections 17 and 18, without carrying that effect to the extent of requiring partition in the case of a purchase of an "undivided interest." General words, when the sense requires it, and the intention will be furthered thereby, may be taken distributively. A part of a tract may be laid off according to the mode prescribed by section 17. A town lot in which an undivided interest has been purchased may be surveyed, and a report made, giving a description of the whole lot to be followed by the deed. Thus, in either case the surveyor may perform a function without going to the extreme of making a partition, and it must be held that this is the meaning of that statute, and that the Legislature intended no more than that. "Survey" and "report," as found in these two sections, are applicable to purchases of whole tracts and undivided interests in town lots. "Laid off" must be limited and held to refer only to purchases of parts of tracts of land. "Words in different parts of a statute must be referred to their proper connections, giving each in its place its proper force." Suth. Stat. Con. § 282. Upon this construction of the statute, no partition was necessary, and there was power in the clerk to make the deed conveying an undivided interest, notwithstanding there was no division of the lot. Before such deed could be made, a report of the surveyor was necessary, and such report was made.

The contention that the land was improperly returned and sold because the taxes had been paid thereon is wholly unsupported by the evidence. The description of the land in the memorandum of sale and report of sale has been already set out in a former part of this opinion. The description found in the tax receipts exhibited with the bill, the only evidence of payment offered, does not correspond with it. In one of these receipts the property is described in it, not as a town lot, but as being "acres of land." In the other its character is not indicated further than that it is real estate. The valuation in these two receipts corresponds, thus indicating that it is the same property. One receipt is from the sheriff and the other from the city sergeant, and both are for the year 1897. Nor does the amount of tax in the sheriff's receipt, relied upon as evidence of payment of the tax, correspond with that found in the memorandum of sale and the report of sale. In the receipt the total amount of taxes for state, county, and district purposes is two dollars. In the memorandum and report, the taxes, including interest thereon, which could not possibly be large, the time being only two years, amount to $9.46.

It remains now to inquire whether the deed is void because acknowledged before one who had vacated his office of notary public by accepting the office of judge of the criminal court. The two offices are clearly incompatible. "No judge, during his term of office, shall practice the profession of law or hold any other office, appointment or public trust, under this or any other government, and the acceptance thereof shall vacate his judicial office. Nor shall he, during his continuance therein, be eligible to any political office." Section 16, art. 8, Const. W. Va. While this does not say in terms that an office held by a person at the time he qualifies as a judge shall be thereby vacated, it does forbid the holding of any other office while acting as judge. This inhibition is express, and, to make the language effective, it must be held that the acceptance of the office of judge vacates the other office. It is a rule of common law that, where a person holding one office accepts another incompatible office under the same government, his right to the former is, by such acceptance, ended and nullified. Rodman v. Harcourt, 4 B. Mon. (Ky.) 224. The offices of notary public and judge may be incompatible under article 5 of the Constitution, declaring that the legislative, executive, and judicial departments shall be separate and distinct, and that no person shall exercise the powers of more than one of them at the same time, except that justices of the peace shall be eligible to the Legislature, but the decision of this question is unnecessary. Woods forfeited the office of notary public by qualifying as judge of the criminal court. Does it follow that the certificate of acknowledgment is void?

In the brief of counsel for appellant, Maupin on Title of Real Estate, p. 59, is quoted, as showing that if a person taking an acknowledgment and making a certificate thereof assumed to act in an official capacity in doing so, and had color of title to the office, the certificate would be held good in a collateral proceeding on the ground that the taking of the acknowledgment is the act of a de facto officer, and cannot be questioned in such proceeding. The work referred to is not in the library, but the proposition is well supported by authority. Indeed, it goes further than that. Such acts will be sustained in any proceeding, collateral or direct, in the interest of third parties or the public. They are only invalid as against the public and as to the de facto officer himself. He cannot set them up in his own favor or against the public. "The act of an officer de facto, where it is for his own benefit, is void, because he shall not take advantage of his own want of title which he must be cognizant of; but where it is for the benefit of strangers or the public, who are presumed to be ignorant of such defect of title, it is good." Rodman v. Harcourt, 4 B. Mon. (Ky.) 224, 233. To the same effect see McGregor v. Balch, 14 Vt. 423, 39 Am. Dec. 231; Hoglan v. Carpenter, 4 Bush (Ky.) 89; Attorney General v. Marston, 66 N. H. 485, 22 Atl. 560, 13 L. R. A. 670; Green v. Wardwell, 17 Ill. 273, 63 Am. Dec. 366; Woodside v. Wagg, 71 Me. 207; Johnson v. McGinly, 76 Me. 432; Petersilea v. Stone, 119 Mass. 465, 20 Am. Rep. 335; State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, 9 Am. Rep. 409; Pooler v. Reed, 73 Me. 129; Brown v. Lunt, 37 Me. 423; Belfast v. Morrill, 65 Me. 580.

This line of cases has been selected, not only to show the extent to which the acts of de facto officers are held valid, but to show, as well, that a person who forfeits an office by the acceptance of another incompatible one, and then exercises the functions of the office forfeited, is held to be an officer de facto, and that his acts are held valid as to third parties until the office so forfeited has been adjudged and declared vacant. Thus, in Hoglan v. Carpenter, a postmaster accepted the office of county judge, and continued to hold the office of postmaster. As he held one office under the federal government, which the state courts had no power to declare vacant, it was held that he was a judge de facto, and not de jure, the state court having power to declare the office of judge vacant, but that his acts were binding and valid as to third parties in all proceedings. In Woodside v. Wagg, the judge of the municipal court accepted a seat in the Legislature, by which action he ended his office of judge, but continued to perform its functions, and his acts were held valid, although it was said he might be removed upon information filed against him in behalf of the state. In Johnson v. McGinly, the disclosure of a poor debtor was held valid, in an action on a poor debtor's bond, although one of the persons selected to hear it had, subsequent to the date of his qualification as a trial justice, accepted, and was holding, the incompatible office of constable. In Commonwealth v. Kirby, 2 Cush. 577, on an indictment for assault and battery and resistance to an officer, it was held to be no defense that the officer acted under a warrant issued by a justice who had disqualified himself by accepting an incompatible office. In Sheehan's Case, 122 Mass. 445, 23 Am. Rep. 374, the court refused to discharge, on a writ of habeas corpus, a person who had been committed to jail on a conviction of larceny by a judge who had forfeited his office of judge of the police court by accepting a seat in the general court. In Pooler v. Reed, 73 Me. 129, an action of trespass for an illegal arrest, the defendant was not permitted to justify for the reason that he made the arrest as constable, which office he had held, but had forfeited by accepting the office of justice of the peace. The court said that as to the public and third persons his act was valid, but, as the action was against him for his illegal act, he could not justify, and thereby take the benefit of it.

An authority binding upon this court as to the general proposition is Maddox v. Ewell, 2 Va. Cas. 59, the syllabus in which reads, in part, as follows: "Quere: If a justice of the peace accept the office and commission of a coroner, is that a forfeiture of his office of justice? But if it does, yet such acceptance does not vacate such of his subsequent acts as justice, as may have been done before his disqualification is established by some proper judicial proceeding for that purpose instituted." In exact alignment with this is the doctrine announced in Adam v. Mengel (Pa.) 8 Atl. 606; Keyser v. McKissam, 2 Rawle, 140; County v. Trimmer, 95 Pa. 97. Adam v. Mengel decides a proposition very nearly like the one here under consideration. A justice of the peace accepted the incompatible office of clerk of the courts of oyer and terminer and quarter sessions of his county, and afterwards took the acknowledgment of a mortgagor, and the acknowledgment was held good. To the same effect is Davidson v. State, 135 Ind. 254, 34 N. E. 972, where, on a trial for murder, a deed was offered in evidence, the acknowledgment of which had been taken before a notary public who was then filling the office of deputy recorder, and the court said: "The notary was at least an officer de facto, and his acts, as to third parties, were valid"—citing Leech v. State, 78 Ind. 570, and Baker v. Wambaugh, 99 Ind. 312. To the cases herein referred to, holding that a notary public is an officer, within the meaning of this rule, may be added Governor v. Gordon, 15 Ala. 72, and People v. Rathbone, 145 N. Y. 434, 40 N. E. 395, 23 L. R. A. 384. Both solemnly deciding that a notary public is an officer.

While this court has never ruled upon the exact point raised here, it has declared the general principle asserted in the cases above cited. Knight v. West Union, 45 W. Va. 194, 32 S. E. 163; State v. Carter, 49 W. Va. 709, 39 S. E. 611. Moreover, this general principle of the common law has been declared by statute. "All judgments given and all acts done by any person, by authority or color of any office, or the deputation thereof, under the restored government of Virginia or of this state, before his removal therefrom, shall be valid, though it may afterwards be decided or adjudged that he was not lawfully elected or appointed or was disqualified to hold the office, or that the same had been forfeited or vacated." Section 15, c. 7, Code 1899.

Are the former owner and grantee of a tract of land, sold and conveyed for nonpayment of taxes thereon, "third parties," within the meaning of this proposition of law? The former owner is no party to the deed. That instrument is adverse to him. It takes up and passes his title to another, and cuts off his equity of redemption under the statute. The recordation of it is intended to bind him by constructive notice, just as that of other deeds binds purchasers for value without notice and creditors; and it goes further, binding him whether he has notice or not. One of its peculiar purposes is to give him notice that the deed has been made in the second year after the sale, and that the right of redemption is forever gone. The grantee is a party to the deed, and, as claimant thereunder, it is to his interest to uphold it. His situation is similar to that of any other purchaser. But this is not the test. "Third parties," as used by the courts in the cases cited, means persons other than the de facto officer. His acts are invalid as to him, but valid as to all other persons. Such is the language of the judges and the result of the decisions, and our statute has, at least, as much breadth and force.

The statute does not expressly require a tax deed to be acknowledged. It does require the recordation of such deed, and that may, by implication, make acknowledgment necessary to its validity. But it is unnecessary to decide this question. If acknowledgment is not essential, the deed is good. If it is essential, the acknowledgment is good under the principles above noted, and, as there is no other valid objection to the deed, it is good.

The law being adverse to the appellee upon all the questions presented, the decree is erroneous, and must be reversed, and the bill dismissed, with costs.

STATE v. DODDS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 5, 1903.)

CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. It is the object and office of instructions to define for the jury, and to direct their attention to, the legal principles which apply to and govern the facts proved or presumed in the case. The instructions should simply develop the rules of law governing the particular facts—all the facts, not a part only, which the evidence tends to establish; and they are to be interpreted and judged of not in any abstract way, but with reference to those facts.

2. The instructions given to the jury must be taken together, and it is not necessary to insert in each separate instruction all the exceptions, limitations, and conditions which are inserted in the instructions as a whole.

3. An instruction which singles out and gives undue prominence to certain facts, ignoring other facts proved and of equal importance in a proper determination of the case, is improper.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Matt Dodds was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Hale & Pendleton and R. C. & B. McClaugherty, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General and J. M. Anderson, for the State.

MILLER, J. At the January term, 1903, of the criminal court of Mercer county, Matt Dodds, the plaintiff in error, was indicted for the murder of one Lee Palmer. At the same term he demurred to the indictment, and the demurrer was overruled. He then entered his plea of not guilty, upon which issue was joined. The indictment is in the form prescribed by section 1 of chapter 144 of the Code of 1899, and is sufficient upon demurrer or motion to quash. State v. Douglass, 41 W. Va. 537, 23 S. E. 724. At the following April term the defendant was tried, found guilty of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to be confined in the penitentiary for eight years. To this judgment and sentence the defendant was refused a writ of error by the circuit court of the county aforesaid. Defendant then applied for, and was by this court allowed, a writ of error. On the trial certain instructions were given to the jury at the instance of the state to which defendant objected, and certain other instructions were given at his instance, and others offered by him were refused, to which refusal he excepted. All of the rulings of the court, the instructions given as well as those refused, and the evidence introduced by both the state and defendant, are certified in a bill of exceptions, and made part of the record.

Plaintiff in error insists that the verdict of the jury was and is contrary to the law and evidence, and should have been set aside; that the court erred in giving to the jury the instructions for the state, and in refusing to give instructions Nos. 4, 5, and 6 asked for by him. The evidence proves: That both defendant, Dodds, and the deceased, Lee Palmer, were machinists, and at the time of the homicide were employed by the Norfolk & Western Railway Company in its roundhouse in Bluefield, in said county. That on the 18th day of December, 1902, about 2:30 p. m., the defendant and one Mike Sullivan came to said roundhouse together. That at the time Palmer was in the cab of an engine, repairing it. That one J. R. Tillson was his helper, and engaged in aiding Palmer in making the repairs. That a helper is one who does the heavy work of a machinist, but is not himself a machinist. That when Dodds and Sullivan came up to where said engine was Sullivan passed on and did not say anything, but Dodds stopped, and asked Tillson what he was doing machinist work for, and Tillson replied that he was doing what Palmer had told him to do. Dodds then said, "Just wait and see what I will say to him," and about that time Palmer came out of the cab from his work. Dodds then said to him, "What are you letting your helper do machinist work for?" Palmer replied that he was not letting his helper do machinist work, and Dodds replied, "The hell you ain't," or something to that effect. Dodds and Palmer then began to dispute, and Dodds struck Palmer. That several licks were then struck by the parties, and then Dodds struck Palmer on the head with his pistol. They then became separated about eight feet. That both of them appeared to be angry and excited. That Palmer then with clenched fist, and the appearance of being angry, came towards Dodds, and Dodds advanced toward Palmer. That when they got together witness thought Palmer rather fell up against Dodds, and that Dodds had his pistol in his hand, and put it up against Palmer's breast, and the pistol fired. Palmer fell to the ground, and died in a few minutes, and Dodds walked away. Witness says that when Dodds and Palmer were striking at each other he saw Dodds take his pistol out of his overcoat pocket and strike Palmer once on the head with it; that he saw nothing in Palmer's hands, during the fight, except what appeared to be a pipe. After the shooting Palmer's tools were on the steam chest, where he had had them about his work. Another witness says that Palmer, during the fight, had nothing in his hands except a pipe. It is also shown that the two men were about the same size.

The defendant testified that he was a member of the organization known as the "Machinists' Union"; that he was a member of the committee of the organization whose duty it was to see that the rules and regulations of the organization were not violated by any of its members; that on the day Palmer was killed he was in the city of Bluefield, in Corvin's pool room, where he had gone to see some acquaintances; that while he was there Mike Sullivan asked him to go over to the machine shops and roundhouse with him; that Sullivan stated that he wanted to see a man there by the name of Thomas, on business; that he went along simply at Sullivan's request; that he saw a man working on an engine, doing machinist work; that he asked him whether he was a machinist or a helper; that the person replied that he was a helper, and doing the work that Palmer had directed him to do; that Palmer came out of the cab of the engine about that time, when defendant asked him what he was letting his helper do his work for; that Palmer replied, "He is not doing my work; he is doing just what I told him to do." Defendant then said, "The hell he ain't," and Palmer replied, "It is none of your damned business," and defendant said to Palmer that it was his business; that he was a member of the committee of the Machinists' Union whose duty it was to see that a helper did not perform a machinist's work; that Palmer then went to his tool chest on the engine, and defendant thought he got a cold chisel (which is a piece of iron a foot or a foot and a half long), and that they then advanced toward each other. Defendant also testified that during the fight he received a wound on the back of his left hand and on the wrist of his left arm. He stated, among other things, that the night before the shooting he had stayed at a house of ill fame in Bluefield, and that on the day of the occurrence he had taken two or three drinks of whisky. He also gave considerable other testimony, not of a very convincing character, the object of which was to mitigate and reduce the grade of the offense charged.

The instructions given by the court at the instance of the state are in the words following:

"No. 1. The court instructs the jury that under the law a person is presumed to intend that which he does, or which is the immediate and necessary consequences of his acts; and if the jury believe from the evidence in this case that the prisoner, Matt Dodds, with a deadly weapon, without any or upon slight provocation, intentionally shot and killed Lee Palmer in Mercer county, then the prisoner, under the law, is presumed to be guilty of murder in the first degree.

"No. 2. The court instructs the jury that in considering all the evidence in this case they may consider the evidence of the prisoner, and how far, if at all, his interest in the case might bias his testimony, and to give his evidence and all other evidence in the case just such weight as they may think it entitled to.

"No. 3. The court instructs the jury that in the indictment in this case there is charged murder of the first degree, murder of the second degree, voluntary manslaughter, involuntary manslaughter, and assault and battery. Murder of the first degree is punished in this state by death or confinement in the penitentiary for life. Murder of the second degree is punished by confinement in the penitentiary not less than five nor more than eighteen years. Voluntary manslaughter is punished by confinement in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years. Involuntary manslaughter and assault and battery are misdemeanors, and punished by confinement in jail, or fine, or both.

"No. 4. The court instructs the jury that a reasonable doubt, such as is contemplated in law, is not a mere fanciful or imaginary doubt, but is a fair and substantial doubt, based on the evidence or lack of evidence in the case, and one for which a man who entertains such doubt should be able to give a good and substantial reason arising from the evidence or a lack of evidence in the case."

The court also gave to the jury, on request of the defendant, the following instructions:

"No. 1. The court instructs the jury that they have no right to arbitrarily disbelieve the testimony of the prisoner, but that they should weigh and consider his testimony the same as any other witness in the case, giving to it such weight as they think it is entitled to.

"No. 2. The court instructs the jury that accidental killing is not such a matter of defense as throws upon the prisoner the burden of proving it by a preponderance of the evidence; that it is the duty of the state to allege and prove in this case that the prisoner killed Lee Palmer intentionally or willfully; and, if the evidence in the case, taken all together, raises in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to whether the prisoner killed Lee Palmer intentionally or accidentally, they should not find the prisoner guilty of anything higher than involuntary manslaughter, or assault and battery.

"No. 3. The court tells the jury that if they believe from the evidence in the case that on the day that Lee Palmer was killed, and before he was killed, the prisoner and one Mike Sullivan went to the machine shops referred to in the evidence, and that the prisoner went there at the request of the said Sullivan, as detailed in his evidence, and that after the prisoner got to the said machine shops he became engaged in a quarrel with the said Palmer, which resulted in a fight between them, and that while engaged in said quarrel and fight the said Palmer and the prisoner were excited, angry, and that their passions were aroused, and that in said fight, while the prisoner was excited, angry, and his passions aroused, he shot and killed the said Palmer, they cannot find the prisoner guilty of anything higher than voluntary manslaughter."

But the court refused to give, at the instance of the defendant, the following:

"No. 4. The court instructs the jury that there is charged in the indictment in this case voluntary manslaughter and murder in the second degree, and if they believe from the evidence in the case that the prisoner is guilty of one of said offenses, and they have a reasonable doubt as to which of said two offenses he is guilty of, they should give to him the benefit of said doubt, and find him guilty of voluntary manslaughter.

"No. 5. The court instructs the jury that there is charged in the indictment in this case assault and battery and voluntary manslaughter, and if they believe, from the evidence in the case, that the prisoner is guilty of one of said offenses, and they have a reasonable doubt as to which of said two offenses he is guilty, they should give to him the benefit of said doubt, and find him guilty of assault and battery.

"No. 6. The court instructs the jury that among the other offenses charged in the indictment in this case there is charged murder in the second degree and voluntary manslaughter, and that if they believe from the evidence in this case that the prisoner is guilty of one of the said offenses of murder in the second degree or voluntary manslaughter, and they have reasonable doubt as to which of two said offenses the prisoner is guilty, then they should find him guilty of voluntary manslaughter."

It is contended for plaintiff in error that upon the facts and circumstances disclosed by the record he is not guilty of a higher grade of offense than voluntary manslaughter. It is argued that instruction No. 1 given at the instance of the state does not propound the law correctly. The instruction seems to have been taken from Cain's Case, 20 W. Va. 681, and Welch's Case, 36 W. Va. 690, 15 S. E. 419, but it does not contain the words, "and the necessity rests upon him of showing extenuating circumstances; and, unless he proves such extenuating circumstances, or they appear from the case made by the state, he is guilty of murder in the first degree," found in point 6 of the syllabus of the last-mentioned case. It is pointed out that the instruction is otherwise faulty, because it uses the words, "presumed to be guilty of murder" in the first degree, instead of the words, "is prima facie guilty of murder" in the first degree. It is argued that the latter part of the instruction in Welch's Case, above quoted, is necessary to call the attention of the jury to the prima facie effect of the recited facts if proved to the satisfaction of the jury, and the proof whereby that prima facie effect may be overcome by the defendant; that by the instruction as given the attention of the jury was called to the legal presumption, arising from the facts recited, and which the jury were supposed to believe from the evidence, but that no intimation is given in the instruction as to how this presumption may be rebutted by the accused; that the effect of the instruction is to tell the jury that under the facts set out in the instruction the law presumes the prisoner to be guilty of murder in the first degree; and that they must find the killing to be willful, deliberate, and premeditated. It is the object and office of instructions to define for the jury, and to direct their attention to, the legal principles which apply to and govern the facts, proved or presumed, in the case. "The charge should simply develop the rules of law governing the particular facts—all the facts, not a part only, which the evidence tends to establish; and it is to be interpreted and judged of, not in any abstract way, but with reference to those facts." Blah. Crim. Proc. § 978. "A charge to the jury must be taken together, and it is not necessary to insert in each separate instruction all the exceptions, limitations, and conditions which are inserted in the charge as a whole." Sackett's Instructions, 24; People v. Cleveland, 49 Cal. 578. "Murder by poison, lying in wait, imprisonment, starving, or any willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, or in the commission of or attempt to commit arson, rape, robbery, or burglary, is murder of the first degree. All other murder is murder of the second degree." Code 1899, c. 144, § 1. By instruction No. 3 given at the instance of the state the court informed the jury that in the indictment there was charged (against the defendant) murder of the first and murder of the second degree, voluntary and involuntary manslaughter, and assault and battery; and defined the punishment and penalty which might be imposed upon conviction for any one of the offenses named. In No. 1 the court instructed the jury that if they believed, from the evidence in the case, that the prisoner, Matt Dodds, with a deadly weapon, without any or upon slight provocation, intentionally shot and killed Lee Palmer in Mercer county, then the prisoner, under the law, is presumed to be guilty of murder in the first degree. What is meant by the statement that "the prisoner, under the law, is presumed to be guilty of murder in the first degree?" A "presumption" is a rule of law that courts or juries shall or may draw a particular inference from a particular fact or from particular evidence, unless and until the truth of such inference is disproved. A presumption of law is a rule of law that a particular inference shall be drawn by a court or jury from a particular circumstance. A presumption of fact is a rule of law that a fact otherwise doubtful may be inferred from a fact which is proved. A presumption is an inference as to the existence of a fact, not actually known, arising from its usual or necessary connections with others which are known. Presumptions of fact are but inferences drawn from other facts and circumstances in the case, and should be made upon common principles of induction. Presumptions of fact are at best but mere arguments, and are to be judged by the common and received tests of the truth of propositions and the validity of arguments. Presumption is allowed to prove facts, even in criminal cases; and one of the highest modes of proof is to show the existence of circumstances, which could not have existed if the fact proved had not existed. Juries have the right to infer what a man intends to do and what he actually does from his conduct, beyond the positive testimony in the case. Lawson on Presump. Ev. 639, 640.

From the foregoing definitions we may say that the presumption stated in the instruction under consideration is one of fact, dependent for its force and effect upon the belief of the jury from the evidence in the case, that the defendant, Matt Dodds, with a deadly weapon without any or upon slight provocation intentionally shot and killed Lee Palmer. Under our statute every homicide is prima facie murder in the second degree. Where a homicide is proved, the presumption is that it is murder in the second degree. It is prima facie attended with malice, which enters into murder as one of its ingredients. If the state would elevate it to murder in the first degree, she must establish the characteristics of that crime; and, if the prisoner would reduce it to manslaughter, the burden of proof is upon him. Hill's Case, 2 Grat. 595; Cain's Case, 20 W. Va. 679; Welch's Case, 36 W. Va. 690, 15 S. E. 419. By the statute above cited the willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing of a person is defined to be murder in the first degree. He who does an act willfully does it on purpose; and he who does an act on purpose does it willfully. The next ingredient of the crime is that it must be deliberate. To deliberate is to reflect, with a view to make a choice. If a person reflects, though but for a moment before he acts, it is unquestionably a sufficient deliberation within the meaning of the statute. The last requisite is that the killing must be premeditated. To premeditate is to think of a matter before it is executed. The word "premeditated" would seem to imply something more than "deliberate," and may mean that the party not only deliberated, but had formed in his mind the plan of destruction. Smith's Trial, pp. 230, 321; King v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 88, note. The defendant with his pistol, unlawfully shot and killed Palmer. From that fact alone he is presumed to be guilty of murder in the second degree. A man shall be taken to intend that which he does, or which is the immediate or necessary consequence of his act. Therefore Dodds is prima facie taken to have intentionally, and therefore willfully and purposefully, killed the deceased.

The general definition of the statute does not touch the common-law distinction between murder and manslaughter. It simply divides murder into two classes; murder with specific, deliberate intent to take life being murder in the first degree; murder without such an intent to take life being murder in the second degree. Whart. Hom. § 177. In all of the enumerated cases in section 1 of chapter 144 of the Code of 1890, supra, "the Legislature has declared the law that the perpetrator shall be held guilty of murder in the first degree, without further proof that the death was the ultimate result, which the will, deliberation, and premeditation of the party accused sought. And the same authority has declared the law that any other kind of killing which is sought by the will, deliberation, and premeditation of the party accused shall also be murder in the first degree; but that, as to this other kind of killing, proof must be adduced to satisfy the mind that the death of the party slain was the ultimate result which the concurring will, deliberation, and premeditation of the party accused sought. But to this general rule the same authority adds an exception, which is that any death consequent upon the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate any arson, rape, robbery, or burglary shall be deemed murder in the first degree, and all other murder at common law shall be deemed murder in the second degree. So that the cases within the exception, as now put, and the cases enumerated as first mentioned, are in fact placed upon the same principle: There is no necessity of proof in either to establish the fact that a homicide was intended. And it follows, of course, that all other homicide which was murder at common law is now murder in the second degree, except when it shall be proved that the homicide was the result of a 'willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing'; and it also follows of necessity that, when by the proof the mind is satisfied that the killing was willful, deliberate, and premeditated, such killing must be taken and held to be murder in the first degree. This construction of the act of assembly is consistent with, and supported by the decisions of this court in Burgess' Case, 2 Va. Cas. 493, and Whiteford's Case, 6 Rand. 721, 18 Am. Dec. 771." Jones' Case, 1 Leigh, 611, 612. "By the general concurrence of each of the states in which this distinction has been the subject of examination, the practical working of the statutes has been to divide murder, as limited by the common law, into two classes, leaving the original boundaries between murder and manslaughter unaltered. The statutes, it has been held, in requiring murder in the first degree to be deliberate, do not change the common-law doctrine in that respect with regard to murder; the degree of deliberation requisite in both degrees being the same. The distinctive peculiarity attached by the statutes to murder in the first degree, however, is that it must necessarily be accompanied with a premeditated intention to take life. The 'killing' must be premeditated." Wherever, then, in cases of deliberate homicide, there is a specific intention to take life, the offense, if consummated, is murder in the first degree; if there is not a specific intention to take life, it is murder in the second degree. "To constitute murder of the first degree, the intent of the party killing must have been to take life; whereas, by the common law, if the mortal blow is malicious, and death ensues, the perpetrator is guilty of murder, whether such an intention does or does not appear to have existed in his mind. The injury being malicious, the common law holds the offender responsible for all the consequences following his unlawful act." Whart. Hom. § 177.

By the evidence, no positive intent on the part of the defendant to take the life of Palmer is shown. Such intent could only be proved by Dodds himself, but he could not be compelled to testify against himself. Hence, under the law, the jury had the right to infer or presume that fact from the manner, means, and circumstances of the homicide, as shown by the evidence. The defendant had the right to introduce evidence, if he could produce such, to rebut or overthrow that inference or presumption. If not overturned by the defendant, or by the evidence and circumstances given by the state, the presumption aforesaid may be taken as sufficient evidence of specific intent to kill. The language used in the instruction is, in purport and effect, the same as the words, "prima facie guilty," employed in the Cain Case, supra. A prima facie case is one which is established by sufficient evidence, and can be overturned only by rebutting evidence adduced on the other side. "Prima facie evidence of a fact is such evidence as, in judgment of law, is sufficient to establish the fact; and, if not rebutted, remains sufficient for the purpose." Kelly v. Morris, 6 Pet. 622, 8 L. Ed. 523. The instruction, therefore, is not bad because of the phraseology thereof. The jury evidently did not presume the specific intent of the defendant to kill the deceased, because they found the defendant not guilty of murder in the first, but guilty of murder in the second degree. But admitting the instruction to be faulty, the defendant was not prejudiced thereby. State v. Morrison, 49 W. Va. 210, 38 S. E. 481.

Instruction No. 3, given on behalf of the defendant, does explain to the jury how the grade of the alleged offense may be reduced and found by them to be voluntary manslaughter; and No. 2 states facts which, if proved to the satisfaction of the jury, would justify a finding by them for involuntary manslaughter, or assault and battery. Reading together instructions No. 1 given on motion of the state and Nos. 2 and 3 for the defendant, we find no error therein. Although an instruction, considered by itself, is too general, yet, if it is properly limited by others given on the other side, so that it is not probable it could have misled the jury, judgment will not be reversed on account of such instruction. Sackett's Instr. § 23. The other instructions, given by the court, state the law correctly, and were properly allowed.

Instructions Nos. 4, 5, and 6, offered by the defendant and refused by the court, each single out and give undue prominence to particular offenses, and ignore others charged in the indictment. This question has been so often passed upon and such instructions have been so repeatedly condemned by this court that it is scarcely necessary to here again decide it. Price v. C. & O. R. R. Co., 46 W. Va. 538, 33 S. E. 255, and cases there cited. "An instruction which singles out and gives undue prominence to certain facts, ignoring other facts proved and of equal importance in a proper determination of the case, is improper." Sackett's Instr. § 13. In rejecting said instructions 4, 5, and 6 offered by the defendant the court did not err.

We think the facts and circumstances of the case warrant the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court thereon. We find no error in the record to the prejudice of the defendant. The judgment of the criminal court therefore must be affirmed.

CHEUVRONT v. CHEUVRONT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 21, 1903.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—CONTRACT FOR SEPARATION—SUIT TO ANNUL—DEPOSITIONS—OBJECTIONS TO CERTIFICATE—REVIEW ON APPEAL—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. While it is a general rule that, where a party seeks to cancel a contract for fraud in its procurement, the plaintiff must allege and show himself eager, ready, and willing to place the other party to the contract in statu quo, yet, in case of a wife who sues to annul a contract of separation, and settling property rights between her husband and herself, where it is alleged that the execution of the contract was procured from her by false and fraudulent representations of defendant and his agent, falsely representing that it was the purpose of the defendant to live with and support the wife, and the object of the contract to reconcile and restore their marital relations, and it sufficiently appears from said bill that plaintiff is not able to repay the money given her by the defendant to induce her to execute the contract, held not error to overrule the demurrer to the bill.

2. In order to have the advantage in the appellate court of objections to depositions being read in a cause, for want of proper authentication or proper certification by the officer taking the same, the objections to the reading of the depositions must be made in the court below, and the defective authentication or certificate, with the objection, copied into and made part of the record, as provided in section 3, c. 135, Code 1899.

3. In a suit brought by a wife against the husband to set aside and cancel a deed or contract between them for fraud in its procurement, by which contract the husband obtained an advantage over her, the burden of proof is on the husband to show that the wife was fully informed as to the effects of the transaction, and also the utmost fairness thereof.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Suit by Elizabeth Cheuvront against Joseph Cheuvront and W. S. Stuart. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. S. Stuart, for appellants. D. H. Leonard, for appellee.

McWHORTER, P. This is a suit brought by Elizabeth Cheuvront against Joseph Cheuvront, her husband, and W. S. Stuart, trustee, to set aside a deed or contract entered into between them, dated the 30th day of October, 1899, because the same was procured to be signed and executed by her by fraud and misrepresentations. It appears from the allegations of the bill: That said plaintiff and defendant Joseph Cheuvront were married on the 22d day of November, 1897. At the time of their marriage, plaintiff was a widow, having four children at home with her; the youngest being about 12 years of age. Plaintiff was living in Parkersburg, W. Va., carrying on the grocery business, and where she continued to live until the 9th of January, 1898, when she removed to West Union, in Doddridge county, to live with her husband, a part of the time keeping hotel in what was known as the "Grant Hotel," until April, 1898. That defendant treated plaintiff so cruelly that she returned to Parkersburg and rented a house and commenced keeping boarders for the purpose of maintaining herself and children. That the defendant failed to contribute to her support, and she was compelled to support herself and family without any assistance from her husband. That she brought suit against her husband in the circuit court of Doddridge county in October, 1898, for divorce and alimony, charging cruel and inhuman treatment, and charging defendant with being guilty of open and notorious acts of adultery and fornication with numerous females, and praying for money to pay her counsel fees and for alimony pendente lite. That, while she was so conducting her boarding house, W. J. Horner and his wife, Maggie Horner, on the 31st day of October, 1899, came to plaintiff's house with a deed or contract already prepared, and represented to plaintiff that defendant Joseph Cheuvront was very anxious to become reconciled to plaintiff, and that if plaintiff would sign said contract, and agree to dismiss her suit which was then pending in Doddridge county for divorce and alimony, defendant Cheuvront would immediately come to Parkersburg, and would reside with and take care of plaintiff, and would treat her kindly and be a good husband to her. That said Cheuvront was rich, owned a large amount of property, and was well able to support plaintiff, who was wearing her life out at hard work and drudgery in and about her boarding house, and earning money for the support of herself and her four children, who were living with her. That Horner claimed to be representing her husband as his agent, and offered to pay plaintiff $400 if she would sign said contract and become reconciled to her husband, Joseph Cheuvront. That at the time plaintiff was sick and nervous, and had a great desire to have a home, and be reconciled and reunited to said Cheuvront, if he would live and cohabit with her, and treat her kindly and be a husband to her, and that, without consulting any one—not even her attorneys in said suit—and without properly understanding the contract, with the assurance that said defendant would immediately go to Parkersburg on the same night, and with a promise that said Horner would at once telephone for him to come, plaintiff accepted the $400, and signed the contract. That plaintiff afterwards learned that Cheuvront had employed Horner as his agent, and had given him $750 to pay to the said plaintiff, providing she would sign the contract, and that Cheuvront had no intention of coming to live with plaintiff, but that said contract was gotten up and prepared for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff out of her marital rights as his wife, and that Horner made said promises for and on behalf of Cheuvront as his agent, which were false, and which he knew to be false at the time, and that Cheuvront had no intention whatever of carrying out said promises. That Horner brought a notary public to plaintiff's house, and had her acknowledge, after signing, said contract. That she would not have signed it, had she understood it, and that she was induced to sign the same through the fraudulent misrepresentations of Horner and his wife, agents of said Cheuvront. That said contract was gotten up with a great deal of skill by an attorney learned in the law, and purporting to be between plaintiff and W. S. Stuart, trustee of said Cheuvront, and was made for the express purpose of defrauding plaintiff out of her rights of support and dower in the large estate of said Cheuvront. That plaintiff had no knowledge of the true intent, effect, and meaning of the said contract, and was much surprised when she ascertained that her husband refused to come to Parkersburg and live with her, and was surprised to find that by said contract she had released defendant from all claim for support or dower in all or any part of his property, which property was carefully described and set up in said contract. That, according to the expectancy of life, her dower rights in said property would be quite valuable. That she had no separate property of her own, and had to rely upon her own labor and exertions to maintain herself and children. That it was represented to her that it was a contract for the purpose of dismissing her said suit for divorce and alimony, and that, as soon as she signed said contract and gave an order to dismiss the suit, said Cheuvront would come and reside with her, and maintain and support her, and treat her as he should treat a faithful and deserving wife. That, after defendant had so fraudulently procured the dismissal of said suit, he wrote affectionate letters to plaintiff, asking her to meet him at Pennsboro, in the county of Ritchie, where plaintiff did meet him about the 19th or 20th of November, 1899, where they roomed and cohabited together, sleeping in the same bed at a hotel from Saturday until Monday morning, which said Joseph Cheuvront did in furtherance of the fraud so practiced upon her after the contract was obtained from her, and by him placed upon record, for the purpose and with the intention of preventing plaintiff from bringing another suit for divorce and alimony against him. And praying that the contract might be canceled, annulled, and held for naught, and that she be entitled to her marital rights, as though said contract had never been signed by her, and for general relief. The defendants filed their demurrer and separate answers to the bill, denying the material allegations thereof, and especially denying all fraud in the procurement of the contract sought to be set aside. The defendant W. S. Stuart's answer alleged that he was applied to by W. J. Horner, on behalf of plaintiff, for the purpose of settling and compromising the divorce suit mentioned, in Doddridge county, in which respondent was counsel for Joseph Cheuvront; that he brought the matter to the attention of Cheuvront, who consented to such compromise, if it could be done on certain terms and conditions before that time offered to plaintiff through respondent, his attorney, at Parkersburg, and directing respondent to carefully prepare such papers as would be binding between them, and that would forever settle the matters in difference between them, which respondent did to the best of his skill and ability, the original of which contract was filed as an exhibit with the answer of Joseph Cheuvront in this cause; that Cheuvront paid over to Horner for plaintiff the sum of $750 in respondent's presence, and took Horner's receipt for the same, which receipt was filed as an exhibit with Cheuvront's answer; that respondent says he knew nothing personally about what took place or was said between the plaintiff and Joseph Cheuvront, or between Horner and his wife and the plaintiff, but denied that the deed or contract was prepared for the purpose of taking advantage of the plaintiff, or for the express purpose of defrauding her out of her rights of support and dower in the large estate of Cheuvront, as alleged in the bill, so far as he knew or had any information, and alleged that there was such an antenuptial contract between the plaintiff and defendant as recited in the deed, and denied each and every material allegation in the bill not admitted in the answer to be true.

Depositions were taken and filed in the cause, and the same was heard on the 23d day of May, 1901, upon the bill and exhibits, and upon the demurrer, which was argued and overruled, and upon the exceptions and answers of the defendants, and general replications thereto, and upon the proofs filed by the plaintiff and the defendant, on consideration of which the court was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to have the contract or deed of the 30th of October, 1899, and recorded in the clerk's office of the county court of Doddridge county, canceled, annulled, set aside, and held for naught, and so decreed accordingly, and gave decree for costs in favor of plaintiff against the defendant Joseph Cheuvront, and provided that "this decree is without any prejudice or passing on any of the rights of the parties under any other contract, if any such exists." The defendants appealed from said decree, and assigned as errors the overruling of the demurrer of the defendants to the bill of complaint, and not sustaining the said demurrer and dismissing the said bill of complaint, and in canceling and annulling and setting aside the deed of trust or contract dated the 30th day of October, 1899, and decreeing costs against the defendant Cheuvront.

Appellants insist that the old maxim, "That he who seeks equity must first do equity," applies to this case, and that the plaintiff cannot maintain her suit to set aside the contract without placing the appellant in statu quo; that she must allege that she had tendered or was ready to refund to him the $400 he paid to her at the execution of the contract; and that the failure to allege such tender in her bill, or to make offer of payment thereof, was fatal to the bill, and for that reason the demurrer should have been sustained; and they cite Hogg's Equity Principles, § 60, p. 100, where this principle is laid down, and also cite Worthington v. Collins, 39 W. Va. 406, 19 S. E. 527 (Syl., point 1), where it is held, "Where an agreement is rescinded, the general rule is that it must be rescinded entirely, and the parties be placed, as near as may be, in statu quo;" and also Christian v. Vance, 41 W. Va. 754, 24 S. E. 596 (Syl., point 1), "A party who seeks to cancel a contract of sale because of mutual mistake must allege and show himself prompt, eager, ready, and willing to place the other party to such contract in statu quo." As a general proposition of law, this is correct. It is the general rule, where the transaction is purely of a commercial nature, or solely applies to property rights, that a party proposing to rescind a contract should place his adversary in statu quo. Appellants also cite Hogg's Equity Procedure, § 904, where the form of bill is given for the cancellation or rescission of a contract on ground of fraud, showing that one of the requirements is to bring into court, for the purpose of having the same delivered to the defendant, the money received by the plaintiff from the defendant, so as to place him in the position he was in before the contract sought to be rescinded was made. This form of contract, and the cases upon which it is based, are all of the nature of the sale of property, where no other questions are involved than those of money and property rights. This doctrine has been carried so far, and properly, perhaps, that even where the plaintiff is unable to restore that which he had received under the contract, from misfortune or otherwise, a court of equity will refuse to grant him relief; but the contract or deed sought to be canceled in case at bar is of a very different character. It is a contract made between parties sustaining the most sacred and confidential relations to each other known to our civilization. It sufficiently appears from the bill that the plaintiff was unable to restore to the defendant the $400 received by her upon the execution of the contract. The relations of the parties were such that it was the duty of the defendant to assist the plaintiff, and it clearly appears that he was amply able to perform his whole duty in that regard, and to require the plaintiff to return to the defendant the $400, before she could be heard upon her complaint to set aside the alleged fraudulent contract, would be simply a denial of justice to her. In treating of this class of cases, Mr. Story, in his first volume on Equity Jurisprudence, § 218, says: "But by far the most comprehensive class of cases of undue concealment arises from some peculiar relation or fiduciary character between the parties. Among this class of cases are to be found those which arise from the relation of * * * husband and wife. * * * In these and the like cases, the law, in order to prevent undue advantage from the unlimited confidence, affection, or sense of duty which the relation naturally creates, requires the utmost degree of good faith (uberrima fides) in all transactions between the parties. If there is any misrepresentation or any concealment of a material fact, or any just suspicion of artifice or undue influence, courts of equity will interpose, and pronounce the transaction void, and, as far as possible, restore the parties to their original rights." Also, in section 307, Mr. Story, in speaking of constructive frauds which arise from some peculiar confidence or fiduciary relation between the parties, says: "In this class of cases there is often to be found some intermixture of deceit, imposition, overreaching, unconscionable advantage, or other mark of direct and positive fraud. But the principle on which courts of equity act in regard thereto stands independent of any such ingredients, upon a motive of general public policy; and it is designed in some degree as a protection to the parties against the effects of overweening confidence and self-delusion, and the infirmities of hasty and precipitate judgment. Courts will therefore often interfere in such cases, where but for such a peculiar relation they would either abstain wholly from granting relief, or would grant it in a very modified and abstemious manner." See, also, 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 955, 956, in the latter of which sections it is said: "Wherever two persons stand in such a relation that, while it continues, confidence is necessarily reposed by one, and the influence which naturally grows out of that confidence is possessed by the other, and this confidence is abused, or the influence is exerted to obtain an advantage at the expense of the confiding party, the person so availing himself of his position will not be permitted to retain the advantage, although the transaction could not have been impeached if no such confidential relation had existed." In Darlington's Appeal, 86 Pa. St. 512, the rule was applied to a deed made by a married woman shortly after marriage whereby she conveyed her real estate to her husband. It was held: "That a confidential relation exists between man and wife; that, where there are transactions between them, courts will apply the same rules which govern dealings between attorney and client, principal and agent, guardian and ward, trustee and cestui que trust, and will require, when the husband claims the benefit arising from any such dealings, that it be shown affirmatively that he acted in perfect good faith, and took no advantage of his influence or knowledge, and that whatever contracts he made were fair, adequate, and equitable. If no such proof is established, courts of equity will avoid the contracts on the ground of constructive fraud." The court did not err in overruling the demurrer.

Appellants contend that the depositions filed on behalf of the appellee, commencing on page 65 and ending on page 121 of the record, were improperly made a part of the record because of certain irregularities mentioned, and that the same were not properly authenticated; that "the certificate thereto appended is an essential part of it, and must be made by the officer who took the depositions." And they cite in support of this exception Hogg's Eq. Pr. 567, § 490, and chapter 130, § 33, of the Code of 1899. It does not appear that any exceptions were taken in the court below to the reading of the depositions on account of the irregularities mentioned, and the objection cannot be raised for the first time in the appellate court. Section 6, c. 135, Code 1899, giving directions how records shall be made up in chancery causes appealed to the Supreme Court of Appeals, provides that "notices to take depositions, the captions of such depositions, and certificates of their having been sworn to, except so far as may be necessary to the decision of the exceptions taken to the reading of the exceptions," shall not be copied into the record.

The assignment that the court erred in canceling and annulling and setting aside the said deed of trust or contract dated October 30, 1899, and decreeing costs against the defendant Cheuvront. The action of the court in thus ruling is based upon the proofs going to the merits of the case. Plaintiff testified that Horner and his wife came to her with some papers, and requested her to sign them, with the assurance that the defendant Cheuvront would come to Parkersburg and live with her, and take her out of the boarding house, and maintain her; that Horner had some money in his hand; that they made her believe that Cheuvront wanted to come and live with her, and said he wanted to have the suit dismissed before he came to her; that Horner said that Scott Stuart and Charles Cheuvront were always dunning him for money, and he wanted to get away from them and come to Parkersburg, where he would be free from these two parties; that Scott Stuart was building a new house, and always wanted money from him, and Charles Cheuvront always wanted money from him; that Horner had a paper that he said he had made out himself; nobody knew anything about it but he and Mr. Cheuvront. Mr. Horner went out "and came back with the notary public, and they talked on to me, and persuaded me to sign that certain paper; said it did not amount to anything. I did not read it, and did not know anything it contained. Mr. Horner pretended to read it, but I don't think he read more than two or three pages, and read so low I did not hear it." And she states that she did not know the contents of the paper until about the 1st of December; that she signed the paper, and Horner gave her $400. She states that she did not know that Cheuvront had given Horner $750 to give to her until she met defendant at Pennsboro about the 19th or 20th of November, when defendant told her what he had given him. James H. Leonard, the notary public who took the acknowledgment of Mrs. Cheuvront to said contract, says that on the 31st of October, 1899, Horner told him he wanted him to take an acknowledgment. He asked where the party and papers were, and he said they were not ready for some time yet. Witness was just about to eat his supper, which he did, and came back down, when Horner said he would go after the party, when witness said he had an engagement at his office at 7 o'clock, and did not know how long it would take him to get through. That Mrs. Horner spoke up and said, "I will give you more than you can make," and laughed; and she said, "I will give you $5 if you will take the acknowledgment." That witness went down, and came back a little before 8 o'clock, and met Mr. Horner. They went down to Mrs. Cheuvront's, and went into the parlor. Mr. Horner and Mrs. Horner were there, and Horner introduced him, saying he was an attorney. Witness said he was not an attorney, but a notary public. That Horner had been telling him something about the case, but mentioned no names; calling them a woman and an old man who were separated, and they were trying to get them back together. He says, "Here's the paper," and handed it to me and says, "You read it over, and see if you think it is doing her any harm to sign it." Witness says he read it over, and told her he was not an attorney, but, from what they said they were after (to get them back together), he thought it was the best thing to do (to get them together), "not to fight divorce cases as there was no pay in it." "She did not know whether to sign it or not, and Mr. Horner introduced the subject, and commenced laughing, and said the last words the old man said was, if it was fixed up, he would come in right away to live with her, and made some remark about getting peace, or something like that, and everybody laughed; and she said she did not know whether to sign it or not. I took my hat and says: 'Well, use your own judgment about signing it. I says I am here to take the acknowledgment if you want to sign it.' And she said: 'Mr. Horner, do you think he will be here?' And he says: 'Yes; as soon as you sign the paper I will go right down and telephone, and he will come in on the first train.' She signed the paper after a little discussion. Horner asked me what my fees were, and I said, 'What you promised me, $5,' and they handed it to me, and that was all that occurred at that time." Witness was asked what, if anything, was said by Horner and Mrs. Cheuvront about Joseph Cheuvront coming in to live with her. He answered that Horner had some papers, which he held up and showed to her, claiming that her lawyers had been false to her, and had not been fair with her, and that it was worrying the old man, and that he would have been in long before but for her lawyers, and that he had been crying around in the store and calling her his lovey love, and that he had got tired of it, and wanted to get them fixed up, and that he would come, and had promised to come in as soon as the papers were signed. That she asked Horner if he was coming in to live with her, and he said "Uncle Joe" had been telling all along about his troubles, and that he was coming in to live with her. That several weeks afterwards witness saw Joseph Cheuvront at the train, which was about a half hour late that evening. He said as soon as he got things fixed up he would come in. "And he commenced crying, and said for me not to believe all that Bill Horner said; that he was always talking; that he had always been true to Mrs. Cheuvront; that he had heard reports, but didn't believe them; and Horner came up then and commenced running down some lawyers out there that Mrs. Cheuvront had employed, and commenced telling him about the time they would have Christmas and during holidays; that he would be here at the time, or something to that effect."

It was proved by John F. Laird, prosecuting attorney of Wood county: That Horner procured himself and his wife to be summoned before the grand jury of Wood county in January, 1900, and by J. M. Thayer that Horner sent him to Mrs. Cheuvront's to tell her that he and his wife were summoned before the grand jury, and, if she did not withdraw some suit at once between her and some man (he believes he was Mr. Cheuvront), that he would have to indict her; if she would withdraw the suit, he would not go before the grand jury to indict her. That he had the summonses with him, and left them with Mrs. Cheuvront. These were the summonses served on Horner and his wife to appear before the grand jury, and filed with plaintiff's depositions. Witness stated that he was in the employ of Horner at the time, and that Horner sent her word by him that he would indict her unless she dismissed that suit; that Horner gave him the copy of the subpoena for himself and his wife, and said, "Maybe she won't believe you, and think we are working up a scheme." Says Horner told him he got $500 for making a compromise that was made between them, and that Joseph Cheuvront paid it to him. Plaintiff filed with her own depositions a copy of the original receipt, as follows: "Received of Joseph Cheuvront, by the hands of W. S. Stuart, the sum of Seven Hundred and Fifty Dollars, ($750.00) to be used by me in a compromise between said Joseph Cheuvront, and to be paid to Mrs. Elizabeth Cheuvront in case she signs a certain deed, prepared by the said Stuart, which sum I guarantee to be returned to the said Cheuvront in case same should be lost or any accident to same, if not paid to the said Elizabeth Cheuvront, upon said compromise upon her executing said deed. This October 31st, 1899. W. J. Horner." Which copy of receipt she received inclosed in a letter from her husband dated December 1st. Much of the correspondence between the parties before and after the making of said contract of October 30, 1899, is filed as exhibits with depositions. Nearly all of said letters contain expressions of affection and love for each other. On the 22d day of November, 1899, about the next day after they parted at Pennsboro, defendant wrote quite a lengthy letter, closing by saying that he never ate an apple but he thought of her, and how they enjoyed themselves together at Pennsboro; that it was almost a heaven on earth for him to be with her, and to get along so pleasantly together; that he wanted no other company while there "but you and you only my dear wife I wish I could see you this evening but cannot, so good bye, God bless and pray for me that we may call to die be fully prepared to meet one another. I ever remain your husband affectionately, J. C." All of defendant's letters to the plaintiff, until the last one or two, in December, were calculated to inspire the plaintiff with the hope that defendant would be reconciled to her, and that they would again be reunited; and all her letters to him that are filed with his depositions indicate that she thought they were to again live together. He files one letter from plaintiff to himself, dated November 26, 1899, nearly a month after the contract was made, addressed, "My dear Husband," and closing with: "Your last letter was so nice, it was so comforting for me to be called your dear wife, it makes me feel like I was in heaven to be loved again by the only one I love on earth. * * * I will not worry you by writing any more now. I hope you will come to see me soon, 'papa.' Your affectionate wife, L. C."

The depositions giving the conversations between Horner et al. in the absence of the defendant in getting the paper signed are objected to because of the absence of the defendant, but the evidence strongly tends to establish the fact that Horner was the agent of the defendant in making the compromise and procuring the execution of the deed or contract by the plaintiff, and the court was warranted in so holding. A very strong element of proof that plaintiff did not know, as positively stated by her in her testimony, the contents of the paper which she signed, was the fact that she accepted the $400, and said nothing about the $750, when, if she had read or examined the contract, as it was claimed she did, she must have known that she was getting but little over half of the amount for which she was acknowledging receipt. In Way v. Life Ins. Co., 89 S. E. 742 (Syl., point 1), the Supreme Court of South Carolina holds: "Where a husband entered into a contract with his wife by which he or his estate obtained an advantage over her, the burden of proof is on the husband, or the representatives of the husband, to show that the wife was fully informed as to the effects of the transaction, and also the utmost fairness therein."

The question on the merits of the case resting, as it does, wholly upon the evidence, and the circuit court having found that the allegations of the bill were sustained by the proofs, and the evidence appearing sufficient to warrant the decree, the same will not be disturbed, and the decree must be affirmed.

FOREST COAL CO. et al. v. DOOLITTLE,
Judge, et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1908.)

PROHIBITION—DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE—INTEREST—JUDGMENT—APPLICATION FOR WRIT—DISMISSAL OF CAUSE—AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY.

1. The writ of prohibition lies to restrain a judge from proceeding in a cause in which he is disqualified by reason of interest in the subject-matter thereof, although the court over which he presides has jurisdiction of the cause.

2. Where a judge of an inferior court, who is disqualified by reason of interest, is permitted to proceed to final judgment or decree, his interest is ground of error, for which reversal may be had in the appellate court, and renders the judgment or decree voidable; but he may be restrained, before judgment or final decree, at any stage of the case, by the writ of prohibition, and his disqualification may be made to appear upon the motion for the writ, without its having been first pleaded in the court below, passed upon adversely there, and then established in the Supreme Court on appeal or writ of error.

3. In order to disqualify, the interest of the judge must be in the subject-matter of the cause, and not merely in a legal question involved in it.

4. In determining whether such disqualification exists, the superior court will ascertain what rights and interests are involved in the case, and may be subjects of adjudication therein; and, if it be found that the judge has such interest as renders it impossible for him to adjudicate upon all the rights involved, without affecting his own, the writ will be awarded, without inquiry as to whether the parties will or will not call for an adjudication upon the particular matter as to which the disqualification exists.

5. An order dismissing the cause, or part of a cause, in which a judge is so interested as to disqualify him in respect thereto, entered or allowed by him, on motion of the parties by counsel, without special authority given to said counsel for that purpose, is voidable; and the party having the right to prosecute the cause so dismissed, in whole or in part, is entitled to an adjudication in the same cause by a qualified judge upon the question of his right to have the cause, or so much thereof as has been so dismissed, reinstated under section 11 of chapter 127 of the Code of 1899.

6. The general authority of an attorney does not include power to voluntarily enter or cause to be entered an order that perpetually bars the right of his client, such as a retraxit. Such act can be done only by the party in person, or by his attorney in pursuance of special authority conferred upon him for the purpose.

7. The judge of a court obtains a disqualifying interest by taking a lease, together with other persons, upon part of a tract of land against which a suit instituted by the state for the sale thereof as school land, and petitions filed by a claimant of the title of the land for the redemption thereof, are pending; and his disqualification is not removed by the dismissal, as to the part on which the lease is, of the bill and amended bills, upon the motion of counsel for the state, founded solely upon his admission that such part of the tract is not subject to sale, and the dismissal of the claimant's petition and amended petition upon his motion, by counsel, founded upon a written renunciation and disclaimer signed by his counsel.

Action by the Forest Coal Company and others for writ of prohibition to Edward S. Doolittle, Judge of the circuit court, and others. Writ awarded.

Campbell, Holt & Duncan, Brown, Jackson & Knight, Lyon, Sheppard & Goodykoontz, Hubbard & Hubbard, and Vinson & Thompson, for petitioners. M. S. Stiles and Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, for respondents.

POFFENBARGER, J. A writ of prohibition has been applied for by the Forest Coal Company and others to prevent the Honorable Edward S. Doolittle, judge of the circuit court of Cabell county, from sitting further in a chancery cause pending in said court, on the ground that he is disqualified as to that case by reason of his interest in the subject-matter thereof. This raises two questions, the first of which is whether, if such disqualification exists, the writ lies; and the other, whether the judge has any disqualifying interest.

The authorities almost uniformly hold that when a judge of an inferior court is recused before judgment in a case in which he has an interest, such as disqualifies him, and a prohibition is applied for to restrain him from further sitting in the cause, it will be granted, if, upon the application therefor, it appears that he is disqualified. "Prohibition is the proper remedy to prevent action by a judge who is disqualified by interest or otherwise." Works on Courts and their Jurisdiction, 638. "A writ of prohibition will lie to restrain a judge from proceeding in an action in which he is disqualified by reason of interest, although the court over which he presides may have jurisdiction of the cause." 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 223. The following cases, fully supporting the text, are cited: Gravel Mining Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 315; Gravel Mining Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 328; Milton Mining Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 328; South Feather Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 329; Blue Tent Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 329; People v. District Court, 26 Colo. 226, 56 Pac. 1115; State v. Wear, 129 Mo. 619, 31 S. W. 608; State v. Board of Education, 19 Wash. 8, 52 Pac. 317, 40 L. R. A. 317, 67 Am. St. Rep. 706.

These cases were decided in states in which statutes had been passed prohibiting judges from sitting in causes in which they are interested. Where such statutes exist, judgments rendered by interested judges are generally held to be void. Where the disqualification is not statutory, but rests upon the common law, such judgments are voidable only. Findley v. Smith, 42 W. Va. 299, 26 S. E. 370; Black on Judgments, §§ 174, 266; Cooley's Const. Lim. 509; State v. Castleberry, 23 Ala. 85; Heydenfeldt v. Towns, 27 Ala. 423; Dimes v. Canal Co., 3 H. L. 759.

It was strongly insisted for the respondents upon the argument that as in this state there is no statute prohibiting a judge from sitting in a case in which he is interested, and a judgment rendered in such case is voidable only, there is no want of jurisdiction, in consequence of which prohibition does not lie. There is jurisdiction in the court. The want of power is in the judge only. It is personal to him. His interest is a collateral matter which arises in the cause over which the court has full jurisdiction, and renders the judge powerless to further act. This argument is answered by the judges of the English courts in their reply to questions propounded by the House of Lords in Dimes v. Canal Co., 3 H. L. 759, 784, in which they said a judgment or decree rendered by an interested judge or chancellor was voidable only, for reasons of public policy, but that the writ of prohibition did lie, nevertheless, to the judge of an inferior court, to prevent him from sitting in the case. As to the character of the judgment, and reason for holding it not void, they said: "It would create great confusion and inconvenience if it was. The objection might be one of which the parties acting under these orders might be totally ignorant till the moment of the trial of an action of trespass for the act done." As to the use of the writ of prohibition in such cases, they said: "If this had been a proceeding in an inferior court—one to which a prohibition might go from a court in Westminster Hall—such a prohibition would be granted, pending the proceedings, upon an allegation that the presiding judge of the court was interested in the suit. * * * If no prohibition should be applied for, * * * the proper mode of taking the objection to the interest of the judge would be, in courts of common law, by bringing a writ of error, for error in fact, and assigning that interest as cause of error. The former course was stated to be proper in the case of Brookes v. Earl of Rivers, it being suggested that the Earl of Derby, who was chamberlain of Chester, had an interest in the suit; and the court held that, where the judge had an interest, neither he nor his deputy can determine a cause or sit in court, and, if he does, a prohibition lies." "A suit was surmised to be before the Lord President of the Marches, for an office, between the grantee of the Lord President and a stranger, wherein the only question would be whether the grant of that office belonged to the Lord President. And because in this case he would be as it were both judge and party, a prohibition was granted." 8 Bac. Abr. 231.

To the authorities just cited, it might be objected that the expressions of opinion as to the applicability of the writ of prohibition in such case are obiter dicta, for the reason that, in the case quoted from, it was conceded not applicable, because the decisions then under consideration had been made by the Lord Chancellor and the Vice Chancellor, against whom the writ cannot go because the court over which they preside is of equal dignity with the superior courts of law. In Brookes v. Earl of Rivers, Hardress, 503, the writ was refused because it was found that the Earl of Derby was not disqualified; and it was not absolutely necessary to say the writ would have been awarded, had it been otherwise. However, these opinions were delivered by judges of the highest courts of that country from which we have inherited the common law, and they may well be supposed to have been thoroughly familiar with its principles and the practice under it. A quotation from Bacon's Abridgment has been given, in which a precedent is cited. In Gravel Mining Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 315, 326, Sharpstein, J., does not base authority to grant the writ upon the character of the judgment. He said: "And it may be—although the decisions are conflicting upon the question—that the judgment, if one should be entered in the action, would not be void by reason of the disqualification of the judge to sit in it. All agree that it would be voidable, at least. But if the judge is interested in the action, he has no right to sit or act in it. * * * His sitting or acting in an action in which the law declares he shall not sit or act would seem to be without jurisdiction. * * * Now, a judge who is interested in an action not only has no authority to hear and determine it, but he is expressly prohibited from doing so. * * * The bare fact of a judge sitting in an action in which he is interested is sufficient ground for the reversal of any judgment or order that he may make in that cause. That would seem to indicate that a judge so interested would act without or in excess of his jurisdiction.” That it is an act in excess of jurisdiction clearly appears if we suppose a case in which a judge has rendered judgment in a case in which he was interested, and his decision is in absolute conformity with the law, and, if rendered by a disinterested judge, could not possibly be reversed. Yet, because of the interest of the judge who rendered it, that judgment would have to be reversed. For what would it be reversed? Not because it is not such a judgment as the law pronounces upon the case made by the pleadings in the evidence, but simply because the judge was interested. Is it not perfectly clear that the only reason for reversing in such a case is want of power in the judge to act? Want of judicial power is want of jurisdiction. There is no reason for any distinction between the cases in which a statute declares that an interested judge shall not sit, and those in which he is inhibited by the common law from sitting. A statute is of no higher dignity nor any more efficacious than the common law, and no statute has more emphatically and unequivocally negated the power of a judge to sit in his own cause than does the maxim of the common law, “Nemo debet esse judex in propria causa.” Such was its force that Lord Coke said even an act of Parliament could not vest power in a man to sit as judge in his own cause, “for, when an act of Parliament is against common right and reason, or repugnant, or impossible to be performed, the common law will control it, and adjudge such an act to be void.” Bonham's Case, 8 Co. 114, 118. Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, speaking of legislative power to do away with this principle of natural justice, says: “To empower one party to a controversy to decide it for himself is not within the legislative authority, because it is not the establishment of any rule of action or decision, but is a placing of the other party, so far as that controversy is concerned, out of the protection of the law.” So reprehensible, in the opinion of the sages of the law, was the act of a judge sitting in his own cause, that in early cases attachments went against him, and imprisonment was inflicted upon him. Anon., Salk, 396; Wright v. Crump, Ld. Ryd. 768.

Before entering upon the next inquiry, namely, whether Judge Doolittle has a disqualifying interest in the subject-matter of the cause, it is due to him to say that no member of this court doubts that he sincerely believes himself to be disinterested and qualified to sit in the case. He says in his answer “that he has no interest in the subject-matter of said suit, or in the success or failure of any contention therein; that, while the labor and responsibilities incident to the hearing and determination of the many questions that have arisen and that will arise therein from time to time are such as a judge might well wish to be relieved from, they pertain, just as in other cases, to the judicial duties that respondent assumed with his assumption of office, and which he is not permitted to evade or transfer to another from personal wish, nor upon the wish of a party, except for legally sufficient cause.” It is merely a question of the application of the law on the subject of disqualifying interest to the peculiar and complicated situation of the case, and the conclusion of this court, whatever it may be, will not carry with it any reflection upon the honor of Judge Doolittle, nor in the slightest degree impugn the motives which have impelled him to decline to absent himself from the bench during the further progress of the case in which it is claimed he has no right to sit. Whether a judge has such an interest as disqualifies him is sometimes a question of much nicety and great intricacy. In some instances they have been compelled to sit where they believed themselves to be disqualified and had refused to act. In others, they have been prohibited from acting in cases in which they believed themselves qualified.

In 1894 the state of West Virginia instituted a suit in chancery in the circuit court of Wyoming county against Henry O. King and others for the purpose of subjecting to sale for the benefit of the school fund so much of a tract of 500,000 acres of land, patented in 1795 to Robert Morris, and now claimed by said King, as lies in the state of West Virginia. The portion sought to be subjected is supposed to contain about 327,000 acres. In 1896 King appeared in said cause, and filed his petition and answer, alleging that he was the owner in fee of the tract, denying that the same or any part thereof had become forfeited for nonentry or nonpayment of taxes, and prayed that, in the event it should be held to have been forfeited, he might be permitted to redeem the same. Such further proceedings were had that on the 30th day of September, 1897, a decree was entered permitting a redemption, from which an appeal was taken, and the decree was reversed and the cause remanded.

See State v. King, 47 W. Va. 437, 35 S. E. 30, where much of the history of the case will be found. The decree thus reversed permitted the redemption of 10,000 acres on the payment of $3,090.08, but the 10,000 acres was not identified or located by any description. It was supposed to be all the land within the whole tract that was not claimed by any person other than King. It authorized King to select and locate the land thus redeemed at any place or places within the whole survey where he could do so without conflicting with the rights of other claimants. After the cause was remanded, the state filed a fifth amended bill, making some 400 claimants under junior patents and otherwise new parties, and the cause was removed to the circuit court of Logan county, and still later to the circuit court of Cabell county. After the removal of the cause to Cabell county, King filed an amended petition, particularly describing several portions of the Morris grant, upon which he offered to pay the taxes and interest; excluding from said grant some five or six hundred junior patents within its bounds, as to which he asked to be relieved from payment of taxes thereon. Thereupon a decree was prepared and entered, over the objection of counsel for King, finding and adjudicating "that the state of West Virginia has no title or estate in or to or right to sell said tracts, pieces, or parcels of land, or either of them, saving such, if any, as may have been forfeited by reason of failure to enter the same on the landbooks, or for nonpayment of taxes thereon by the present owners or the former owners thereof, being the grantees above named of the said tracts, pieces, or parcels of land, or those claiming under them." Thus a number of tracts claimed by persons as against King went out of the case. Some of the claimants under junior patents within the Morris grant filed answers, claiming parts of the land, and contesting King's right to redeem the same; and there was a reference to a commissioner to report as to the title of the parties, including the new parties, and as to the boundary of the Robert Morris patent, and other matters necessary to a decision of the issues raised. On the 31st day of March, 1903, the commissioner returned his report, to which numerous exceptions to the findings of the commissioner on the question of boundary lines and other matters were taken by the defendants, who were contesting the title of King and denying his right to redeem, but the report was not then filed. At the time this report was returned, the matter of the alleged disqualification of the judge came up, and is grounded upon the following additional facts: On the 28th day of February, 1903, Judge Doolittle, John Dingess, and S. C. Fisher took a coal lease for 30 years on about 800 acres of land admittedly located within the boundaries of the Morris grant as claimed by King in his petition, and known as the "Moses Mounts Land." In his answer the judge says the question whether this land was affected by the King claim was raised, and he was assured by John B. Wilkinson, who represented Mounts, that King had no claim to it, and that whatever claim he had had to that land he had conveyed to Harvey, Miller, and Nighbert, and that the title of Mounts was perfect by long possession and payment of taxes. It seems to be admitted that on the 30th day of March, 1903, one of the counsel for parties contesting King's claim privately expressed to the judge his opinion that he was sufficiently interested to disqualify him, and requested him not to sit further in the case. On the following day, when the commissioner's report was brought in, the judge stated the facts from the bench relating to his alleged interest, and expressed the opinion that he was not disqualified. Then counsel representing the junior patent claimants insisted that he was disqualified, indicating the reasons therefor; and he announced that he would take the matter under advisement until the following Monday, April 6th, at which time he would announce his conclusion. On Saturday, April 4th, on the motion of King, by his counsel, and the motion of John S. Marcum, counsel representing the state in said suit, the petition and amended petitions of King and the bill and amended bills of the state were all dismissed as to the lands upon which said lease had been taken; the order of dismissal specifying by bounds a tract of land including all of said Mounts land. On the 6th day of April, 1903, the commissioner's report and exceptions thereto were filed, and the contesting defendants, as the junior patent claimants are called, tendered and filed a motion, in writing, alleging the disqualification of the judge, accompanied by the affidavit of L. B. Baugh, showing that the land upon which the lease had been taken was within the Morris grant, as claimed by King, and requesting that the judge vacate the bench, and permit the election of a special judge to try the case, or call in for that purpose a regularly elected judge from some other circuit, or remove the cause for trial into the circuit court of some county outside of his circuit. Upon this motion, time was allowed until the 11th day of April for counter affidavits to be filed by King. On said last-mentioned day the affidavit of M. F. Stiles, counsel for King, was filed in resistance of the motion; stating that the opinion given by Wilkinson to the judge at the time the lease was taken was correct, but admitting that at that time a portion of the Mounts lands was still included in King's amended petition, and had not been excluded therefrom, but that King did not claim any portion of it, and had compromised his claim thereto with Harvey, Miller, Altizer, and Nighbert, and executed to them a deed therefor. This affidavit further showed that, when Harvey and his associates took said deed from King, they expressed a purpose not to set up any claim of title thereunder as against persons other than King, nor ask to be permitted to redeem any land under said deed, but that the purpose was merely to strengthen their own title, and that the disclaimer and renunciation filed by King on April 4th was filed "as an act of simple justice to said judge, * * * in order that the record might conform to, and not belle, the facts." After the filing of this affidavit, and argument of counsel, the motion was overruled, and the cause was set down for argument upon the exceptions to the report of the commissioner on the 21st day of April, 1903. It is charged in the petition and admitted in the answer that, when the motion came on to be heard on April 11th, Clement H. Hudson presented a petition on behalf of J. W. Hinchman, commissioner of school lands, praying that the decree of April 4th dismissing the bill and amended bills as to the lands therein mentioned be vacated. This petition was accompanied by a letter from Hinchman to Hudson authorizing the latter to have said order set aside and the cause reinstated as to said land, and proceeded with to final decree. Marcum, who had formerly been employed and authorized to represent the state in the cause, objected to the filing of the petition which he charged had been procured and prepared by counsel for the contesting defendants; and the judge says in his answer, "And this respondent, considering said petition improper and an impertinence, and said Hinchman not being a party to said suit, except in his private character as a defendant named in said fifth amended bill, refused to take any notice of the same by action thereon." The report of the commissioner on the question of the boundaries of the Morris survey was favorable to King, except that it so restricted the lines as to leave out on one side of the tract, as claimed by King, a considerable section of land, within which the Mounts lands lie. Confirmation of that report would exclude from the King survey the lands upon which the lease was taken. If the exceptions to that report should be sustained, and the whole matter of boundaries recommended to the same or another commissioner, the findings might include the lands upon which the lease was taken. Hence it is said the judge has a direct interest in land which is involved in the suit. King, however, has not excepted to the report, and, so far, claims nothing beyond the line located by the commissioner. At the time the lease was taken, parts of these lands were included in the claim of the state. For the respondents it is contended that the disclaimer and dismissal of April 4th have eliminated the Mounts lands from this case, even if it be true that the taking of the lease made the judge an interested party at the time it was taken, and that his disqualification has been removed by the dismissal. In reply to this contention, it is urged that the dismissal is not binding upon either the state or King; that, in order to bind, it would have to be equivalent to a retraxit; and that a retraxit must be made by the parties in person, and not by counsel.

In endeavoring to ascertain whether there is a disqualifying interest on the part of the judge, it is necessary to consider the statutory regulations under which said suit is prosecuted, prescribing the duties and powers of the court and the commissioner of school lands, and determining the scope and nature of such suit. The commissioner of school lands is appointed by the circuit court, and he is the agent of the state, empowered to see that every officer having any duty to perform under chapter 105 of the Code of 1899 performs the same as therein required, and to report any failure of any such officer to the circuit court of his county. Once in each year he is to report to the circuit court a list of all tracts and parcels of land reported by the auditor and surveyor as forfeited or waste and unappropriated lands, which report has to be recorded in the chancery order book and preserved, and thereupon a suit or suits in chancery shall be commenced and prosecuted by and in the name of the state of West Virginia for the sale of every such tract and parcel of land so reported, to which the former owner, or the person in whose name it is forfeited, shall, if known, be made a defendant, together with all persons claiming title to or interest in such lands, and all persons claiming any such interest who are not made parties may come in by petition. If at any time during the pendency of such suit it shall appear to the court that any part of any tract has been sold by the state in any proceeding for the sale of school lands, and the taxes regularly paid thereon since such sale, or is held by any person under section 3 of article 13 of the Constitution of the state, the bill, as to such part, shall be dismissed, and the suit proceeded with to a final decree as to the remainder. "In every such suit brought under the provisions of this chapter, the court shall have full jurisdiction, power and authority to hear, try and determine all questions of title, possession and boundary which may arise therein, as well as any and all conflicting claims whatever to the real estate in question arising therein; and the court, in its discretion, may at any time, regardless of the evidence, if any, already taken therein, direct an issue to be made up and tried at its bar as to any question, matter or thing arising therein, which, in the opinion of the court, is proper to be tried by a jury. And every such issue shall be proceeded in, and the trial shall be governed by the law and practice applicable to the trial of an issue out of chancery; and the court may grant new trials therein as in other cases tried by a jury." Code 1899, c. 105, § 18. The former owner, his heirs, devisees, or assigns, may at any time during the pendency of the suit file his petition, stating in full his title, accompanied by the evidence thereof, and praying to be allowed to redeem so much of the real estate as to which the title remains in the state; and upon full and satisfactory proof that, at the time the title to said land vested in the state, he had a good and valid title thereto, legal or equitable, superior to that of any other claimant thereof, the court may, by a proper decree, permit the petitioner, upon the payment into court or to the commissioner of school lands of the costs, taxes, and interest properly chargeable thereon, to be fixed by the court in its decree, to redeem the real estate mentioned in his petition. But such petitioner shall acquire no other title to the lands so redeemed than was vested in him immediately before such forfeiture, and such redemption shall in no wise affect or impair any title or interest any other person may have in said real estate, or any part thereof, by purchase from the state, or under and by virtue of section 8 of article 13 of the Constitution. "Every final decree entered in any such suit shall be a bar to the claim of every person to the real estate, or any part of it or any lien thereon, or to the proceeds thereof, who has failed to appear and present his claim thereto as is provided in the sixth section of this chapter, except as to the excess of the proceeds of the sale thereof, as provided in section sixteen of this chapter. And except as provided by the last clause of section seventeen of this chapter." Code 1899, c. 105, § 20.

Obviously, these statutory provisions contemplate a proceeding against the land as to which the bill is filed, adverse to every claimant thereof. Here the King title to so much of the 500,000-acre tract as lies in this state is asserted by the state of West Virginia, not only as against King, but as to all other persons claiming either under or against him. The suit proceeds upon the theory of a forfeiture of the title, by whomsoever formerly held, for nonentry of the land for taxation, or nonpayment of the taxes thereon, if entered for such purposes. Neither King nor any other person can be permitted to redeem, except by pleading sufficiently that he had at the time of the forfeiture a title to the land superior to that of any other person, and had adduced full proof of such title. Whoever comes and makes such a showing will be permitted to redeem by payment of all the taxes, interest, and costs. If no person can establish such title, then the whole proceeds of the land go into the state treasury. It is immaterial to the state whether King or some other person can make out such title, but, if no person can, the state is benefited. Hence it has an interest in upholding its claim for taxes and making good the forfeiture against the whole world.

The statute contemplates two classes of persons as to whom there may be a dismissal. They are persons holding the lands by purchase in a former proceeding for the sale of school lands, and persons having title under section 8 of article 13 of the Constitution, but there shall be no dismissal as to them unless it appear to the court that they have such title. When such suit is prosecuted to final decree, the statute expressly declares that the final decree shall be a bar to the claim of every person as to the land, or any part of it, or the proceeds thereof, except that the former owner, upon proof of title at the time of forfeiture, may have the excess of the proceeds, after payment of taxes, interest, and costs, and that a person having title by purchase in a former proceeding for the sale of school lands and persons having title under section 8 of article 13 of the Constitution shall be protected.

It is clear, therefore, that the lands upon which the lease was taken were originally involved in the suit of State v. King and others, and that a portion thereof was not excluded from said suit until after the lease was taken. The dismissal of the bill and amended bills upon the motion of counsel for the state, and admission of said counsel that this land was not subject to sale, and the dismissal of King's petition and amended petition upon his motion and renunciation of title, put the leased lands out of this suit. As has been shown, the decree of April 4th is not void, but voidable. In the matter disposed of by that decree, the judge was undoubtedly and concededly interested. It is said that it was a decree entered by consent of parties, and went as a matter of course. This may do as to King, but it does not bind the state. There is no authority for a dismissal as to the state, except that given by the statute, and it only authorizes such dismissal when it appears to the court that the land has been sold by the state in another proceeding for the sale of school lands, or is held by some person under section 8 of article 13 of the Constitution. The mere admission of the attorney for the state that such land is not subject to sale does not amount to proof of the facts upon which a dismissal may be ordered.

As to the motion made by counsel of the state and by counsel for King, it is to be observed that the dismissal based thereon does not bar either King or the state. If it be viewed in the light of the law governing disclaimers, it is not sufficient to bar, for a disclaimer is in the nature of a release, and must be the act of the party himself. The authority of the attorney does not extend to the making of releases. 6 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 724; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 708; Dickerson v. Hodges, 43 N. J. Eq. 47, 10 Atl. 111. In order to be binding, it must be either a disclaimer or a retraxit, and neither can be made by an attorney without special authority therefor. A retraxit must be the act of the party himself. 18 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 898. "It is improper to enter a retraxit, or a judgment in the nature of a retraxit, and having the effect of a judgment upon the merits, without the personal consent of the plaintiff in the action. Such is the rule of the English common law, and, in the absence of statute, such is the rule in this country." Hallack v. Loft, 19 Colo. 74, 81, 34 Pac. 568, 570. "In the progress and until the consummation of the judgment, the attorney has, no doubt, and ought to have, a large and liberal discretion; but he cannot enter a retraxit, for that is a perpetual bar, and equivalent to a release. This was the resolution of the court in Beecher's Case, 8 Co. 58, 'because,' said the court, 'it shall be a perpetual bar, and, in a manner, a release, and the admittance of the court cannot prejudice the plaintiff in so high a degree. But in all dilatory matters the admission of the court may turn the plaintiff or demandant to delay, but shall never bar the plaintiff or demandant.'" Kent, C. J., in Kellogg v. Gilbert, 10 Johns. 220, 221, 6 Am. Dec. 335. See, also, Lambert v. Sandford, 2 Blackf. 137, 140, 18 Am. Dec. 149; Barnard v. Daggett, 68 Ind. 305, 511; Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542, 545; Smith's Adm'r v. Lamberts, 7 Grat. 142, approved in Crotty v. Eagle's Adm'r, 35 W. Va. 143, 151, 13 S. E. 59; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 370. It does not appear that counsel for King or the state had any special authority to enter a dismissal, and it affirmatively appears that the written disclaimer and renunciation of King was signed by his counsel.

Thus it appears that the utmost that can be conceded as to the order of dismissal of April 4th is that it is a voidable order. How it may be voided need not be determined here, but it would seem that the statute provides for a reinstatement. Section 11 of chapter 127, Code 1899, says: "Any circuit court may, on motion, reinstate on the trial docket of the court, any case dismissed, * * * within three terms after the order of dismissal may have been made." Section 7 of chapter 105, relating to suits for the sale of school lands, says such suits shall be "proceeded in, heard and determined in the same manner, and in all respects as other suits in chancery are brought, prosecuted and proceeded in, and shall be subject to the same rules of chancery practice as other suits in chancery in the state courts of this state, except as herein otherwise provided." In the absence of the statutory provision for the reinstatement of a dismissed case, a new suit would have to be instituted; and this statute is therefore an innovation upon the common law, and might be said to fall under the rule requiring a strict construction in such cases. But it is a remedial statute, and clearly falls under the rule requiring a liberal construction. And it is by no means clear that a strict construction would result in the nonapplication of the statute to this case. It says any case dismissed may be reinstated. Here the whole case has not been dismissed. Only part of it has been dismissed. But as the statute authorizes reinstatement where the whole case has been dismissed, shall it not be said, with great reason, that the whole includes each part—the greater, the lesser—and that the part dismissed may be reinstated? Moreover, it is the dismissal of the whole case as to a part of the tract included in the bill, and the statute authorizes, upon a proper showing, a severance of the tract, and dismissal as to part of it. At least, it must be said that there is color of right to reinstatement, such as calls upon the court for a decision upon the question, if such reinstatement shall be demanded by the state or any other interested party. In reply to this, it may be asked what right the court has to assume that anybody will demand a reinstatement, or that any party will not ask it. But that is an insufficient response. No such assumption is required or proper in pursuing the question whether the judge is interested. If it be held that he is qualified to sit in the cause, he must be held competent to sit in it for all purposes, with power to pass upon all rights involved. If any person has the right to call upon the court, in the case of State v. King, for an adjudication as to whether or not a reinstatement can or should be allowed, and the judge sitting in that cause cannot pass upon the question without passing upon a matter in which he is directly interested, then he is clearly disqualified by reason of his interest. The inquiry is not as to what the parties will or will not do, but as to what rights they have in the case. There is at least color of right to reinstatement, if not a clear right to it.

Nor can there be any doubt that, in passing upon a motion for reinstatement as to the Mounts land, the judge would have an interest involved sufficient to disqualify him, although not a party to the suit. The statute expressly provides that a final decree in such suit shall be a bar to the claim of every person to the real estate, or any part of it, or lien thereon, or to the proceeds thereof, who has failed to appear and present his claim thereto, except as to the excess of the proceeds of the sale thereof, and as to persons holding under a former sale or under section 8 of article 13 of the Constitution. Should the case be reinstated as to the Mounts land, upon which the judge holds, with others, a lease and a final decree of sale, his title would be absolutely gone. Should he rule against reinstatement and correction of the dismissal order, he would thereby render a decision in support of his own lease. Thus, even if it were necessary that the interest be such as would be affected by the decree to the extent of absolute conclusion of right, he appears to be a person interested in the subject-matter of the suit.

As must be apparent, this conclusion results from a consideration and analysis of the statutory provisions relating to suits for the sale of school lands, and the statute concerning the reinstatement of dismissed cases. There are no precedents. It is a case of first impression on the question of disqualifying interest. That interest appears to be of the most direct and substantial character. To make it otherwise, it would be necessary to assume that no motion for a reinstatement will or can be made, and that the act of the commissioner of school lands in employing counsel and moving the vacation of the order of dismissal of April 4th is not bona fide, but captious and impertinent. This the court cannot do. It can only ascertain what rights and interests are involved in the case, and then whether the judge is competent to pass upon, not some only, but all, of those rights and interests, and it clearly appears that he is not.

The interest here, upon the view taken of the statutes, is far greater and more direct than was the interest of Judge Bennett, which disqualified him in the case of Findley v. Smith, 42 W. Va. 299, 26 S. E. 370. There a small judgment, which he had assigned unconditionally and without recourse, was asserted as, and adjudicated to be, a lien upon real estate. He was not a party to the record, nor a necessary party to the suit; but the court held that an adjudication that the judgment was unpaid was a decree in his favor, because, although without recourse, his assignment of the judgment was a warranty that it was what it purported to be, that he had done and would do nothing to prevent its collection, and that it had not been paid. There was no intimation or suggestion that there had been any breach of that warranty, and yet this court, not doubting in the least the absolute integrity of the judge, and his absolute freedom from any possible wrong or impure intention, felt itself bound to reverse that decree because of this insignificant interest, which the judge had, no doubt, inadvertently overlooked.

This jealousy of the law is founded upon the following considerations, stated by Hurlbut, J., in Oakley v. Aspinwall, 3 N. Y. 547, 552, as follows: "It is the design of the law to maintain the purity and impartiality of the courts, and to insure for their decisions the respect and confidence of the community. Their judgments become precedents which control the determination of subsequent cases, and it is important, in that respect, that their decisions should be free from all bias. After securing wisdom and impartiality in their judgments, it is of great importance that the courts should be free from reproach or the suspicion of unfairness. The party may be interested only that his particular suit should be justly determined, but the state—the community—is concerned not only for that, but that the judiciary shall enjoy an elevated rank in the estimation of mankind." In that case a judge of an appellate court, on the bench of which sat seven other judges, four of whom concurred with him, had acted in the case at the request of counsel on both sides, made immediately after he had announced his disqualification and started to retire from the bench, and yet the judgment was reversed because of his disqualification. In this case, as in that, this court looks no further than to the question of disqualification.

It was suggested in the argument that the writ cannot go until after this court shall have decided on appeal that the interest is such as disqualifies, for the trial judge has jurisdiction, and must be allowed to pass upon collateral matters arising in the case, and his disqualification cannot be settled beyond question, except by the decision of this court. In Mayor of London v. Cox, L. R. 2 H. L. 259, 283, the answer to this objection is found in the following language: "Indeed, it seems not too much to assert that the question at what time a prohibition ought to issue is one of practice, only, and that there is not necessarily any difference in the form of the writ of prohibition itself, or the declaration thereupon, between the case of want of jurisdiction apparent upon the proceedings in the court below, and want of jurisdiction made known to the court above by surmise of collateral matter. The declaration in this case, for instance, which appears to be concisely and well drawn, is equally applicable to either alternative, and it is only upon the record that any question can arise in this house. Nothing but prolixity of pleading could ever have raised such a question upon the record, or otherwise than in the first instance upon the motion. No one can read the writs of prohibition already referred to, and the form of the record in Bracton, and the writs in the register ubi supra (which furnish good evidence of the law, more especially in the case of so ancient a writ as prohibition), without perceiving that no distinction is made between the two cases, and that in each the question to be tried upon the record is that of jurisdiction only. All the rest is but interlocutory on motion to satisfy the court that there is occasion for the prohibition, or for allowing the question of competency to be tried. If the application be resisted as unnecessary or vexatious or premature, the practice which has prevailed of deciding such matters at once upon the motion seems unquestionably the more convenient one. No case has been cited or found in which it was raised or decided upon the record. And there is abundant authority to show that even upon motion it is not an objection that ought to prevail, and that the party proceeded against in the inferior court may, at his option, either plead there, or apply for a prohibition." In this opinion, several instances are cited in which the writ of prohibition was awarded upon the application of parties who had never appeared to the actions in the courts of the judges against whom the writs were issued. The want of jurisdiction was shown upon the application for the writ of prohibition, and not otherwise. The language, "and it is only upon the record that any question can arise in this house," found in the above quotation, relates to the character of the tribunal in which the case was pending; it having no original, but only appellate, jurisdiction in cases of prohibition. It was the House of Lords, deliberating upon a proceeding in error against a decision of the Exchequer Chamber, which had affirmed a previous decision of the Court of Exchequer, in which the record had been made up. The inconvenience of making the record, in the court against whose judge the writ is applied for, show the want of jurisdiction, is adverted to in this language: "Nothing but prolixity of pleading could ever have raised such a question upon the record, or otherwise than in the first instance upon the motion." Our statute is a copy of the Act 1 Wm. IV, c. 21, and, in the same case, it is said that the only effect of that statute is to do away with the awarding of the writ upon what was called mere suggestion, without affidavit, and to substitute therefor an affidavit, and to do away with the common-law requirement that a declaration in prohibition should be upon behalf of the party, and also of the crown. A reference to our statute will show that this is true.

It is further urged that disqualification may be relied upon as error in the final decree to be made, and corrected on appeal. The anomalous character of such a proceeding has already been indicated. To what has been said it may be added that it would be worse than absurd to put parties to the labor and expense of proceeding to a final decree before an interested judge, only to find in the end that, although just such a decree as the law pronounces, it must be reversed because the judge had no power to enter it. If the awarding of the writ were purely discretionary, these considerations would abundantly justify it in such cases as this. But it is not and never was a purely discretionary writ. "The writ of prohibition at suit of a party is not, as it was thought to be by some eminent judges at the close of the seventeenth century [see, per Holt, C. J., Clay v. Snelgrove, and the decision of the same judge in Wharton v. Pits, overruled in Velthasen v. Ormsby], in the discretion of the court. This erroneous opinion may in part account for the fact that the cases reported to have occurred in the seventeenth century and the early part of the eighteenth, under the head of prohibition, are not to be reconciled with one another, or with earlier and later authorities. The law upon this question of discretion is thus stated in the judgment of the Queen's Bench in Burder v. Veley: "If called upon, we are bound to issue our writ of prohibition as soon as we are duly informed that any court of inferior jurisdiction has committed such a fault as to found our authority to prohibit, though there may be a possibility of correcting it by appeal. * * * The writ, however, although it may be of right, in the sense that upon an application being made in proper time, upon sufficient materials, by a party who has not by misconduct or laches lost his right, its grant or refusal is not in the mere discretion of the court, is not a writ of course, like a writ of summons in an ordinary action, but is the subject of a special application to the court upon affidavit, which application, and the proceedings thereupon, are now regulated by Act 1 Wm. IV, c. 21." Mayor of London v. Cox, L. R. 2 H. L., 239, 278, 279. There is no pretense of laches in this case, because, as has been shown, the petitioners have not submitted to the jurisdiction of the judge since his interest attached. On the contrary, they have resisted it in the court below without avail, and at last resorted to this court for the writ. Moreover, authorities hold that the parties cannot waive the disability of the judge.

Though Judge Doolittle cannot further act in the cause as to its merits, he may call in the judge of another circuit to hear it (Code 1899, c. 112, § 3), or direct the election of a special judge (Code 1899, c. 112, § 11), and he may possibly enter an order removing the cause to another county (Code 1899, c. 128, § 1). In the absence of any statute, an interested judge may act so far as is necessary to prevent a failure of justice. When he has sole jurisdiction, and the law provides no way by which any other judge may try the case, he may try it. His authority is then grounded upon necessity. In re Ryers, 72 N. Y. 1, 28 Am. Rep. 88; Great Charte v. Kennington, 2 Str. 1173; Mayor of London v. Markwick, 11 Mod. 164; Dimes v. Gr. Junc. Can. Co., 3 H. L. Cas. 759; Findley v. Smith, 42 W. Va. 299, 26 S. E. 370.

For the foregoing reasons, the writ of prohibition is awarded as prayed for.

FOLEY v. DODDRIDGE COUNTY COURT.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 7, 1903.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—INJUNCTION—EQUITY—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. Where private property is being taken for public use without compensation, equity has jurisdiction to enjoin the act, though there be controversy as to title or boundary of the land, and to pass on the right of the parties finally.

2. No title by adverse possession can be acquired of land owned by a county and used for public use for the site of a courthouse and other public buildings.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Doddridge County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Suit by Tabitha J. B. Foley against the county court of Doddridge county. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. V. Blair, for appellant. M. R. Crouse, W. S. Stewart, and Carter & Dupuy, for appellee.

¶ 2. See Adverse Possession, vol. 1, Cent. Dig. §§ 42, 43.

BRANNON, J. Nathan Davis was the owner of a tract of land on which stands the town of West Union, the county seat of Doddridge county. Davis, by deed dated May 15, 1845, conveyed to the county court a lot or parcel of one acre out of this tract "for the purpose of erecting thereon the necessary public buildings for the use of said county." Afterwards he laid out the town into streets and lots, and made a plat or diagram of the town, numbering the lots, showing the lot so conveyed to the county, and the relative position of it and the streets and lots as to each other, which plat was recorded in the office of the county clerk. After making the deed to the county, Davis conveyed to individuals four lots between the northwestern turnpike called "Pike Street," later "Main Street," and "South Street," later "Court Street," said lots on said plat being numbered 3, 14, 15, and 16, forming a block; 3 and 14 adjoining said courthouse lot or square on its west side, the conveyances of these lots calling for said square in their description or boundary. These four lots by mesne conveyances came to be the property of James A. Foley; lot 3 by deed dated November 6, 1848, and the others by deed dated December 29, 1851. Foley died in 1871. His will devised these lots to his widow, Tabitha J. B. Foley, for her life, with power of disposal, and remainder to his children, thus giving her at least an estate for her life. Foley took actual possession of these lots at once upon his acquisition of them, and the county took actual possession of its lots at once upon its acquisition by the erection and maintenance of a courthouse upon it. A strip of ground 21 feet 4 inches wide on Main street and 15 feet on South street is in controversy between the county and Foleys, the county claiming that its deed includes it, the Foleys denying this, and claiming its ownership. The question is one of boundary. In 1899 the county, by its contractors, began the excavation upon its lot of a foundation for a new courthouse, and deposited a large quantity of earth upon this disputed strip of ground, which was included in part by an old fence built by Foleys, and occupied by a coal house, trees, and shrubbery placed there by them; but the strip was virtually in common from absence of fence in part, and was largely taken up with briars and weeds and wild or neglected growth. Mrs. Foley filed her bill in equity setting up her title to said lots and the acts of the county court in such invasion of said strip, and alleging that said county designed to apply said strip for public purposes without having the same condemned according to law. An injunction was awarded against the county court restraining it from further acts upon said strip of ground. The county court demurred to the bill, but its demurrer was overruled. It then filed an answer setting up its deed from Davis for said courthouse square, claiming that it covered the strip of land in issue, and gave title to the county, and that it had right to deposit earth upon the strip, and to take possession of it for public use, and admitted that it had taken such possession, and was fitting the strip for public use by filling a drain thereon and grading the land, and denying any right in the Foleys to it. Depositions covering hundreds of pages of the printed record were taken, and upon the hearing the court made a decree of absolute dismissal of the bill and dissolution of the injunction, and from this decree Mrs. Foley appealed.

The first question we meet is whether equity has jurisdiction. The defense would justify the decree by the argument that the acts of the county are nothing but mere trespass, doing no irreparable damage, and that remedy adequate could be had by action at law, on principles stated in Becker v. McGraw, 48 W. Va. 539, 37 S. E. 532, and several prior cases. It does seem that the injury is of such character as to be compensated by action at law, so far as the nature of the acts of the county goes; but do the rules given in those cases answer in this cause? This is not a mere trespass, transient and passing, slightly affecting the freehold, because the bill alleges and the answer admits that the county was taking the strip of land for permanent public use, without compensation, forever wresting the land from the plaintiff, if her property; and it is settled that where a town or county is taking property for public use, without compensation, not merely injuring it, there is no legal remedy answering the emergency, and injunction lies. Boughner v. Clarksburg, 15 W. Va. 394; Yates v. West Grafton, 33 W. Va. 507, 11 S. E. 8; Mason City S. & M. Co. v. Mason City, 23 W. Va. 211; Ward v. Ohio R. R. Co., 35 W. Va. 481, 14 S. E. 142; Spencer v. Railroad, 23 W. Va. 406. In the case of taking land for public use without compensation no averment of irreparable injury is necessary, the very "taking" being such. Hilliard on Injunc. 588; Western v. Owings, 15 Md. 199, 74 Am. Dec. 563. Where the right of the plaintiff to the land is clear, and the power taking it has no title to it, the cases say that, as the Constitution imperatively demands prepayment or security of compensation, the injunction will restrain until compensation be paid or secured. But in this case there is controversy as to boundary, and consequently title is in dispute. Whilst injunction lies, is it only temporary until title or boundary shall be settled by recourse to law action, or will equity, having jurisdiction under the cases just cited for one purpose, go on to decide upon the question of boundary and title, and finally adjudge the right? The case of Freer v. Davis, 43 S. E. 164, 52 W. Va. 1, was a case where titles to land were hostile, and under one of them oil operations were going on for the taking of oil, and jurisdiction for injunction was sustained; but, as the matter involved was one of title, it was held that the injunction should be temporary, only until the conflict of title should be settled by action in the law forum, and then dissolved or perpetuated, according to the decision at law. The question will be found discussed in the two opinions in that case. Where there is no question as to title or boundary, or the matter is clear, the equity court gives full decision in case of irreparable damage, as conceded in that case by all the members of the court; but where title or boundary is fairly in issue the majority held that under the general rule that equity will not try contested title or boundary unless there be jurisdiction under some known head independent of title or boundary, the injunction should be entertained only until legal adjudication, and equity could not decide title or boundary, as the Constitution gives a claimant to land trial by jury. This doctrine presents the objection that the arm of equity falls limp as soon as a controversy of boundary or title crops out in the case, and further litigation in another suit is necessitated. But much authority sustains it. In that excellent equity work, Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq., vol. 8, p. 524, is an elaborate review of this question, sustaining jurisdiction for at least temporary injunction. See page 430. I expressed no final opinion in the Freer Case upon this question, nor do I in this case. In that case I did not, and in this case do not, find it requisite to do so, because I contended in it, as I do in this case, that when a party chooses the equity court, and submits his whole case to it, he cannot, in case of defeat, raise the question of jurisdiction. Mrs. Foley chose her court in this case. If a decree made without jurisdiction because the law forum is the proper one were absolutely void, it might be different. Then the court, without being asked, might treat it as not binding anybody; but such decree is not void, but merely erroneous upon complaint by appeal. St. Lawrence Co. v. Holt, 51 W. Va. 352, 41 S. E. 351. I cite Buskirk v. King, 72 Fed. 22, 18 C. C. A. 418, sustaining temporary injunction during contest of title. I cite Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 537, 5 Sup. Ct. 565, 28 L. Ed. 1116, for the language: "It is now a common practice in cases where irremediable mischief is threatened or being done, going to the destruction of the substance of the estate, such as extracting of ores from a mine, or the cutting of timber, or the removal of coal, to issue an injunction, though the title be in litigation." See 8 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 431. And in Haskell v. Sutton, 44 S. E. 533, 53 W. Va. 206, this court upheld the jurisdiction for at least temporary injunction. In Camp v. Dixon, 112 Ga. 872, 88 S. E. 71, 52 L. R. A. 755, 8 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 421, the jurisdiction to fully decree on adverse titles seems to be asserted fully. Where equity once lawfully takes jurisdiction by injunction against trespass working irreparable damage—as extracting oil, or taking land for public use without pay—and question of title or boundary arises, I do not say whether or not equity can decree the whole case without recourse to law. Under Freer v. Davis it cannot do so. I do not say whether or not a party who has objected to jurisdiction can, in case of decree against him, reverse for that cause. I only say that one who has chosen the equity court, and thus waived a jury, ought not to be permitted to do so; but Freer v. Davis holds that he is not estopped. In the cases where this court has entertained appeals from decrees in injunction cases against taking land for public use the court seems to have considered all questions, though the question whether the court should decide all questions without recourse to common law was not pointedly considered in them. Those cases, however, show that the jurisdiction was not questioned. In the present case the plaintiff not only selected the chancery court, and submitted her rights to it, but in this court she asked the court "to take the case for all purposes, settle the disputed line, and enter such decree as should have been entered by the lower court." But without regard to the fact that the plaintiff elected to go into equity, the whole court thinks that, as the Constitution prohibits the taking of private property for public use without compensation, equity has jurisdiction in this case to pass upon the merits in full.

The question involved is the location of the line dividing the courthouse square from the Foley lots 3 and 14. When we once locate the lines of the courthouse lot or square, this question of the case is ended, because the deed from Davis to the county is first in date, and, besides, the conveyances by which the Foleys claim call for this courthouse lot, and thus limit the Foley lots by it. The Foleys have no title to invade the county property. I cannot detail the several hundred printed pages of evidence on this boundary question. Even the reference to it here made is unnecessary, and even improper, as it can be of no use for purposes of precedent, but it is made to indicate reasons why we find the boundary controversy in favor of the county, when in fact we need not, ought not, do even this, but simply find the result of the evidence. The evidence shows certain salient facts which plainly lead to the conclusion that the strip in issue is within the boundary of the courthouse lot. The north side line of the county courthouse square is Main street, once called "Pike Street"; its south side line is South street, once "Court Street." On its east side it joins lot No. 2, and on its west side the Foley lots 3 and 14. The deed of Davis to the county gives the boundary of the courthouse lot thus: "Beginning at a point near the spring drain, on the west side of said drain, and the Northwestern Turnpike road, and running S. 32 W. 13 poles to a stake; thence S. 53 E. 12 poles to a stake; thence N. 32 E. 13 poles to a stake; thence N. 58 W. 12 poles to the beginning." As shown by the original plat of West Union made by Davis and recorded, this courthouse square is bounded on its north side by Main street and an alley, and on its south side by Court or South street, on its east by lot No. 2 on said plat, and on its west side by the Foley lots 3 and 14. Where shall we place the beginning corner of the courthouse lot? We do not put it just at or in the drain that ran from the public spring in courthouse lot, as Foley seems to have thought he had right to do, because the county deed says the square begins "near" the drain, on its west side. This word "near" is indefinite—does not give exact point. But look at that plat made by Davis laying down the courthouse square, and the lots of the town by number, and the streets, and we find north of Main street an alley running from the north to Main street, passing lots 1 and 10, and stopping at the courthouse lot, and then resuming its course south from South street, passing lots 17 and 4. And we see on this plat that the line of these lots is marked clear through the town, running past lots 1 and 10 north of Main street, crossing Main street, and passing between the courthouse square and the Foley lots 3 and 14, and then crossing South street, and then passing on the west side of said alley along lots 17 and 14. Why shall we not adopt this line? Approach court square from the north or south by this line, and we find it continuing along the courthouse lot, dividing it from the Foley lots. That plat, the original one of the town, dictates the location of the dividing line between the courthouse square and the Foley lots. After 50 years, after the fathers of the town sleep, that plat lives, and points for us the unerring finger of indean. Nobody says that this line is not the line of lots 1 and 10 north of Main street, and of lots 4 and 17 south of South street, and the plat shows that the Foley lots between those streets have a common east line with the lots north and south of them. We cannot escape from the line so plainly shown by this plat. That plat says we must put the beginning corner of the courthouse lot just at the point where that line leaves Main street on the south side of Main street. It never was the intent of Davis to make these Foley lots just a wide space farther east than neighboring lots across Main and South streets from them. It would produce irregularity, and defeat the plan of the town, as shown by the old plat. The plat denies this claim. This alone settles where the dividing line is, and ends the controversy; but it is by no means all that goes to the same result. Away back in years, shortly after Davis conveyed to the county the courthouse lot, and shortly after he conveyed the Foley lots, when the first settlers of West Union were living and Davis living, a storehouse was built by Foley himself on Foley's lot 3 on South street just at the corner of courthouse square. It is now the Foley residence. It is fair to presume that when the lines were well known it was the intent to place this house just at the line of the courthouse square. There it is to-day. But it is not a mere presumption, for Hickman says that he well knew of the building of this storehouse by Foley, and that his purpose was to put it just at the line of the courthouse lot, and was careful to do so. Other witnesses say so. Hickman had peculiar means to know this, because he was clerk of the courts in the forties, right on the courthouse ground, and a friend and in daily intercourse with Foley, as is attested by Foley's will directing his wife as executrix to follow Hickman's advice. Here, then, we have the action of Foley, the owner of lot 3, certifying that this old plat line, now claimed by the county court, was the true line. To confirm the position that this line is the true one, upon it a fence was built many years ago joining the house, and running thence to Main street at the point where stands a stone very lately planted by the county as the point claimed by it as the beginning corner of the courthouse lot. This fence is gone, but traces of it remain. Just inside this fence from two to three feet Foley himself planted a line of apple trees many years ago. He built or recognized that fence. The line of apple trees was set by him because he recognized that fence as the line. This fence, these apple trees, were set soon after Davis conveyed the Foley lots. They tell in strong voice where that line was. Those trees stand to-day on the line above spoken of, living monuments to prove the true division line. They stand two to three feet from a line run from that house to that stone on Main street. One of them stands nearly at that stone claimed by the county as such beginning corner. Now, if Foley, when the matter was new, thought that the true line was $10\frac{1}{2}$ feet east of that house on South street, as claimed by Foleys at one time, or $15\frac{1}{2}$ feet, as claimed by them later, and 21 feet east of the stone on Main street, as claimed by them at one time, or $16\frac{1}{2}$ feet, as claimed by them later, why did he not put that fence on that different line, and set his trees there? Because he did not then think the line was there. He did not then so understand the deed. Here a legal principle has telling force. "If the language used in the descriptive clause is uncertain and doubtful, the practical construction given to the deed by the subsequent acts of the parties may be shown by parol evidence." 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 1042. Their acts speak their construction. Caperton's Adm'r v. Caperton's Heirs, 36 W. Va. 479, 15 S. E. 149. That this house does abut on the courthouse lot is shown by further evidence. The evidence of J. N. Wolverton, county surveyor, shows that he went to a point on South street to a nail or peg placed for a corner at the Union Bank, placed there by an old county surveyor for a proper corner of a lot on Columbia street, and, making proper allowance for that street's width, ran along South street along the Foley lots to the corner of said house next the courthouse lot, and found the distance of the Foley property on South street 198 feet, just as called for in their deeds. But they would go on 10 or 15 feet further, and cut down by that length the line of the courthouse lot, though it was first conveyed, and the Foley grant was limited by it. And this house is just on that line running across the town above spoken of as shown by the old plat. And, treating the house as on the line, the Foley lots have the same distance along South street as the lots on the other side of the street, the Maulsby and Neely lots, harmonize with them; whereas the claim of Foleys would give them $19\frac{1}{2}$, or 14 feet more length than those lots, when they should be the same. That house ends on the line, and a line from it by the county's deed S., 32 W., $214\frac{1}{2}$ feet, conveys us to Main street at the stone claimed as the beginning corner of the county lot by the county court. We must add an important item of evidence to corroborate this. Who should know the line, the beginning corner, better than Davis, the common grantor? He showed Hickman this controverted line in 1845 or 1846, and the corner of the courthouse lot on Main street was at or near where stands the stone claimed as the true corner by the county.

But let us seek this beginning corner and this line of division from another direction. There is a point admitted by both sides to be the northeast corner of the courthouse lot. It was established as such corner by a verdict in an ejectment between Knight and Charter. Though this finding is not evidence in this case competent, yet it is conceded that it is such corner, and that from it there ran an old fence to South street near the old jail, at a rock planted many years ago by Sherwood between lot No. 2 on the old town plat and the courthouse lot, and that this is the true eastern line of that lot—the opposite end of the lot from the division line litigated in this case. Now, run from the said point or corner on the alley, the northeast corner of courthouse lot, along the line of lot No. 2 along the fence to the old jail, and then with it to the stone planted years ago by Sherwood for the corner of lot No. 2 and the courthouse lot, by the course and distance of the county deed, and it brings us to that stone on South street at the corner of the old jail. Then run from this corner along South street the course and distance called for by the county deed, and the line ends on the corner strip of the said storehouse erected by Foley. This fully corroborates the much other evidence to sustain the position that said house has its end on the true division line between the courthouse lot and the Foley lots. Thus we have three established corners, and from them we can inevitably locate the fourth. That fourth corner must mathematically be found at the intersection of two lines. Run one from the storehouse by the call of the county deed, and it ends at the stone on Main street claimed by the county as its beginning corner; run the other from said northeastern corner to the courthouse lot, the Knight-Charter corner, along the alley and Main street, by the course of the county deed, and it ends at that stone. The evidence shows that Foley in his life moved that old fence, or rather built new ones, each time further east on the public property. He told an intimate friend that he would do so; that his line was on Main street where the drain emerged; and he made an excavation for an icehouse, and dumped the earth into the drain, ravine, or hollow, and pushed the drain further east, and intended to get further over on the courthouse property. He told his friend that he intended to fence in the spring when he again removed the fence. He knew where the true line was. Suppose we run the lines according to the Foley claims. We dislocate streets and lots by disarrangement and denial of the town plat, a strong argument against the Foley claim. It would change the shape of the end of the Foley lots following the county deed. The present Foley fence, which has gone to decay, practically leaving their lots to common, is 10 feet and 2 inches east of the house on South street. A point on the opposite of the lot—that is, on Main street—21 feet and 4 inches from the stone set by the county, is the point first claimed by Foleys as the corner of the courthouse lot and their lots. The fence ran to it. You cannot run a line between these points along the fence and follow the course of the deed. The deed call is 82 degrees; this line call 88 degrees. Say that the point 21 feet 4 inches from the planted stone is the beginning call on Main street, and say that the said house is a corner on South street. A line run between these corners varies from the deed, and, after passing the house and crossing South street, would not follow the alley shown on the plat, now Church street, but would invade lot 17 on the south side of South street, and run diagonally through it. Then run a line from said point on Main street along the Foley fence, and it will not follow or touch Church street, but will cross South street and invade a lot on the east side of Church street (old alley), lot 16 on the old plat, and on the north of Main street run through O'Leary's building. But the Foley claim for the point on Main street seems to change from the distance of 21 feet and 4 inches from the stone to a point $16\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the stone, and from a distance of 10 feet 2 inches east of the house on South street to one 15 feet east of the house. This line would cross South street and invade still more lot 16, and violate the town plan as shown on the original plat. These considerations, and other more tedious ones might be added, show that the claim of the Foleys antagonizes the plat forming the town, cuts down the courthouse lot, the first grant, and adds to the Foley lots, and disagrees with the true relative location of many neighboring lots as presented by said plat. The line from the corner of the Foley residence on South street to the stone on Main street must be held to be the true division line between the courthouse lot and the Foley lots.

Another question. Mrs. Foley claims that, be the line where it may, she has good right to the strip by adverse possession under the statute of limitations. This question is tested by the question whether one can, by encroachment upon a public street, get title against the public by adverse possession. Both a street and a courthouse lot are held in trust for public use, and no other purpose whatever, by town and county court. They are not in such cases private property owners. The county court has legal title, it is true, but solely for governmental purposes. As to streets this court has held that no one can by possession get title against the public right. Ralston v. Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. 326, 76 Am. St. Rep. 834; Weston v. Ralston, 48 W. Va. 170, 36 S. E. 446; McClellan v. Weston, 49 W. Va. 669, 39 S. E. 670, 55 L. R. A. 898. The town does not own the streets, nor do the people of a town, "but the public at large." In Norfolk v. Chamberlaine, 29 Grat. 534, one reason for this position is based on a general rule, hoary with age, founded on public policy and necessity, that the obstruction of a public way is a public indictable nuisance, and that no lapse of time will legitimate it. Encroachment upon courthouse ground is a public nuisance, because it affects the public, which has a right to its unrestricted use. 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 683; Commonwealth v. Eckert, 2 Browne, 249. Such public nuisance prevents the public use, and where even the property, the very title, is vested in the state, county, or municipality, such wrong prevents the state, county, or municipality from freely using the property to accomplish the only purpose of its ownership; that is, its application for governmental purposes in its public use. If such were not the law, then the governing power would lose property essential for government purposes because of the inattention of officials or their ignorance of hostile possession. But it is said by some that this rule is changed in this state from the fact that section 20, c. 85, of the Code of 1899, says that "every statute of limitations, unless otherwise expressly provided, shall apply to the state." The books say that the statute runs as to property held by the government merely as owner in private ownership, but not as to that held for purposes of government in its actual use. Elliot, Roads & S. (2d Ed.) §§ 882, 136. That exception applies even where the statute runs against the state, for, if there were no statute making limitation apply to the state, there would be no need of such exception. The well-considered Georgia case of Norrell v. Augusta Railway Company (1902) 42 S. E. 486, 59 L. R. A. 101, meets this objection pointedly as do other authorities, holding that even where there is a statute making adverse possession apply to the state, the statute is to be construed as intended to apply only to such property as is held by the state like an individual proprietor, and operate only on its property interest, and as not intended to apply to property held by the state for purely governmental purposes. The court said, "Prescription does not run against a municipal corporation in regard to land held for the benefit of the public." This is a fair construction of such a statute, and is only an instance of the rule often applied in the construction of statutes; that is, that we must not too closely and literally follow the letter, but must follow the spirit; for statutes have a spirit and intent as well as a letter. Shall we always make a statute do what we are sure will work a result not intended by the Legislature, simply because to do so would be justified by its letter, when we know there are other instances where conformity to its letter will attain the real purpose, as if we give this statute application against the state as to its demands for money and property rights vested in it as if a private owner, and not held in trust for actual use in the exercise of governmental functions? Let us illustrate: West Virginia owns thousands of acres of wild land forfeited for taxes. This property is not itself used in the exercise of government. Its proceeds only are so used, but not the very land. If one claiming title seizes himself upon this land, he gets a good title from the lapse of time, because the statute cited makes limitation run against the state in such a case. As state officers cannot possibly watch lands in all sections of the state, we may well doubt the wisdom of the statute giving benefit of limitation to the occupant in such case, and thus causing the state to lose its property. But the Legislature has seen proper to do so; but can we say that it intended to deprive the state of property which in its very self is held for government purposes, and essential to enable the public authorities to carry on government? We cannot think so. Suppose one should hold for 10 years the state capitol, or an annex or subsidiary building, or a part of the capitol ground, or any ground or property used in actual government, could we think the Legislature intended the state to lose it by adverse possession? Suppose the state owned a turnpike, can we think the Legislature designed by the act in question to lose to the state that turnpike by adverse possession? Reason, necessity, the public welfare, and legal authorities deny such result. But if you contest this position, and say that the letter of the act covers all property, and every right of the state, then we take you at your word, and fall back on the very letter of the statute, and say that it applies only to "the state." A county or town is not the state. The state does not own a courthouse lot or street or road. Indeed, I go further and say that, as to a highway, neither the county nor town owns it; nobody owns it; only that noncorporate, indefinable "public" owns it, if ownership anywhere there is. Hoadley v. City, 50 Cal. 285; opinion in Norfolk v. Chamberlaine, 29 Grat. 534. Where is the statute of limitation in letter applying to that right? The statute of limitations supposes a right in one party to be made good by time, and a right in another to be defeated by time. Who has the right in a highway to be defeated by time? There is no legal entity to which the statute can apply, no person against whom it can run, no individual right. This is illustrated by the late Nebraska case of Krueger v. Jenkins, 59 Neb. 641, 81 N. W. 844. Former cases in that state held that adverse possession would defeat the public right in a street, but this case involved a highway in the country, and the court said that those earlier cases were based on the statute which gave the town actual title to a street, and enabled it to sell it, and devote its proceeds to any use, whereas in a case of a county road that statute did not apply, and that no time would bar the public right in such road. The court said: "The right involved in this litigation is one belonging exclusively to the public at large. Neither Douglass county nor its citizens have any peculiar interest in it. A county does not hold legal title to county roads. It has no power of disposition over them, no proprietary interest in them. In performing duties with which it is charged in connection with them, it is an agent of the state, and in the interests of general public. Title to part of a county road cannot be acquired by adverse possession." In West Virginia the adjoining owner owns the soil of a street or road. The county or towns own nothing. The public has right of passage, and the county or town simply has control and management for the public use. There is no property in it; no person owning such property as that limitation can run against him in the absence of a statute plainly making the public right subject to limitation. The Georgia case of Norrell v. Augusta Railroad Company, 42 S. E. 468, 59 L. R. A. 101, says that, as the city has no power to grant away a street, it cannot lose it by inaction, citing Augusta v. Burum (Ga.) 19 S. E. 820, 28 L. R. A. 340, holding that no time gives right to continue an awning over a street, though the statute runs against the state. The court in the latter case said that we must attribute the presence of the awning to a mere revocable license express or implied; that "the public are the rulers—the source of all power—and it cannot be sound doctrine that their servant in any lawmaking department can, by lapse of time, be deprived of powers the exercise of which are essential or necessary to the proper performance of their duties and obligations to the public." A later Georgia case, decided August 14, 1903, repeats this holding. Langley v. City Council, 45 S. E. 486.

It is sound law that a municipal corporation cannot by express act give up or sell a part or all of a street without statute authority. Roper v. McWhorter, 77 Va. 214; Mayor v. Ray, 19 Wall. 468, 22 L. Ed. 164; Jordan v. Chenoa, 166 Ill. 536, 47 N. E. 191. It is therefore going far to say that by mere negligence a town can deprive the public of an essential right of passage over its street. Is it unreasonable that a court should, before holding the statute of limitation applicable to work so dire a result to the public as the loss of a great right of highway, demand a statute from the Legislature plainly requiring it to so hold? The public right is the highest in this land. It is to be preferred to mere individual right. It would be disastrous to the public welfare to allow the public highways to be lost by private encroachment until the Legislature shall so command. We cannot recede from the position three times taken by this court in the three cases above cited.

Since those cases were decided there have been subsequent review and declarations of the law upon this subject. The Georgia case decided in 1902 has been above stated. In a late note in Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Ely (Wash.) 87 Am. St. Rep. 775, this subject has been reviewed upon many authorities, and the statement made that sound law and the great and conclusive weight of authority show that the public cannot thus lose its right in a street. Language used by Judge Dent in the opinion in Ralston v. Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 83 S. E. 326, 76 Am. St. Rep. 834, is extensively quoted in that note, and is pronounced as reflecting sound law. All the great text-books substantially so state the law, especially the late ones. That late and most valuable work on municipal corporations, Smith on Municipal Corporations, § 1092, says: "From some loose dicta both in this country and in England it has been supposed that a right to maintain a public nuisance may be acquired by prescription, but no such right should exist in reason, and the great weight of authority is against it. There can be no sound rule of law that will protect any man in thus depriving others of the substantial use and enjoyment of their property." In section 1511 we read: "And so a part of a road which is not used or traveled for six years, and becomes impassable for vehicles, ceases as to such part to be a highway, and the village or city is not liable for injuries thereon received. (Under a statute.) But this nonuser by the public must be distinguished from such an occupation by a trespasser of a part of a highway as amounts to an obstruction or nuisance, and he cannot acquire a prescriptive right to the highway by a continued occupation of twenty years." C.) 16 Fed. 350; London & San Francisco Bank v. Oakland, 90 Fed. 691, 702, 33 C. C. A. 237. If the idea of abandonment be suggested, I would say, as stated in the case of Town of Weston v. Ralston, 48 W. Va. 182, 36 S. E. 446, that I cannot conceive how abandonment by a town of its street by mere nonuser can be asserted, because, as shown by authorities there cited, there must be not only a mere nonuser, but also express intention to abandon. How can we say a town or a county court, mere corporations acting by officers, can be held to abandon a street or a courthouse lot? It is well settled that even a private owner cannot be held to have abandoned his property without both act of nonuser and intent to abandon. Lowther Oil Co. v. Miller-Sibly Oil Co., 44 S. E. 433, 53 W. Va. 501; Hast v. Railroad Co., 52 W. Va. 396, 44 S. E. 155. Mere silence of a town council could not be considered an abandonment of a street. It would surely require express order of vacation. Shirk v. City, 196 Ill. 298, 63 N. E. 193; De Kalb v. Luney, 193 Ill. 185, 61 N. E. 1036. How otherwise could it be proven that a town intended to abandon a street? How can we say that a county court intended to abandon part of the court square without an order of the court? That the public right cannot be lost on the idea of mere abandonment, see, further, De Kalb v. Luney, 193 Ill. 185, 61 N. E. 1036; Shirk v. City, 196 Ill. 298, 63 N. E. 193; Taylor v. Pearce, 179 Ill. 145, 53 N. E. 622; Chafee v. City of Aiken (S. C.) 35 S. E. 800; Crocker v. Collins, 37 S. C. 327, 15 S. E. 951, 34 Am. St. Rep. 752; Reilly v. City of Racine, 51 Wis. 526, 8 N. W. 417; Elliott, Roads & S. (1st Ed.) 660.

There is another argument against adverse possession applying to streets and public squares by mere encroachment upon their bounds, and that is that it wants that essential element to apply limitation, namely, that the possession must be either under color or claim of title with intent to claim. Where one holds under color of title, occupation is prima facie proof of claim of title and intention to claim. Ketchum v. Spurlock, 34 W. Va. 597, 12 S. E. 832. Where, however, there is no color of title, it must distinctly appear that the encroachment by occupation was with intent to claim the property as his own. The claimant must make this affirmatively appear. Hudson v. Putney, 14 W. Va. 561; Clarke v. McClure, 10 Grat. 306. As suggested by the Georgia court in Augusta v. Burum, 93 Ga. 68, 19 S. E. 820, 26 L. R. A. 340, such possession would be presumed to be under license—a tacit license. Where one fences a whole street we may infer intent to claim; but where he fences only a part, makes a partial encroachment on a street or courthouse lot, without paper color of title, should we not infer a tacit license, in order to save the public right? At least, should we not demand of the encroacher affirmative evidence of actual intent to claim the property as his own? Otherwise the possession is not adverse.

For these reasons we affirm the decree dismissing the bill.

ATKINSON v. WASHINGTON AND JEFFERSON COLLEGE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 14, 1903.)

TRUSTEE—CONTRACT OF SALE—AVOIDANCE—BILL—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—BURDEN OF PROOF—NOTICE OF SALE—PUBLICATION—SUFFICIENCY—SALE FOR CREDIT—INADEQUACY OF PRICE.

1. A contract of sale between a trustee in a deed of trust and a purchaser is complete when the trustee, selling at auction, knocks the land down to the bidder, makes a memorandum of the sale and its terms, and signs the same.

2. When a plaintiff, seeking to avoid such sale, admits in his bill that it was made, but does not set up the statute of frauds, nor claim the benefit thereof, he is taken to have admitted an agreement which is either good under the statute, or otherwise binding upon him; and the contract will be held good, although it does not appear that such memorandum was made and signed.

3. When the purchaser at such sale is not the trust creditor, nor a person in any way connected with the deed of trust, except by his act of purchase, nor in any way chargeable with responsibility for the regularity of the proceedings of the trustee, nor having power of control over them, nor affected with any notice of irregularities, the burden is upon the party attempting to set the sale aside on the ground of want of due advertisement to show failure of advertisement, defects in the notice, want of sufficient publication, or service or posting thereof.

4. Where the deed of trust provides that notice of a sale under it may be given by advertisement "published thirty days previous thereto in some newspaper," etc., publication in such newspaper once a week during such period of 30 days is sufficient.

5. Failure to serve the notice upon the non-resident attorney in fact of the debtor will not invalidate the sale made by the trustee, although such attorney may have been domiciled in the county.

6. In the law of process and service thereof, the term "resident" is generally synonymous with inhabitant.

7. Under the statute relating to sales under deeds of trust, a purchaser of the property upon which the trust deed is, or a subsequent incumbrancer thereof, is not entitled to personal service of the notice of such sale.

8. A sale made by a trustee will not be set aside on the ground of failure to post the notice of sale at the front door of the courthouse, when such failure is denied, unless there is proof thereof; the burden being upon the plaintiff to establish such irregularity.

9. A sale made by a trustee will not be set aside because of his failure to make the report required by section 3 of chapter 87 of the Code of 1899.

10. Where a trustee has sold property under a notice specifying the terms of sale to be cash, and afterwards, with the consent of the creditor who is entitled to receive the purchase money, allows the purchaser time in which to pay a portion of the purchase money, receiving notes therefor, and the residue in cash, without any prior agreement or understanding between the trustee and purchaser that there should be an allowance of credit as to any portion of the purchase money, such departure from the contract of purchase does not invalidate the sale.

11. When a deed of trust provides that any sale of the property made by virtue thereof may be for cash or on credit, or partly for cash and partly on credit, and does not stipulate for personal notice of the sale to any person not provided for as to such notice in the statute, the conduct of the trustee, in selling for cash, and failing to have the notice of sale served upon a lienor holding a subsequent deed of trust on the property, or claiming the land as a purchaser at a sale made under such subsequent deed of trust, is not fraudulent, inequitable, or illegal, and affords no ground for setting aside the sale.

12. Such sale will not be set aside, on the ground of inadequacy of price, at the instance of such holder of a subsequent deed of trust, or purchaser at a sale made thereunder, when his bill is unaccompanied by any offer to pay a larger price for the land than that for which it sold, and bond or other guaranty that such higher price will be paid on a resale, and the evidence as to the value of the land does not clearly show that the price for which it sold is so inadequate as to shock the conscience, and indicate that a fraud has been perpetrated upon the rights of the party complaining.

13. One who complains of such a sale is not entitled to more favorable treatment in a court of equity than a person who complains of an unconfirmed judicial sale.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hancock County; H. C. Hervey, Judge.

Bill by John H. Atkinson against the Washington and Jefferson College and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John R. Donehoo, for appellant. H. M. Russell and G. L. Cranmer, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. John H. Atkinson, the appellant, held a lien by deed of trust upon the property of the American Fire Clay Company, in Hancock county, for a debt amounting to something over $6,000, prior to which another lien on the same property was held by a Mrs. Donaldson for something over $2,000; and, to enable his debtor to borrow $10,000 from the Washington and Jefferson College, a Pennsylvania corporation, with which to pay, among other things, the debt due Mrs. Donaldson, he released his lien in the year 1890; and the Washington and Jefferson College loaned the fire clay company $10,000, and took a deed of trust on the property, executed to G. L. Cranmer, trustee, bearing date July 28, 1890, and afterwards said fire clay company executed its note to said Atkinson for the sum of $6,824, and a deed of trust upon the same property to secure the payment thereof, in which Albert Haigh was made trustee. Both debts being unpaid, as well as a large amount of other indebtedness due from said company to other parties, Cranmer, trustee, at the instance of the college, and after due advertisement according to the terms of the deed of trust, as is claimed, sold the property on the 25th day of November, 1898, for $12,910, announcing that James M. Porter was the purchaser. At January rules, 1899, Atkinson filed his bill in equity against the college, Cranmer, trustee, the American Fire Clay Company, Albert Haigh, trustee, Hugh L. Irwin, trustee, and James M. Porter, setting up all of the foregoing facts, and, in addition thereto, that there was a third lien by deed of trust on the property, in which said Irwin was trustee, in favor of numerous creditors, for amounts aggregating about $22,000, and alleging the invalidity of said sale on the ground of irregularities and alleged defects in the notice of sale and service thereof, illegal and inequitable conduct on the part of the trustee in selling for cash under the peculiar circumstances existing, inadequacy of price, and failure on the part of the college to give a credit of $300 on its debt. He further alleged that Porter had been put into possession of the property, and was receiving the rents and profits thereof; but, whether said sale had been fully consummated by the payment of the purchase price and the execution of the deed, plaintiff was uninformed, but he alleged that at the time of the commencement of his suit no deed to the purchaser had been recorded. Later, it was ascertained by Atkinson that Porter had purchased for himself and John A. Campbell, and that, instead of paying all the purchase money in cash, according to the terms of sale specified in the notice, they had paid $5,000 in cash, and given their notes for the residue. Thereupon he filed an amended bill setting up these facts, and alleging considerable additional matter against the validity of the sale. Said amended bill is not in the record. The clerk certifies that it is not in the file of papers in the cause, and cannot be found. The substance of it, however, may be gathered from the demurrers and answers filed, and is admitted in the briefs of counsel on both sides, and no exception is taken on the ground of its absence from the record.

Among other things, it is shown that in 1896 Albert Haigh, trustee, made a sale under plaintiff's deed of trust at which plaintiff became the purchaser at the price of $15,000; and it seems to have been alleged in that connection that the college consented to said sale, and agreed that the proceeds thereof should be applied to the satisfaction of its lien, which alleged agreement and connection with the sale on the part of the college is denied. Later a suit was brought by a creditor of the American Fire Clay Company and its other creditors to enforce a judgment lien, and it appears to have been alleged in that connection that the bill therein attacked the said sale made by Haigh, and that a decree was finally entered affirming the validity of that sale, and thereby affected, by way of an adjudication against it, the lien of said college. But this allegation is denied, and it is averred that no finding was made by the decree respecting the validity of the sale, and that, lest the decree might, by inference, be taken to have decided any matters between the plaintiff and the college, the court added a provision that it was not intended to affect any of their rights, legal or equitable. Nothing is said about these matters in the brief of counsel for appellant, and evidently they have been abandoned. The argument in the brief proceeds upon the admission of a valid lien held by the Washington and Jefferson College, and merely attacks the sale as an uncompleted one, and as one which ought not to be completed because of the irregularities and defects in the proceedings on the part of the trustee, and alleged inequitable conduct on his part in proceeding as he did. No deed has been executed to the purchasers, and the reason given for this, as well as for the failure to pay all the purchase money in cash, by the appellees in their answers, is the institution of this suit. The purchasers say they were ready, and have ever since been ready, to pay the entire amount of the purchase money, upon receiving a deed for the property, and are informed and believe that the deed would have been executed and delivered to them by the trustee but for the bringing by the plaintiff of this suit, and that the pendency of this suit has since interfered with the closing of the transaction.

The purchase money not having been paid according to the terms set forth in the notice to sell, and no deed having as yet been made, counsel differ widely in their views concerning the nature of the sale and transaction, and the rights of the parties thereto, as determined by the nature of the sale; it being insisted on the part of counsel for the appellees that there is a complete contract of sale, binding the trustee to convey the title, and the purchasers to accept the same and pay the purchase money, in consequence of which the purchasers are entitled to the presumption in favor of the regularity of the proceedings which obtains in the case of a complete and confirmed judicial sale. On the other hand, it is claimed for the appellants that the sale has been arrested and stopped before completion, in consequence of which there is no presumption in favor of its validity, and that it stands in a position closely analogous to that of an unconfirmed judicial sale—liable to be set aside by the court for irregularity, with the burden resting upon the purchasers of proving the regularity and validity of the sale in the assertion of their demand for a conveyance of the title.

The rule announced in Gibson's Heirs v. Jones, 5 Leigh, 370, in reference to a completed sale under a deed of trust, is that, where it is impeached by an heir of the deceased debtor on the ground that the trustees did not make due advertisement of the sale in pursuance of the deed of trust, the sale is irregular, if the advertisement was not so made, and that the burden of proof of such advertisement rests upon the parties claiming under the deed. That rule has probably been discarded in this state. It is now held that where a trustee has made a sale, and conveyed the land to a purchaser, who has recorded his deed, and a suit is brought by the grantor to set it aside because the land was not advertised in the manner specified in the deed of trust, the burden of proving the allegation is on the plaintiff, and that it will be presumed, after the making of the deed and recordation thereof, that the land was properly advertised. Burke & Keatly v. Adair, 23 W. Va. 139; Lallance v. Fisher, 29 W. Va. 512, 2 S. E. 775; Fulton v. Johnson, 24 W. Va. 95; Dryden v. Stephens, 19 W. Va. 1. An examination of the decisions of this court fails to disclose any case in which the aid of a court of equity has been sought by the debtor, or an interested creditor, in arresting the execution of the deed after the sale has progressed so far as the acceptance of a bid by the trustee, after crying the sale pursuant to advertisement, at the time and place fixed for sale, and payment of part of the purchase money by the purchaser. There is therefore no precedent to be followed in this case, and the conclusion must be determined by the general principles of equity cases involving sales by trustees under deeds of trust. There are many cases in which sales have been enjoined upon the application of the grantor in the deed of trust, showing equitable grounds, such as the misconduct of the trustee, want of notice, a defect in the notice, usury in the debt secured, or disputed claims as to credits upon the debt, but the bills have been filed and the injunction granted before the date of sale. In some cases sales have been set aside, even after the execution of the deed, upon equitable grounds. Rossett v. Fisher, 11 Grat. 492.

The nature of the contract between the trustee and the purchaser has been determined by this court in the case of Fleming v. Holt, 12 W. Va. 143, where Judge Green, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "A sale by a trustee, like a sale by a commissioner, is without warranty; but there is this obvious difference between the two: The contract of purchase at a sale by the commissioner is incomplete till his bid is accepted by the court, who is the real seller of the property, the commissioner of sale being the mere agent of the court. The bid is accepted by the court by the confirmation of the sale. After that, though the purchaser, before the deed is made to him, finds out that the title to the land is defective, he is nevertheless bound to receive it and pay the purchase money. In a sale by a trustee, the court does not accept the bid of the purchaser, but it is accepted by the auctioneer when he knocks the land down; and on the making by him of a memorandum of the sale and its terms, signed by the auctioneer, the contract for the sale is as complete as the contract for the sale made by a commissioner is when the court accepts the bid by confirming the sale. After such knocking down of the land by the auctioneer, and the making of such memorandum, the purchaser must accept the deed and pay the purchase money, though he does find the title defective. He must, if he wishes to do so, investigate the title in this case, as in the other, while the contract is incomplete; that is, in the last case, before land is knocked down to him." This view seems to accord with the general tendency of the authorities. Auction sales, except those made under decrees of courts of chancery, are generally held to be within the statute of frauds, requiring a memorandum in writing to make them valid. "It was at one time thought that, by reason of their publicity, sales of land or goods at auction did not come within the statute; but, whatever may formerly have been the rule, it is now well settled that such sales not only come within the letter, but also within the spirit, of the statute. And no exceptions are made in this respect, except in favor of what are strictly judicial sales; that is, sales made under an order or decree of a court of chancery, or subject to its confirmation and control." Wood on Stat. Frauds, § 457. Some of the courts view sales by trustees, administrators, and other persons standing in a representative relation as quasi judicial sales, requiring no memorandum; and Browne on the Statute of Frauds, at section 264, says there are differences of opinion and decision, turning upon the fact of their being regarded, or not, as quasi judicial sales. But the more lengthy discussion of the subject found in Wood on the Statute of Frauds indicates that by the weight of authority such sales are within the statutes. Whether this sale is or is not within it is immaterial, except in so far as it bears upon the nature of the contract; the statute not having been pleaded here, and the plaintiff admitting that a sale was made. Fleming v. Holt, 12 W. Va. 143; Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. 220.

The acceptance of the bid and the making of a memorandum thereof by the trustee, being a complete contract of sale, binding the purchaser to accept the bid and pay the purchase money, must be, in seeking the enforcement of that contract, show that the trustee has proceeded regularly in making the sale? The contract does not confer title upon him. He obtains that by the deed. It confers only the right to call for the legal title; to enforce a specific performance of the contract of sale. If at this juncture the grantor in the deed of trust, or a subsequent deed of trust lienor having an interest in the property—an incumbrance upon the equity of redemption—in a sense standing in the shoes of the grantor, interposes, and denies that the trustee has proceeded regularly, and invokes the aid of a court of equity to restrain the trustee from passing the title to his prejudice, when he is not bound to do so by any valid contract, is the burden of proof upon the purchaser to show that the proceedings of the trustee have been regular, or is it upon the grantor to show that they have not been regular? It is elementary law that he who sets up a contract of sale, and prays specific performance of it, must establish that contract by proof. On the other hand, in the case put, the grantor in a deed of trust files his bill asserting an equity and praying relief. Ordinarily, he who does that must not only allege, but prove, his equity, in order to obtain relief. In the absence of any presumption in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of the trustee, the burden seems to be upon the purchaser; if there is such presumption, then upon the grantor. Whether there is, or not, was not decided in Dryden v. Stephens, nor perhaps in any other case. Nor was the exact question discussed. But Judge Johnson did use the following language, bearing strongly upon it: "What would be required, in a suit promptly brought after the sale, to be proved as to the proper advertisement of the property, we will not decide in this case, although my own opinion is that the execution of the deed to the purchaser by the trustee is prima facie evidence that all the steps necessary for the trustee to take in order to give him the right to make the deed had been taken, and that this presumption would be conclusive, unless rebutted by other facts and circumstances in the case. Why should a cestui que trust in the deed permit his agent to make the sale, and, without showing mala fides on the part of the agent, be permitted to set aside the sale, unless the agent first showed that he had not sold contrary to law?"

As has been seen, the rule announced in Gibson's Heirs v. Jones, 5 Leigh, 370, denying the existence of any presumption in favor of the purchaser on the question of due advertisement of the sale, has been modified by this court. Whether the court would have gone further, had the aid of equity been invoked before the deed was made, and held that in that state of the case the purchaser should have the benefit of a presumption, it is impossible to say. Evidently the court was reluctant to overrule a decision based upon the reasoning of so eminent an authority as Judge Tucker, but it felt itself bound to do so because of the widespread disaster to land titles which would have resulted from adhering to it. However, Judge Johnson does not hesitate to say that the ruling made upon the notice was not necessary to the decision of the case, and that the dictum was wholly unsupported by authority. And he proceeds to show by the citation of numerous cases that the position does not accord with the rule announced by the courts. See pages 15 to 17. The peculiar circumstances of that case warranted the interposition of equity upon grounds other than want of due advertisement. The deed of trust under which sale was made was given by Mrs. Gibson in January, 1811. She died in October, 1811. In June, 1813, part of the land was sold, and the trust creditor bought it. The suit was brought by the heirs of Mrs. Gibson, who alleged that the debt was practically paid off, and claimed the benefit of large credits. The purchase was not made there, as here, by a stranger to the deed of trust, but by the very party at whose instance the sale had been made—the cestui que trust—between whom and the trustees and the heirs there was close relation, and between whom it was competent for a court of equity to do justice without the risk of injury to any third party. As the creditor himself had bought the land, sold by the trustee as his agent, of whose acts and proceedings he might well be supposed to be cognizant, the ruling that the burden was upon him to show that his purchase was regular in all respects may stand upon sound reason; but the reasoning upon which it is based is not necessarily applicable to a case in which the purchaser is a third party, sustaining no relation of confidence or privity toward the trustee or the debtor, but dealing at arm's length with the trustee, and having no notice of irregularity on his part. To hold, therefore, in a case like this, that the burden is upon the grantor to show want of notice, in no way impugns the soundness of the decision in Gibson's Heirs v. Jones.

The view that an innocent purchaser is entitled to the benefit of a presumption in favor of his title, which the grantor must rebut, is supported by Marshall v. Stephens, 8 Humph. 159, 174, 47 Am. Dec. 601, where the court say: "We hold it to be a sound principle, supported by both justice and reason, that when there is a power of appointment, which has been exercised, and there be a legal and an illegal mode of exercising it, and the proof leaves it doubtful which has been used, the legal presumption in favor of innocent purchasers or meritorious claimants is that it has been the legal one." This accords with the general principle of law. A plaintiff in an equity suit must state in his bill grounds for relief, and prove them as stated. One complaining of a decree or a judgment must bear the burden of affirmatively showing error. It may be said that this rests upon the presumption in favor of the regularity of judicial proceedings. So it does, but the rule of presumption does not stop there. Fraud is never presumed, but must always be alleged and proved. On the contrary, absence of fraud is presumed. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1284. There is no presumption of negligence, but there is a presumption, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that a party charged with negligence is free from it, just as there is a presumption in favor of innocence, and of the performance of official duty and the regularity of official acts. The nature of the office of trustee, and the extent of the powers vested in him, confirm this view. He holds the legal title with full power to convey it. "Trustees of real or personal estate may, at law, sell, convey, assign, or incumber the same, as if they were the beneficial owners, and each of several trustees may exercise all his rights of ownership. If the trustees are joint tenants, each may receive the rents, and each may sever the joint tenancy by a conveyance of his share, and each may collect the dividends on stocks; and, on the death of one, the survivor may sell the whole estate. The general power of a trustee to sell and convey the estate is coextensive with his ownership of the legal title, and this general power over the legal title is entirely distinct from the execution of a special power given in respect to the sale of an estate. Though the trustees may thus sell, even in breach of the trust, a conveyance without consideration will not injure the cestui que trust, as the grantee, who is a volunteer, will hold upon the same trusts as the trustee held; and, if the purchaser for a valuable consideration have notice of the trust, he will still hold the estate upon the trust." Perry on Trusts, § 834. "As a general rule, the legal estate in the hands of a trustee has, at common law, precisely the same properties, characteristics, and incidents as if the trustee were the absolute beneficial owner. The legal title vests in him, together with all the appurtenances and all the covenants that run with the land. The trustee may sell and devise it or mortgage it, or it may be taken on execution. It may be forfeited, and it will escheat on failure of heirs, and so it will descend to heirs on the death of the trustee. All these properties and incidents attach to the legal estate at common law, whether in the hands of a trustee or of an absolute owner; but these incidents do not generally interfere with the proper execution of the trust, for all conveyances and all incumbrances made or imposed upon the estate by the trustee for other purposes than those of the trust, or in breach of the trust, are utterly disregarded by a court of equity, whatever may be the effect of such conveyances or incumbrances in a court of common law." Id. § 321. "It is now a universal rule that all those who take under the trustee, except purchasers for a valuable consideration, without notice, take subject to the trust, and they must either execute the trust themselves, or convey the property to new trustees appointed by the court." Id. § 346.

The application of these principles to the facts of the case makes it clear that a contract of sale has been made between the trustee and the purchaser. He has sold and agreed to convey the legal title, over which he had full power. He has power to sell and convey even in violation of the terms of the deed of trust. The purchaser deals with him as the owner of the legal title, competent to convey it. Although he can convey it, and the purchaser may take it from him, it will be subject in the hands of the purchaser to any and all equities which the grantor in the deed of trust may be able to establish against him, even to the extent of showing that the sale was made in a manner not authorized, and is therefore invalid, as a result of which the right to have a reconveyance might be maintained. But these equities against the purchaser and in the property in his hands in no way limit and control the power of sale vested in the trustee. They are separate and distinct matters to be asserted by the grantor against the property in the hands of the purchaser, and he must plead them and prove them in order to obtain relief. Hence, as against a third party—one in no way connected with the deed of trust, except by his act of purchase, and in no way charged with the responsibility for the regularity of the proceedings, nor having power of control over them, nor affected with any notice of irregularities or equities—reason, justice, and authority make it manifest that the complainant must take upon himself the burden of showing wherein the sale is illegal, or an equity against the purchaser arises in his favor. It is the assertion of a cause of action, the whole burden of which is upon the plaintiff.

The allegation of the bill in respect to the insufficiency of the advertisement is that it was not published in the manner prescribed by the deed of trust, that no copy of the notice was served upon the grantor in said deed of trust, and that the notice was not posted at the front door of the courthouse as required by law. The deed of trust provided that "notice of any such sale may be given by advertisement, published thirty days previous thereto in some newspaper printed in the city of Wheeling, W. Va." It was published in the Wheeling Intelligencer, a daily newspaper, once a week for a period covering 30 days, as averred in the answer. In the bill it is charged that it was published in 6 issues, but as to whether there was a publication in each week during the 30 days the bill is silent. This seems to be regarded as unimportant by the counsel for appellant, his contention being that the deed of trust required the notice to be published each day for 30 consecutive days before the sale. The mode of giving notice prescribed in the deed of trust takes the place of that prescribed by the statute, and the inquiry is only whether it was given as required by the deed of trust. The language of a statute somewhat similar to that used in the deed of trust has been construed by this court in Benwood v. Railway Co., 53 W. Va. 465, 44 S. E. 271. Point 2 of the syllabus gives the language construed, as well as the conclusion upon it, as follows: "A statute requiring notice to be 'given by publication for thirty days in some newspaper of general circulation,' published in a county or city, is sufficiently complied with by publication in the successive issues of a weekly newspaper through the period of time named."

the attorney in fact of the American Fire Clay Company to accept service of process or notice, and resided in the county of Hancock, but the notice was not served upon him, nor upon the grantor in the deed of trust, nor upon any agent of the grantor. It is admitted that none of the officers of the company were in the county, and that it was a defunct organization, and that Irwin was its attorney in fact to accept service of process; but the answers deny that he resided in the county, and aver that he was not in the county, but spent the most of his time at Pittsburg, and in going about the country as a traveling salesman. From the testimony of Irwin, whose deposition was taken, it appears that he once resided in Hancock county, and owned property there, but some years before this sale had sold his property and removed to Genoa, Ohio, where he and his wife, for a time, kept house in rented property, and afterwards in property which he purchased, and that his business required his presence in Pittsburg during the greater portion of his time, and at times, for a month or two, his wife would go to Pittsburg, and stay with him, leaving the house shut up, and taking a part of the furniture with her. After moving away, Irwin only came back into the county on occasions of business, or to visit his mother and a sister, who resided in New Cumberland. On the occasion of the sickness and death of his mother early in November, 1898, he was in New Cumberland. He still claimed to be a citizen of that county, and exercised there his right to vote, which had been contested on two occasions.

Service of the notice upon the grantor, his agent, or personal representative is required to be made "if he or they be within the county," not if he or they be domiciled in the county, or reside in the county. But we must adopt some legal standard for determining what this means—what the Legislature intended. To say that it was intended that the trustee is bound to watch for, and avail himself of, a mere casual and temporary presence in the county, whether for an hour or a day, or at night or in the daytime, and, if it turns out that he was in the county when the service should have been made, without the knowledge of the trustee, by reason of which no service was had upon him, the sale shall be void on account of nonservice of the notice, would place a construction upon this language that would make it very inconvenient and difficult to obtain a legal execution of a trust. It would burden it with such inconvenience, risk, and the exercise of extreme diligence that it cannot be supposed that the Legislature intended it. The whole doctrine of personal service for judicial purposes depends upon the residence of a party within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. Although a nonresident, found casually within the jurisdiction, may be served with process, if he be not so found, he is uniformly treated and proceeded against as a nonresident, although his domicile may be within the state. Ordinarily, if he is a resident, the law of process disregards the question whether the place in which he resides is his domicile. The principle of analogy, as well as the supposed intention of the Legislature not to burden the trust with great inconvenience, expense, and trouble, enforces the conclusion that the Legislature meant that the grantor, his agent or personal representative, shall have notice if he resides in the county. This seems to be the position of counsel for the appellees, while that of counsel for the appellant appears to be that there shall be service upon the grantor, his agent or personal representative, if domiciled within the county. The distinction between residence and domicile in the law of process and attachment is very clearly marked by the decisions. "Domicile" is a much broader term than that of "residence." A man may have his domicile in one state, and actually reside in another, or in a foreign country. If he has once had a residence in a particular place and removed to another, but with the intention of returning after a certain time, however long that may be, his domicile is at the former residence and his residence at the place of his habitation. "Residence" and "habitation" are generally regarded as synonymous. "A 'resident' and an 'inhabitant' mean the same thing. A person resident is defined to be one 'dwelling or having his abode in any place'; an inhabitant, 'one that resides in a place.' These terms will therefore be used synonymously as they may occur in the cases cited." Drake on Attach. § 59. The question of domicile is not involved in determining whether a person is a resident of a state or county. Id. § 58. The compatibility of domicile in one state with actual residence in another has been asserted and acted upon in the law of attachment by the courts of New York, New Jersey, Maryland, North Carolina, Mississippi, and Wisconsin. Id. § 65. The same conclusion was reached by this court in White v. Tennant, 31 W. Va. 790, 8 S. E. 596, 18 Am. St. Rep. 896, in determining what laws should control and govern the distribution of the personal estate of one who was domiciled in one state and died in another. The distinction was clearly marked in State, Use of Burt, v. Allen, 48 W. Va. 154, 35 S. E. 990, 50 L. R. A. 284, 86 Am. St. Rep. 29, involving the attachment laws and exemption laws of this state. There Judge Brannon, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Domicile" means more than "residence." It imports residence and fixed intention to remain there. A man may be a resident of a locality without having his domicile there. He can have only one domicile at the same time, though he may have more than one residence." This makes it clear that, whatever may have been the domicile of Irwin at the time of the sale (a matter which need not be and is not now decided), he was clearly not a resident of Hancock county, and failure to serve the notice upon him, even if he be regarded as an agent of the American Fire Clay Company, within the meaning of the statute (another matter which need not be and is not decided here), does not render the sale invalid.

As has been indicated, Haigh, trustee, had sold the property involved in 1896, and Atkinson had purchased it. It further appears that a deed was made to Atkinson. It seems, however, that he paid no part of the purchase money, for the reason that he took the property subject to the debt due the college, and the balance of the purchase money was due to himself. In addition to this, the bill and amended bill alleged that he (Atkinson) had no notice of the sale until about 10 days prior thereto. Although not argued, this presents the question whether he was entitled to notice by personal service—one which has not been decided by this court. The statute limits the requirement of personal service to the grantor, his agent or personal representative. This does not include his assigns or his heirs, unless, by construction, the statute be given effect beyond its letter. Upon a hasty consideration of the question, it would seem to be equitable and just that one who stands in the shoes of the grantor in respect to the property, as purchaser thereof, should have personal notice of the sale. As courts of equity proceed upon considerations of justice and fairness between man and man as a rule, it might be supposed that such courts would so construe the statute. But they do not construe statutes differently from courts of law, and they are equally bound by the stipulations of the parties where the trust is express, and its terms have been reduced to writing. Therefore when one comes into a court of equity asserting a right under an instrument creating the trust, equity can only give him what, by a fair legal construction of the terms of his contract, he is entitled to. He can have no more than the contract calls for. "It must also be observed that, if a trust is declared in writing, courts never permit parol proof of a trust to contradict an intention expressed upon the face of the instrument, for that would be to allow parol evidence to vary, contradict, or annul a written instrument." Perry on Trusts, § 76. That this is the true view appears to have been the opinion of Prof. Minor, who, in the second volume of his Institutes, at page 346, after referring to the jurisdiction in equity occasioned by the death of the debtor, which seems to have been acknowledged in Virginia, says: "Upon this conclusion, it is possible that the terms of the present statute, prescribing the duties of trustees, may exercise some control. * * * And it is the practice for the trustee to proceed to sell without regard to the debtor's death." Our statute is very similar, and where it is a part of the contract, as it is here on the question of notice, the court can award no more under the statute than it gives. The courts of Illinois, North Carolina, Minnesota, and New York, in determining the rights of parties under similar contracts, have confined themselves within the stipulations of the contracts and the terms of the statute. In Illinois and North Carolina, where there seems to be no statute requiring personal notice, it has been held that the mortgagor or grantor in a deed of trust is not entitled to personal notice of the sale unless stipulated for in the instrument. Hoodless v. Reid, 112 Ill. 105; Marston v. Brittenham, 76 Ill. 611; Loan & Trust Co. v. Munson, 60 Ill. 371; Bridgers v. Morris, 90 N. C. 32; Manning v. Elliott Bros., 92 N. C. 48; Carver v. Brady, 104 N. C. 219, 10 S. E. 565. The reasoning of the Illinois Court in Loan & Trust Co. v. Munson is in part as follows: "The debtor himself here prescribed the kind of notice which should be given in case of sale. It was not personal notice, but notice by advertisement in a newspaper. To say that a further personal notice was required by implication would be to annex a condition to the power of sale which the maker of the power did not see fit to provide, and the court would be making a contract for the parties, instead of enforcing the one made by themselves." If it be said that the benefit of the contract made by the grantor, stipulating for personal service to himself, would pass by assignment to his grantee, the reply is that the courts do not so hold. "The words 'personal representatives,' used in the statute relative to the foreclosure of mortgages by advertisement passed May 7, 1884, requiring the notice to be served upon the mortgagor or his personal representatives, means 'executors or administrators,' and not heirs or devisees. Where there is no personal representative to be served with notice, that provision of the statute is inoperative, and the foreclosure will be good if conducted in the mode otherwise prescribed in the statute." Anderson v. Austin, 34 Barb. (N. Y.) 819. To allow a statutory requirement of notice to the grantor to attach to property and pass by assignment as an incident to a conveyance thereof by the grantor would subject the creditor to the burden and expense of notifying every heir in case of the death of the debtor, and every subsequent lienor by a deed of trust as well as purchasers. It must be assumed that, if the Legislature had intended to impose upon the trust-deed creditor all these additional requirements, and expose him to the risks and delays in the enforcement of his claim which inevitably attend them, it would have made the language of the statute broader, so as to expressly include them. As this is the clear and logical result of the application of well-settled principles to the statute, it becomes unnecessary to decide whether the stipulation contained in the deed of trust concerning the notice to be given, and omitting the requirement of personal service, relieves the trustee of the duty of making such service under the statute.

Failure to post the notice at the front door of the courthouse is affirmed by the plaintiff and denied by the defendants in the court below, and there is no evidence to support either side of the issue. The burden being upon the plaintiff, he fails to make out a case in that respect.

The validity of the sale is contested on the further ground that the trustee has not made his report as required by section 3 of chapter 87 of the Code of 1899. As the making of such report is always subsequent to the sale, and relates only to the distribution of the proceeds, failure on the part of the trustee to perform that duty could not be permitted to undo a valid sale.

It remains now to inquire whether the sale ought to be set aside upon the ground of fraud. Under this heading it is urged that there was collusion between the trustee and the purchasers; that the sale was not made for cash as advertised, but on credit, contrary to the terms of sale; and that under the circumstances the sale wrought gross injustice and wanton injury upon the appellant, without any equity demanding it upon the part of the college. The provision of the deed of trust concerning the terms of sale reads as follows: "Any sale of the property made by the trustee by virtue of this deed may be for cash or on credit with good security, or partly for cash and partly on credit, with good security." The trustee was also attorney for the college, and the argument is that by way of favor and partiality toward his client he made the terms of sale cash, failed to give appellant personal notice of the sale, thereby rendering it impossible for him to make such preparation for bidding as he might otherwise have made, entered into a collusive agreement with Porter and Campbell, with the consent of the college, whereby they should purchase the property ostensibly for cash, but really on credit, and thereby oppressed and injured the appellant, in violation of his duty as the agent of both parties. It has been decided that the trustee is the agent of the grantor and creditor, but not that he is the agent of the creditor in the deed of trust executed to him and of other lien creditors, nor of the grantor and purchasers at the sale. This distinction is not regarded as important, but its tendency is toward clearness and accuracy in the disposition of this question. In making the terms cash, the trustee acted within the strict letter of the contract, the grantor having authorized a sale for cash, and in failing to give the appellant personal notice of the sale the trustee violated no duty imposed upon him, as has been demonstrated. Of the alleged agreement and understanding between the trustee and the purchaser, prior to the sale, that they should purchase at the price at which the land was knocked down to them, and have the benefit of time on the purchase money, there is no proof. What is urged as evidence is the language of the trustee in his deposition on cross-examination, where he said: "Immediately after making the sale, I went down to the bank with Judge Campbell, where the arrangement was made. He signed the notes there, and I then went to Mr. Porter's house and got his signature to the notes"—it being pointed out that the word "immediately," by its definition, shows that his going down to the bank with Judge Campbell was in pursuance of some agreement, and none could have been made after the sale and before they went down there, and that, therefore, it must have been made prior to the sale. Even learned men are not supposed to use words in the sense of their exact definitions at all times, and it is a well-known rule of law that the whole of language importing an admission must be taken, read, and considered together. One word or clause cannot be permitted to control other language in conflict with it. Cranmer and Porter both testify that there was no such agreement or arrangement. Cranmer says the time arrangement was suggested after the sale by Campbell because of the prevalence of rumors of litigation, and he, as the attorney of the college, his client, which is entitled to receive all the purchase money, consented to take $5,000 cash, and give time as to the balance. As the charge of collusion is supported by nothing except the alleged admission, supplemented by the fact that time was given, and the whole of the testimony on that question clearly negatives the proposition, there is no admission nor any evidence of the charge. Clearly, there was no fraud on the part of the trustee, and, unless there was such inadequacy of price as calls upon a court of equity to set aside the sale, there is nothing shown which even savors of fraud.

There is some testimony tending to show inadequacy. One man, the president of the defunct company, testifies to $30,000 as the value of the property, but others say that it brought all it was fairly worth. There was competitive bidding, A. F. Wilkins having run it up to $12,900. The value of the property is a question of fact, and has been passed upon by the court below; the issue, as made by the witnesses, being whether the property brought its full value, not the amount of inadequacy. Inadequacy of price must be very great to warrant the court in setting aside a sale. In the absence of evidence tending to impeach the fairness of a sale, "it cannot be set aside for inadequacy of price, unless it be so inadequate as to justify the presumption of fraud and collusion, and, to justify such presumption from this inadequacy alone, it must be so strong and manifest an inadequacy as to shock the conscience and confound the judgment of any man of common sense. Half the estimated value of such property is not such an inadequacy." Bradford v. McConihay, 15 W. Va. 732. A sale under a deed of trust will not be set aside unless for weighty reasons. Corrothers v. Harris, 23 W. Va. 177. Even in the case of judicial sales, where no advance bid has been made, and the objection to confirmation is grounded upon the inadequacy of price, supported only by parol evidence, the proof must be very clear. Connell v. Wilhelm, 36 W. Va. 598, 15 S. E. 245. In another case of judicial sale, where a like objection was made, Judge Brannon, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Affidavits of individual opinion of the worth of the land placed the property higher; but that is only opinion. There was no offer by any one of greater price; no guaranty that on a third sale the land would fetch more." Schmertz v. Hammond, 51 W. Va. 408, 41 S. E. 184. The argument in the brief of counsel for appellant is that this sale ought to be treated as an unconfirmed judicial sale. If that could be conceded, the sale could not be set aside upon the grounds thus far considered, under the authorities cited, as well as many others that might be referred to. It seems that in the amended bill there was a sort of an offer to pay more for the property, but it was not accompanied by any bid, or bond, or guaranty of any kind, and it gave no assurance that, if another sale should be allowed, a larger price would be obtained. Where a judicial sale has been regular, and there is an effort to defeat confirmation on the ground of inadequacy of price, there must be an upset bid, accompanied by security. Kable v. Mitchell, 9 W. Va. 492. Surely, a subsequent lienor or purchaser of property sold under a deed of trust is entitled to no greater equity against a purchaser under a prior deed of trust, at a sale made by the trustee, than a lienor upon or owner of property sold at judicial sale can claim.

As to the alleged credit of $300, the evidence shows that the note was simply held as collateral security for the trust debt, and was not to be credited until paid. It was not paid, there being no pretense that anything was paid on it except $54. This payment is admitted, and no credit is given for it, it seems; but the sale cannot be set aside on that account. The following language of Moncure, P., in Hogan v. Duke, 20 Gr. 244, approved and applied in Sandusky v. Faris, 49 W. Va. 150, 38 S. E. 563, settles this contention: "The bill does not allege any attempt by the plaintiff to have a settlement of any of these matters with Duke, or any refusal of Duke to settle them. On the contrary, it alleges that he promised to credit them, but has failed to do so. Non constat that he was not willing to credit them when the balance due on the bonds was ready to be settled by the debtor, or out of the proceeds of the trust sale of this property." The college people admit the payment of $54, and that it is to be credited on the debt; hence there is no controversy about it, and no reason for any interposition on the part of a court of equity upon that ground. Even if there were a controversy, it is not clear that the sale should be set aside on account of it, for it is not a matter with which the purchaser has anything to do, but is such as may be settled by a court of equity between the parties who are concerned in it, without affecting the sale.

For the reasons herein given, the decree complained of should be affirmed, with costs.

CHAPMAN et al. v. MILL CREEK COAL & COKE CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Nov. 28, 1903.)

DEED—CONSTRUCTION—RESERVATION.

1. C. and H. conveyed to P. 925 acres of land by deed in which there is this language, after the granting clause: "Excepting always that the parties of the first part hereby expressly reserve to themselves, their heirs and assigns, forever, the use and occupancy of any one of the coal banks on said land that they may at any time hereafter, or that either of them or their heirs or assigns may jointly or severally select, together with right of way for ingress and egress to and from same." There are six separate coal veins underlying the land. The heirs of the said grantors instituted their action of ejectment to recover one of said coal veins or seams, designating it, and claiming under said exception or reservation, from the defendants, who claim title to all the coal under the deed to P. Held, that such deed does not reserve the title to said coal, or to any part thereof, and that said reservation or exception will not support an action of ejectment for said coal.

Poffenbarger, J., dissenting.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Action by A. A. Chapman and others against the Mill Creek Coal & Coke Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

C. W. Smith, C. R. McNutt, White & Buchanan, and John Osborne, for plaintiffs in error. A. W. Reynolds and J. S. Clark, for defendants in error.

MILLER, J. By grant bearing date on the 1st day of July, 1851, there was granted by the commonwealth of Virginia to David Hall and Henly Chapman a tract of land containing 1,750 acres, lying in the counties of Mercer and Tazewell, the greater part thereof being in Mercer. The boundaries are set out in the grant. On the 5th day of April, 1858, Hall and wife and Chapman, by their deed, granted to David K. Perdue, for the consideration of $307.75, that part of said tract lying in the county of Mercer, containing about 925 acres, described in the deed by metes and bounds. The deed contains the following exception or reservation: "Excepting always that the parties of the first part hereby expressly reserve to themselves, their heirs and assigns, forever, the use and occupancy of any one of the coal banks on said land that they may at any time hereafter or that either of them or their heirs or assigns may jointly or severally select, together with right of way for ingress and egress to and from same; and the said parties of first part for themselves, their heirs, etc., hereby alien and convey to the said party of the second part all the right, title, and interest which they acquired in and to the said parcel of 925 acres of land by virtue of their grant as aforesaid; and they will warrant and defend the title to the same, with the reservation as aforesaid, against all persons claiming by, through, or under them, and from none else." At the October rules, 1893, A. A. Chapman, Charles T. Painter, S. W. Nowlin, and 65 others filed their declaration in ejectment in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Mercer county against the defendant Mill Creek Coal & Coke Company, a corporation, alleging therein that "on the 1st day of May, 1893, the said plaintiffs were possessed in fee of a certain coal bank or coal seam known as vein or seam number 3, in a certain parcel or tract of land, lying and being mainly in the said county of Mercer and state of West Virginia, containing nine hundred and twenty-five acres, being the same land conveyed by Henly Chapman and David Hall to David K. Perdue by deed dated April 5th in the year 1856." The metes and bounds as in said deed were then set out. Afterwards, on the 24th day of February, 1894, by order of the court, E. W. Clark, H. M. Bell, and Joseph I. Doran, trustees of the Flat Top Coal Land Association, landlords of the defendant, were made defendants with the said Mill Creek Coal & Coke Company. After sundry orders had been made from time to time in the action, the defendants, at the May term, 1902, entered their plea of not guilty, and, issue being joined, a jury was selected and sworn to try the same. At the close of plaintiffs' evidence in chief it was all stricken out by the court on motion of defendants. The plaintiffs then declining to take a nonsuit, the jury, being instructed by the court so to do, found a verdict for the defendants, to which the plaintiffs excepted, and moved the court to set it aside and to grant them a new trial. This motion being also refused by the court, the plaintiffs again excepted, and the court then rendered judgment against them on the verdict. All of the evidence introduced on the trial is certified in a bill of exceptions and is a part of the record. To the judgment aforesaid plaintiffs obtained a writ of error and supersedeas, and say, for assignment of error, that the verdict aforesaid is contrary to the law and the evidence; that it was error to exclude plaintiffs' evidence from the jury and direct the jury to find for defendants; and that the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict and grant plaintiffs a new trial was also error.

Plaintiffs are the descendants and heirs at law of grantors Hall and Chapman, and claim the said coal bank or coal seam by virtue of the reservation in the deed as aforesaid. The defendants claim under said deed, and contend that the reservation therein was and is void for uncertainty, and because it infringes the rule against perpetuities; that the right of selecting a "coal bank," reserved to the grantors in the deed to Perdue, could be exercised by the grantors only, and did not survive them; that the right reserved to select a "coal bank" does not give the right to select a coal vein; that the right reserved as aforesaid is not sufficient to support an action of ejectment; and that, if the said reservation is a vested interest in the land, it has been forfeited to the state for nonentry and nonpayment of taxes thereon according to law.

For the purposes of its consideration, it is immaterial whether that part of the deed of Hall and Chapman to Perdue, upon which plaintiffs predicate their action, is called an exception or reservation. Technically, they are different in meaning, but have often been used as synonymous. "Though apt words of reservation be used, they will be construed as an exception if such was the design of the parties." Klister v. Reeser, 98 Pa. 1, 42 Am. Rep. 608. In order to determine the questions raised, it is necessary, first, to ascertain the meaning of the words employed by the parties to the deed. In doing so we must take the language used most strongly against the grantors. Hammon on Contracts states the following rules for the construction of deeds and other written instruments: "Ambiguous words are to be taken most strongly against the person using them." Section 413, and cases cited. "This rule is applied to exceptions and provisos in deeds. They are taken most favorably to the grantee." Id. note 132. "Conditions, exceptions, reservations, and provisos are to be strictly construed against the person in whose favor they are introduced. Nor will the law permit a thing which is expressly granted, covenanted, or promised to be defeated by subsequent restrictions." Section 411. "Contemporaneous construction of a contract is that drawn from the time when and the circumstances under which the contract originated. It is of great weight in determining the intent of the parties. * * * And the state of the country and of the manners of society at the time the contract was made is also to be regarded in giving it a construction." Section 398. These principles are supported by Hurst v. Hurst, 7 W. Va. 299; Gibney v. Fitzsimmons, 45 W. Va. 342, 32 S. E. 189.

The foregoing rules will now be applied to the deed in question. The word "bank" is defined in standard dictionaries as "the face of a coal vein in process of being mined"; "the surface immediately about the mouth of a mine"; also, "to form, or lie in banks." In geology a thin layer or stratum of rock is called a "seam." The same term is applied to coal. "Vein of coal," "coal bed," and "coal seam" are used as equivalent terms. In 1856, when the deed to Perdue was executed, that section of country in which the land in question lies was almost an uninhabited wilderness. So far as this record discloses, there was but one family living near the land. There were no roads to it. As a witness describes it: "There was nothing but cow paths. There was at that time an opening in the land, from which coal was taken for blacksmithing purposes." Another witness says: "They just cut it out [the coal] with a mattock, or something like that. There was no place in under the ground at all at the time, and I don't suppose that there was anybody in the county that would have gone under the ground ten feet then. They carried the coal away on their shoulders through bushes and brush. There was no use made of coal in that part of the county then except by blacksmiths." He further states "that he never knew anybody at that time to go there [to the place of getting coal] with a horse or wagon; that the coal could not have been taken in that way; that there was a path which crossed the ridge between a quarter and half mile from the coal opening; that it wasn't much more than a path, because there were at that time very few people there to use it [the path], and it was used only for going to mill and such things." It is fair to presume that coal in that section at that time had no commercial value, and that no person then knew the land was underlaid with the deposits of coal which have since been discovered. Certainly the parties to the deed did not expect the mining developments and great increase in the value of coal and coal lands in that section of the state, which have taken place since that time.

It appears that six veins of coal underlie the land in controversy. Since the coal developments in that region, those veins have been numbered, and are known as coal veins Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, respectively; the lowest one being No. 1, the highest No. 6. No. 2 is about 40 feet below No. 3, and is 30 to 36 inches in thickness. No. 1 is 50 to 60 feet below No. 2. No. 6 is from 150 to 175 feet above No. 3, and is between 3 and 4 feet in thickness. The thickness of vein No. 3, the one in controversy, is from 7½ to 8 feet. Of the tract of 1,750 acres Hall and Chapman conveyed 925 and retained 825 acres. They also expressly reserved to themselves, their heirs and assigns, forever, the use and occupancy of any of the coal banks on said land (conveyed) which they might at any time thereafter or that either of them or their heirs or assigns might jointly or severally select, together with the right of way for ingress and egress to and from the bank so selected. The exception for the use and occupancy of the coal bank and for the right of way are in one sentence. "By the term 'right of way' is generally meant a private way, which is an incorporeal hereditament of that class of easements in which a particular person or particular description of persons have an interest and a right, though another person is the owner of the fee of the land in which it is claimed." Angell on Highways (3d Ed.) § 1. According to this author, the exception as to the "right of way" reserves an incorporeal hereditament only, and not the title to any portion of the land. Again, this clause reserves "the right of way for ingress and egress to and from" the coal bank which might be so selected. This language certainly does not confer upon the grantors, or those who claim under them, the right to pass over the tract of land to the several openings of the various mines which might be necessary for the purpose of mining coal vein No. 3. It is shown that it would be impracticable to mine all of the coal in that vein from one opening.

Does this clause in the deed retain in the grantors the title to any coal, and, if so, to how much? If it reserves to the grantors the title to any one of the coal veins, or coal beds on the land, it reserves the title to all. The selection was to be made in the future, and, on this theory, when the selection was made, if ever, the title to the coal veins not selected remained in the grantors, their heirs or assigns, because "no estate of inheritance or freehold, or for a term of more than five years, shall be conveyed unless by deed or will." Code 1899, c. 71, § 1; Code Va. 1860, c. 116, § 1. If, under the deed, the title to the coal passed to Perdue, he or his assigns for the same reason held the title after the selection was made by the heirs of Hall and Chapman. In United States v. Grundy, 3 Cranch, 337, 352, 2 L. Ed. 459, the Court says: "It seems to be of the very nature of a right to elect one of two things; that actual ownership is not acquired in either until it be elected; and, if the penalty of an offense be not the positive forfeiture of a particular thing, but one of two things, at the choice of the person claiming the forfeiture, it would seem to be altering materially the situation in which that person is placed to say that either is vested in him before he makes that choice. If both are vested in him, it is not an election which to take, but which to reject. It is not a forfeiture of one of two things, but a forfeiture of two things, of which one only can be retained." In Sir Rowland Heyward's Case, 2 Coke, 35a, it is held that: "If I have three horses, and I give you one of my horses, in this case, the election ought to be made in the lifetime of the parties, for, inasmuch as one of the horses is given in certainty, the certainty, and thereby the property, begins by election." If we hold that the title to the coal beds or any of them remained in Hall and Chapman, their heirs or assigns, until the reserved right of selection was exercised, it follows that the deed to Perdue was and is, in effect, nugatory, as to the coal underlying the land, because the grantee could not lawfully sell or use it until the reserved interest was definitely ascertained, which might not be done within a hundred years or more. "A deed should be considered as intended to have some effect, and a construction making it operative will be preferred to one rendering it void. Some effect will, if possible, be given to the instrument, for it will not be intended that the parties meant it to be a nullity." Devlin on Deeds, vol. 2, § 850. If grantors reserved the title to the coal, or any part thereof, neither Perdue nor his assigns could maintain an action against a person for the digging or removal thereof from any of the veins until after a selection as aforesaid. The lien of a judgment against Perdue or his heirs or assigns would not have attached to any of the coal. "The lien of a judgment attaches to the precise interest or estate which the judgment debtor has actually and effectively in the land." Black on Judg. § 420; Marshall's Ex'r v. Hall, 42 W. Va. 641, 26 S. E. 300; Cleavenger v. Felton, 46 W. Va. 249, 33 S. E. 117.

Henly Chapman, one of the grantees, died in April, 1864, and David Hall, the other, died in Indiana in 1867. Their heirs and claimants under them, at the time of the trial of the action, resided in Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Missouri, West Virginia, and other sections of the country. The Hall heirs were represented by their agent and attorney in fact, D. H. Torbett, a grandson of David Hall. The grantors in the deed before their deaths, and their heirs, at different times had removed from the section of country in which the land is situated, seemingly leaving no interests behind them. Thirty-seven years had elapsed after the execution of the deed before their action of ejectment was commenced. The marvelous developments of the last 25 years in Mercer and adjoining counties had made the coal underlying that tract of land immensely valuable. Vein No. 3, the most valuable of the six, had been opened, and in 1893 was being mined by persons holding under the title conveyed to Perdue. Plaintiffs then for the first time sought to make their selection under the reservation in the deed, selected No. 3 as the "coal bank" referred to in the deed, and commenced their aforesaid action for its recovery. These are circumstances against the contention of plaintiffs that they have a vested right in the land, the coal in place being a part of the freehold. "Tell me," said Lord Chancellor Sugden, "what you have done under such deed, and I will tell you what the deed means." Caperton's Adm'r v. Caperton's Heirs, 36 W. Va. 486, 15 S. E. 257, and authorities there cited. Plaintiffs' action is brought on the assumption that Hall and Chapman reserved the title to this coal vein, and that the title thereto descended to them. If we adopt this construction of the reservation in the deed, we must say that, instead of a reserved right of selection, the grantors and their heirs had and have the right of rejection of five of the six coal veins. But the language is, "Excepting always that the parties of the first part hereby expressly reserve to themselves their heirs and assigns, forever, the use and occupancy of any one of the coal banks on said land that they may at any time hereafter * * * select," etc. This language imports a future selection, and does not indicate an intention of the grantors to hold the effect and operation of the deed in abeyance. To select is to make choice of that which is most desirable or suitable. Selection does not carry with it the idea of ownership until the selection be made. The customer selects the article desired from the stock of the merchant. The settler selects and takes up a parcel of land from the public domain, under the provisions of the land act.

Plaintiffs cite numerous authorities to support their contention, among which is Mapel v. John, 42 W. Va. 30, 24 S. E. 608, 32 L. R. A. 800, 57 Am. St. Rep. 839. In the opinion, at page 37, 42 W. Va., page 611, 24 S. E., 32 L. R. A. 800, 57 Am. St. Rep. 839, Judge Holt says: "This brings us to the evidence. Joshua M. Ross sold and conveyed to Jesse Everly, by deed dated 16th February, 1860, the land now owned by plaintiff, Mapel. In it he makes this reservation: 'The said Ross excepts the privilege of coal for his part of the farm at the bank now in use.' What Ross did not then sell, which he calls 'his part of the farm,' is the land now owned by defendant, John. As to the nature and extent of defendant's right to mine coal on plaintiff's land, it is enough for our present purpose to say that the privilege to mine coal at the bank then in use was an easement annexed to defendant's land, the dominant tenement, to mine coal at that open mine on plaintiff's land, the servient tenement, which was only a privilege to take coal at a particular place for a particular purpose," etc. We do not think that this case adds any strength to the contention of the plaintiffs.

Testing the language of the reservation in the deed by the rules above laid down, and giving due consideration to the time when and the circumstances under which the deed was executed, our conclusion is that Hall and Chapman did not, in and by said deed, reserve to themselves, their heirs or assigns, the title to the coal, or any part thereof, underlying the said 925-acre tract of land. We are further of opinion that the exception in the deed, if good for any purpose, reserved only the right to take coal for the purposes for which it was then used in that section from any of the coal veins on the said conveyed tract of land to be selected by the persons mentioned in the deed; and that the terms, use, and occupancy of any one of the coal banks on said land must be restricted to the purpose of digging and removal of coal for the purposes aforesaid. It follows, therefore, that the said action of ejectment cannot be successfully maintained.

In Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 770, 771, the court, by Judge Snyder, says: "Accordingly, in order to enable the plaintiff to sustain this action, it is essential that he be clothed with the legal title and the right of possession at the time the action is instituted. The plaintiff must always, in the first instance, make out a legal and possessory title to the premises in controversy, and the defendant's evidence may be confined to the falsifying his adversary's proofs or rebutting the presumptions which may arise from them." See, also, Suttle v. Railroad Co., 76 Va. 284; Hancock v. McAvoy (Pa.) 25 Atl. 47, 18 L. R. A. 781, 31 Am. St. Rep. 774; Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) vol. 10, 482; Wait, Actions & Defenses, vol. 3, p. 10. A plaintiff in ejectment must at the time of instituting his action and at the time of its trial have a legal title to the land he sues for. Am. Dig. (Cent. Ed.) vol. 17, col. 1960. In Pennsylvania, where great latitude obtains, there being no courts of chancery, it has been held that ejectment is almost the only action for trying title to land. "But the action will not lie for a mere privilege or incorporeal hereditament. The general rule is recognized in Pennsylvania, as elsewhere, that ejectment will only lie for things whereof possession may be delivered by the sheriff. The case of common appendant or appurtenant is said to be in some degree an exception; but then the officer, by giving possession of the land, gives possession of the common." Tyler on Eject. & Ad. Enjoy. 59. On page 37 the same author says: "By the common law and the general rule an ejectment will not lie for anything wherever an entry cannot be made, or of which the sheriff cannot deliver possession. It would follow, therefore, by this rule, that ejectment is only maintainable for corporeal hereditaments." "Ejectment will not lie for an incorporeal hereditament." Am. Dig. (Cent. Ed.) vol. 17, col. 1954. The exception in the deed being a privilege only, as the right to take water from a spring, or of watering stock at a stream on the lands of another, is an incorporeal hereditament, for which the action of ejectment will not lie. A decision of the other questions presented is therefore unnecessary.

For the foregoing reasons, there is no error in the judgment complained of. It must be affirmed.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting). Being of the opinion that the exception contained in the deed, though in form a reservation, does not lack that certainty which is necessary to vest a title, and that by its express terms it carries an interest in, and not a mere right to do something upon, the land, I am compelled to dissent from the conclusion to which my associates have come. This is not a case in which a choice to take one of several different things is reserved or granted. It is an express exception, which is practically the same thing as a grant, of an interest in one thing, which is made certain by the description found in the deed. That one thing is the tract of land. The only question left for determination is the extent of the interest excepted, or the particular designation of the part excepted. Nobody could hesitate in saying that it was competent for the grantors to reserve to themselves all the coal in the tract of land granted. Having the power to reserve all, can it be said that they had not the power to reserve part of the same thing? The case of the United States v. Grundy, 3 Cranch, 337, 2 L. Ed. 459, and the hypothetical case put in Sir Rowland Heyward's Case, 2 Coke, 359, illustrate an entirely different proposition from the one involved here. In the former the United States had the right to elect whether it would take a ship itself or the value of that ship in money, to be recovered of the owner. The ship and the money were two separate and distinct entities or things. Until the choice was made, it was left wholly uncertain as to which of those things would be taken. There was uncertainty of the thing in which the interest would be taken. The statute did not provide that the government should have an interest in one certain thing, leaving the extent of that interest to be determined by election, but said that the government should have, by reason of the forfeiture or violation of the statute, an interest in one thing or an interest in another thing, as it might elect, without saying in which thing it should have an interest. There was no uncertainty of any kind whatever. Hence no title could pass or vest until the entity in which it was to vest was indicated and made certain by the election. The instance of giving one of three horses is of the same kind. If the gift had been of a one-fourth or a one-half interest, according to the election of the donee, in that certain white horse called "John," an interest would have passed and vested at once. Nothing would have remained unsettled except the extent of that interest, and the mode of making that certain would have been expressly stated in the declaration of gift. The specific piece of property in which the interest is given is, in such case, designated, pointed out, and made absolutely certain. So, in this case, a tract of land is described by metes and bounds, located and identified to an absolute certainty, and then the deed says one of the coal banks, to be selected by the grantors, is reserved and excepted from the conveyance. That coal bank is a part of the one thing conveyed, and is not a separate and distinct entity. All six of the coal veins, and the strata of stone between them, and the earth on top, and all that lies below constitute the thing identified and passed by that deed, in which an interest is reserved. The only matter left open is the amount of the interest, and the means of ascertaining that are specified in the deed. That is certain which can be made certain. Suppose it had been the conveyance of 100 acres of land, excepting therefrom 1 acre, or 10 acres, to be selected by the grantor. Would that have been void for uncertainty? By no means. "If a man grants twenty acres, parcel of his manor, without any other description of them, yet the grant is not void, for an acre is a thing certain, and the situation may be reduced to a certainty by the election of the grantee." 3 Bac. Abr. 307. "So, if one being seised of a great waste, grants the moiety of a yardland lying in the waste, without ascertaining what part, or the special name of the land, or how bounded, this may be reduced to a certainty by the election of the grantee." Id. "When one and the same thing passeth to the donee or grantee, and the donee or grantee hath election in what manner or degree he will take this, there the interest passeth immediately, and the party, his heirs or executors, may make election when they will." Id. 311. "And it was said if a man gives two acres to another, habendum one acre to him in fee and the other acre to him in tail, and he aliens both, and hath issue, and dies, in this case the issue may bring a formedon in descender for which acre he will, for the election is not determined by his death; for an estate passes presently by the livery, and the issue shall take by descent." Sir Rowland Heyward's Case, 2 Co. 35a, 37a. At the same page Lord Coke says: "When nothing passeth to the feoffee or grantee before the election to have one thing or the other, there the election ought to be made in the life of the parties, and the heir or executor cannot make the election. But when an estate or interest passeth presently to the feoffee, donee, or grantee, there election may be made by them, or by their heirs or executors. When a thing passeth to the donee or grantee, and the donee or grantee hath election in what manner or degree he will take it, there the interest passeth presently, and the party, his heirs or executors, may make election when they will." This principle was applied in Anderson v. Donelson's Ex'rs, 1 Yerg. (Tenn.) 197, under the following conditions: Anderson had covenanted to convey to Donelson 700 acres of land, to be selected in a square or oblong out of any one of the four corners of a large tract. After Donelson's death his executor selected the land, and Anderson refused to convey it. Thereupon an action was brought on the covenants. In deciding the case the judge quoted and applied a part of the language above quoted from Lord Coke, and then said: "It is a simple title bond for 700 acres of land out of a 5,000-acre tract, making Donelson in equity a tenant in common with Anderson in proportion as the 700 acres are to the whole tract; and the option spoken of in the bond refers alone to the mode of partition, which Donelson reserved the right to control to a certain extent." This is not an exceptional case. A great many others so hold in several different states, some of which are cited in support of the following text, found in 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 663: "Where a conveyance is made of a certain number of acres of a tract of land, not described by metes and bounds, the grantee becomes a tenant in common with the grantor or the other owners, where the land is held in common, of the entire property, the extent of his interest being determined by the proportion which the number of acres conveyed bears to the number of acres in the entire tract." These decisions have settled what, in early times, was an open question, namely, whether in such case there was a tenancy in common. "Upon a covenant, in consideration of marriage, to stand seised of so much land as shall be of the yearly value of forty marks, it hath been a question whether they to whom the assurance was made might enter into any part of the land of the value of forty marks, at their election, and hold the same in severalty, or if they should be only tenants in common with the other, and whether they may choose one acre in one place and one acre in another, and so through the whole land, where they please." 3 Bac. Abr. 307, 308. The question was what the relation between the parties should be, but no doubt was expressed that an interest attached and passed by such a covenant, although far more uncertain in its nature than that which is excepted here by the clause in question.

As the relation of co-tenancy in the land is created by this exception, it was in the power of Perdue, the grantee, or any person claiming under him, to compel at any time an election on the part of the grantors or their heirs, just as in any other case. One co-tenant may, by a proceeding for partition, have his interest set apart for his separate use and enjoyment. Before the statute authorizing conveyances of land by deed without livery of seisin, this exception could hardly have been made, and, if it could have been made, it would have failed if the election were not made within the lifetime of the party in whose favor it was made. A man could not make a feoffment to commence after his own death, for estates of freehold could not be made to commence in futuro. 4 Bac. Abr. 203, 204. Neither could a man reserve to himself a life estate. Id. 204. There is another reason why, under a feoffment, it was necessary that the election be made in the lifetime of the feoffee. The delivery of possession of the land was necessary to the completion of the transfer of title. Lands could only pass by livery of seisin, and livery of seisin was delivery of the possession. Anciently this was done without any writing, but later a charter or deed accompanied it as evidence thereof, but the delivery of the possession continued to be the essential part of the transaction. Where the livery was in deed, both parties went upon the land, and when the conveyance was by livery within view or livery in law, title did not vest in the feoffee until he entered upon the land. Until entry the livery operated as a license to take possession for the purpose of completing title, and, if the feoffee died before entering, his heirs could not enter. 4 Bac. Abr. 200, 202. As lands now pass by grant, and estates may be so created to commence in futuro, these old principles do not apply, and election is not necessary to the completion of title. Entry upon the land is no longer required. Therefore Bullock's Case, cited in Sir Rowland Heyward's Case, is not applicable. That was a feoffment of a house and 17 acres of land out of a large tract, and the land was not selected and entered upon by the feoffee in his lifetime.

Nor do I think the exception can be limited to the creation of a mere incorporeal hereditament—the mere right to go upon the land and dig and carry away, in common with the other owners, coal. The exception is of the use and occupation of the coal bank. Occupancy, when applied to real estate, implies an estate in the land. An occupant of land is a tenant or an owner. If he occupies at the will of the owner, he has an estate at will or at sufferance; if for a period of years, an estate for years; if for a lifetime or any greater period, he has an estate of freehold. The mere right to go upon land and do certain acts, such as to take away the wood or coal, is not an estate in the land of any kind or character. Certain grants or reservations in respect to coal have been held by the Pennsylvania courts to create mere incorporeal hereditaments, and not to pass any interest in the land. But in most of these instances the instrument disclosed upon its face the intent to pass nothing more than a mere right to dig and carry away coal; not all the coal, but some of the coal; the grantor reserving the right to dig and carry away from the same seam or mine also. One case may be said to be somewhat similar to this. The instrument conferred the "free right to dig coal at the coal bed under my lot, with the privilege freely to carry the coal from the said lot, as also free ingress and regress to and from said coal bed through my land at all times hereafter, doing as little damage as may be in the uses," etc. Gloninger v. Coal Co., 55 Pa. 9, 93 Am. Dec. 720. That deed expressly gave the right to dig and carry away coal. It did not give in express terms the use and occupation of the coal bank, as the reservation here does. There is no escape from the conclusion that this passes an interest in the coal, except by resorting to construction, so as to narrow these terms and make them mean less than the words used technically and ordinarily mean. Rex v. Inhabitants of Batington, 4 T. R. 178, holds that: "If A., residing on a cottage of his own, grant it by lease and release to B.

in fee, in consideration of £361, with a proviso 'that A. shall live in and occupy the said cottage with the appurtenances as he theretofore had done and then did for life,' B. only takes an estate for life in A." Lord Kenyon said: "If this question had depended on the first words in the proviso, I should have thought that they would have been satisfied by determining that only a liberty to inhabit the cottage was reserved to the father; but the word 'occupy' carries the interest reserved still farther, and shows that the whole estate was intended to be reserved to him." Ashhurst, J., said: "The word 'occupy' in the proviso is extremely material to show that the deed must have this operation; for it is a reservation of the thing itself—of the whole estate." Buller, J., said: "Something more was meant than a bare license to inhabit or live in the house, for the word 'occupy' is added to them." The same force was given to the word "occupy" in Rabbeth v. Squire, 4 De G. & J. 406, where a will gave a joint use and occupation of land. Applying the reasoning found in the above quotations to the language of this exception, it might be said that, if it had stopped with the word "use," a mere privilege would have been imported; but it does not stop there. It gives not only the use of the coal bank, but the occupancy of it, and by giving the occupancy of it it excludes the grantee and those claiming under him, and this necessarily vests an interest in the grantor.

Thus it clearly appears that, unless a different intention on the part of the parties to the deed can be found, the coal bank itself was excepted. Where is this intention to be found? Not in the deed. In order to hold that less than an estate passes under the exception, it must be found that the words "use and occupancy" were used in some sense different from their technical meaning. The only ground offered for this purpose is the fact that at the time of the conveyance the use of coal was limited, and it was not mined extensively, if at all, for commercial purposes, and not mined at all in that section of the country except for blacksmithing purposes, and therefore the exception was only intended to give to the grantors the right to go upon the land and take coal for such purpose. Had Hall and Chapman been blacksmiths, and using a coal bank for that purpose, that fact might have given some color to this contention. But they were not so using it, nor were they blacksmiths. There was an opening on the land, from which coal was taken for blacksmithing purposes, and the inference to be drawn from these circumstances, if any, is that Hall and Chapman were receiving pay for the coal so taken, and thus deriving an income from the land which they desired to continue. Moreover, they were lawyers, and are supposed to have known the legal meaning and force of the terms used in the exception—a circumstance which strongly argues against any intent different than from that imported by the technical meaning of the terms used. I do not see that the purpose for which the coal was then used has any bearing upon the question. If it be true that only such use was made of this mineral at that time, might not the grantors just as well have reserved to themselves the exclusive right of one coal bank for that purpose as for any other purpose? If such ignorance of the use and value of the mineral obtained at that time, may we not well suppose that the parties were wholly ignorant of the extent of that mine, and that the grantors, in order to assure themselves of a sufficient supply, were careful to reserve the whole of it to themselves? The grantee being equally ignorant of its extent and value, may we not say he was perfectly willing to let it be cut out of the conveyance? If they did, the subsequent demand for and value of this great deposit cannot change the original intent. This argument of the limited use of coal and ignorance of its value and quantity is a sort of two-edged sword, and cuts as deeply on the one side as on the other, and it by no means supports the alleged intent different from that imported by the words used in the deed.

Again, it is said we must ascertain the intent by the conduct of the parties under the deed. What conduct? What use of this coal mine have the grantors or their heirs made? What act of theirs can be pointed to as indicating their construction of this language? Does it appear that under it they have confined themselves to the exercise of a mere liberty in taking coal? By no means. It appears that they have done nothing under it. Instead of conduct or acts under it showing intent or construction, want of action appears. How, then, can the rule of conduct be applied? It appears that since the deed was executed some 37 years have elapsed, in all of which there has been absolute silence and inactivity on the part of the grantors and their heirs respecting the reserved coal mine. A good illustration of the construction of a reservation determined by the acts of the parties under a deed is given in Jones on Real Prop. in Conv., at section 523, where he says: "Thus, where there was an exemption and reservation 'of sixty-eight feet of land from the east end of the described premises,' and the grantor retained possession of a lot of that width along the whole east side of the land, putting the purchaser in possession of the remainder, and the parties built a fence along the line thus fixed, and the grantor built a house and barn on the portion held by him, and after many years conveyed the tract as being sixty-eight feet wide, it was held that the acts of the parties established the interpretation that the exception was of a strip sixty-eight feet wide along the east side of the lot, and not merely of sixty-eight square feet, which would be a strip of the width of only six inches." In that case there was action, not want of action; things done, not things omitted; affirmative conduct, not entire want of conduct.

The last contention is that by the use of the words "one of the coal banks" the parties could have meant nothing more than the surface or walls of the coal or opening. It seems to me we are not warranted in assuming or inferring that the grantors, in reserving to themselves and their heirs the exclusive use and occupancy of this coal bank, intended to use it for residence purposes or temporary occupancy when out in pursuit of wild animals, or for any purpose other than the digging down of those walls and making use of the material taken from them. It is pointed out that coal was then used to a very limited extent, even in that wild country; and, as it is impossible to discover any reasonable purpose for which this reservation could have been made except to make use of the coal, in doing which the walls would be pulled down and the surface pushed back from time to time, possibly to the extent of exhausting the whole vein, we ought to say that this was the purpose of the exception.

If the court had adopted this view, the result would have been embarrassing to the company now operating in the vein of coal for the recovery of which this suit was instituted. It would have been the result of their own lack of caution and prudence. They must have known this exception was in the deed under which they claimed, and, as prudent men, it was their duty to acquire that outstanding interest before expending their money in the development of the mine.

STATE v. FAUDRE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 14, 1903.)

INTERSTATE FERRIES—TOLL—AMOUNT.

1. The state of Ohio has right to establish ferries on the Ohio side of the Ohio river, and to fix their charges for ferriage over that river from Ohio to West Virginia.

2. West Virginia cannot punish one who acts under a ferry franchise given by the state of Ohio to operate a ferry from its side of the Ohio river over that river, for charging one coming from Ohio more than is allowed by West Virginia law for ferriage over that river. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Mason County; F. A. Guthrie, Judge.

Bert Faudre was convicted of overcharge on a public ferry, and brings error. Reversed.

H. R. Howard, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the State.

BRANNON, J. Bert Faudre was indicted in the circuit court of Mason county for charging C. E. Winger ten cents for ferriage of himself from Gallipolis, in the state of Ohio, over the Ohio river, to the West Virginia side, contrary to the order of the county court of Mason county fixing five cents as the charge. The case was tried by the court in lieu of a jury, and the court found Faudre guilty, and fined him $10. As I understand the evidence, the defendant was operating the ferry under a ferry franchise conferred by the Virginia Legislature in 1796, and reenacted in 1819. He justified this charge under an ordinance of Gallipolis establishing a ferry "from the end of Court street," in that city, "across the Ohio river to the Virginia shore," and a license from the city to operate the ferry; the ordinance allowing the ten cents charge, he operating under this license also.

The Ohio is a great, navigable river dividing the states of Ohio and West Virginia, a public highway open to all. Unless an exception to the general rule, we must apply the general rule, which is that "a state has the right to grant the exclusive right to ferry from its shores across a navigable river between two states." 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 1091; Cooley, Con. Lim. 731. "In the case of boundary rivers, like the Mississippi, a ferry franchise conferred by a single state is valid without the concurrent sanction either of Congress or of the state upon the opposite side of the river, or the right of landing beyond the limits of the state by which the grant is made." Gould on Waters, § 35; Conway v. Taylor, 1 Black, 603, 17 L. Ed. 191; Gear v. Bullerdick, 34 Ill. 74. To say that a state has not this right to give its people facility of departure would detract from its sovereignty and be of great detriment. A ferry need not own land on both sides. Conway v. Taylor, 1 Black, 603, 17 L. Ed. 191. The point of departure is the seat, the base, the home, of the ferry. Sistersville Ferry Co. v. Russell, 52 W. Va. 356, 43 S. E. 107. "A ferry is in respect of the landing place, and not of the water. The water may be to one; the ferry to another." 13 Viner, Abridg. 208 A; Conway v. Taylor, cited. Thus, as the Ohio ferry had a foothold presumably on the end of Court Street, Gallipolis, it was a lawful ferry. Under this rule no state can prohibit another from granting a ferry right. Under its franchise the boat can depart, and, the stream being a highway, it can navigate its waters, and it can land on the opposite shore, and cannot be prevented by the state on the opposite shore. It cannot land on private property without consent, but it has right to land at a public wharf, paying reasonable wharfage. In carrying persons and property it is engaged in interstate commerce, and its landing could not be prohibited or taxed, though it may be made to pay wharfage. The landing is a necessary part of the act. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 186, 5 Sup. Ct. 826, 29 L. Ed. 158; Cannon v. New Orleans, 20 Wall. 577, 22 L. Ed. 417;

* 1. See Ferries, vol. 23, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 73.

Newport v. Taylor's Ex'rs, 16 B. Mon. 784; Trans. Co. v. City, 107 U. S. 691, 2 Sup. Ct. 732, 27 L. Ed. 584. The right to have a ferry includes the right to land. The right to land is incidental to the right to navigate a public river. It is said that "the grant of a ferry franchise across a river between two states gives only the right to ferry from the shore of the state granting the franchise." 12 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 1092; Weld v. Chapman, 2 Iowa, 524; Gear v. Bullerick, 34 Ill. 74.

But it is said that these principles apply only where the boundary of the opposite states is the middle of the river, giving each state indisputable jurisdiction over the shore and half the river, and that such is not the case with the Ohio river, for the reason that when Virginia granted to the Union the Northwest Territory her grant conveyed the territory "situate, lying and being to the northwest of the river Ohio." Great difference of opinion has been expressed as to whether this reserved to Virginia jurisdiction to low or high water mark on the west side of the Ohio. In State v. Plants, 25 W. Va. 119, 52 Am. Rep. 211, it was held that "the jurisdiction of West Virginia is coextensive with the water while confined within its banks." In Ravenswood v. Flemings, 22 W. Va. 52, 46 Am. Rep. 485, it was held that "the bed, banks, and shores of the Ohio river are held by the state in trust for the public." This would give West Virginia title to the top of the bank on the Ohio side. The first Constitution of this state claims the state's jurisdiction to include "so much of the bed, banks and shores of the Ohio river as heretofore appertained to the state of Virginia"; whilst the second declared without reserve that the state "includes the bed, bank and shores of the Ohio river." But, of course, we have no more than Virginia had. Nor could the Constitution confer greater title than in law existed. In Bridge Co. v. Pt. Pleasant, 32 W. Va. 331, 9 S. E. 231, I expressed the opinion that our territory extended to the low-water mark. I cited Garner's Case, 3 Grat. 655, in support of this statement. In that case fourteen Virginia judges sitting in the general court were greatly divided, and delivered exhaustive opinions, the decision by the majority holding, in effect, that low-water mark was Virginia's western line. The actual decision imports that. So the Supreme Court of the United States has several times held. Handley's Lessees v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. 374, 5 L. Ed. 113, the great Chief Justice Marshall, a Virginian, delivering the opinion. In Indiana v. Kentucky, 136 U. S. 479, 10 Sup. Ct. 1051, 34 L. Ed. 329, and Henderson Bridge Co. v. Henderson City, 173 U. S. 592, 612, 19 Sup. Ct. 553, 43 L. Ed. 823, it was again so held. These cases involved the boundary line of Kentucky; but, as Kentucky was formed from Virginia after the grant of the Northwest Territory, she has the same western boundary, and these decisions apply. Kentucky has uniformly held the low-water mark. McFall v. Commonwealth, 2 Metc. 394, 396. Indiana likewise. Carlisle v. State, 32 Ind. 55. Ohio holds that her territory extends at least to low water, if not to the middle. Booth v. Shepherd, 8 Ohio St. 243.

The chief argument for the line of the top of the bank on the Ohio side is the definition of a river. "A river is a running stream of water pent in on either side by banks, shores or walls." "A fresh-water river, like a tidal river, is composed of the alveus, or bed, and the water, but it has banks instead of shores. The banks are the elevations of land which confine the waters in their natural channel when they rise the highest and do not overflow the banks; and in that condition of the water the banks and the soil which is permanently submerged form the bed of the river." Gould on Waters, §§ 41, 45. For the other side it may be said that to confine Ohio to the top of the bank would deprive her of necessary state powers, such as the erection of wharves and other facilities, as well as police control of her border, and refuse to her necessary state power, and detract from her sovereignty. As will be seen in Handley's Lessees v. Anthony, cited, Chief Justice Marshall was influenced by considerations of great inconvenience to the new states that were to be formed out of this cession by Virginia. Virginia, by act of January 2, 1781 (10 Hen. St. 564), made it a condition of her grant that new states should be formed out of the territory granted, and it cannot be readily supposed that she intended to deprive such new states of the usual powers of states bounding on public rivers, and cramp their faculties by stopping their jurisdiction at the top of the river bank. It does seem to me that as the Constitution of the Union gives to the national Supreme Court jurisdiction in controversies between states, and its decision must be final, the rulings of that court must be accepted as law. That court has exclusive jurisdiction touching boundary between states. Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wall. 39, 20 L. Ed. 67. I shall not pursue this question, as I know that I can shed no more light upon it additional to that reflected by the great arguments in the cases cited. If the low-water line be the line, there can be no question that Ohio has the right to establish ferries on her shore and to fix rates from the Ohio to the West Virginia shore. We do not say that greater charge could or could not be made from the West Virginia shore to the Ohio shore, as it is not involved.

But we are not driven to say, as decision, whether State v. Plants is sound law. We can decide this case on another ground. After Virginia made the deed ceding to the republic the Northwest Territory, Congress passed the celebrated historic ordinance for the government of the territory "northwest of the river Ohio," providing that "the navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other states that may be admitted into the confederacy, without any tax, duty or impost therefor." Virginia, by Act Dec. 30, 1788 (12 Hen. St. 780), referred to this ordinance, and declared that "the aforerecited article of compact between the original states and the people and states in the territory of the Ohio river, be and the same are hereby ratified and confirmed, any thing to the contrary in the deed of cession of the territory by this commonwealth to the United States notwithstanding." If otherwise before, would not this act accord to Ohio full use of the Ohio river in such modes as rivers are commonly used, among them the power to establish and regulate ferries having their seats on the Ohio side? That is not all. In the Virginia act providing for the formation of Kentucky it is declared "that the use and navigation of the river Ohio, so far as the territory of the proposed state, or the territory which shall remain within the limits of this commonwealth, lies thereon, shall be free and common to the citizens of the United States; and the respective jurisdiction of this commonwealth and of the proposed state, on the river as aforesaid, shall be concurrent only with the states which may possess the opposite shores of the said river."

How far does the concurrence of jurisdiction of West Virginia and Ohio go? What is meant by it? It is only necessary and proper in this case to say that it goes far enough to give Ohio power on her shore, whatever the line under the deed, to authorize a ferry and govern it by regulations. This concurrence of rightful jurisdiction over the Ohio would seem to give ferries on the Ohio side right to carry both ways, and charge according to Ohio law. This compact of Virginia, on which Kentucky was admitted by Congress into the Union, has been held to be national law by the Supreme Court. Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How. 519, 14 L. Ed. 249; Henderson Bridge Co. v. Henderson, 173 U. S. 610, 19 Sup. Ct. 533, 43 L. Ed. 823. I find that in Arnold v. Shields, 5 Dana, 22, 30 Am. Dec. 669, and in Newport v. Taylor's Ex'rs, 16 B. Mon. 787, it is said of this compact: "Jurisdiction unqualified being, as it is, the sovereign authority to make, decide on, and execute laws, a concurrence of jurisdiction must entitle Indiana to as much power, legislative, judicial, and executive, as that of Kentucky over so much of the Ohio river as flows between them; and consequently neither of them can, consistently with the compact, exercise any authority over their common river, so as to destroy, impair, or obstruct the concurrent rights of the other."

The word "jurisdiction," as here used, must be wide. Why should it be confined to any one of the three agencies of jurisdiction, legislative, executive, or judicial? In J. S. Keator L. Co. v. St. Croix Boom Co., 72 Wis. 62, 38 N. W. 529, 7 Am. St. Rep. 837, this "concurrent jurisdiction" under said congressional provision is discussed, and it is given broad construction, in holding that one state may under it allow a boom hindering navigation on the other side. It may be doubted whether that is such an exercise of power as is lawful, because permanently affecting the right of the other state. "The state of Indiana possesses concurrent jurisdiction with the state of Kentucky for the enforcement of civil and criminal law on the Ohio river, where the two states possess the opposite shores." Sherlock v. Alling, 44 Ind. 184. The court said Indiana's legislation covered the river. It is only necessary for us to say now that Ohio had power to authorize a ferry and fix a charge for a person coming from its shore. The dividing line is one thing; concurrent jurisdiction is another thing. Kentucky, though having the same line as West Virginia, has always conceded to states on the Ohio opposite the right to establish and regulate ferries, and has held that her laws do not apply to them. Newport v. Taylor, 16 B. Mon. 699; Reeves v. Little, 7 Bush, 469. See Gear v. Bullerdick, 34 Ill. 74. How can our law govern a ferry created by Ohio?

After writing to this point, pursuing the matter of concurrent jurisdiction accorded states on the west of the Ohio, by Virginia, I find that Congress, in admitting Illinois, provided that its western line should be the middle of the Mississippi river, and that "said state shall have concurrent jurisdiction * * * on the Mississippi river with any state or states to be formed west thereof." In Wiggins' Ferry Co. v. Reddig, 24 Ill. App. 260, it was held that "neither Illinois nor Missouri can exercise exclusive jurisdiction over any part of the Mississippi, nor is either confined in the exercise of its own jurisdiction to the middle thereof. The two states exercise concurrent jurisdiction on the river for all judicial purposes." In matters to which this concurrence applies, the state which first assumes, retains jurisdiction of a matter to the exclusion of the other. In State v. Mullen, 35 Iowa, 199, the court interpreted this concurrence to give Iowa power to try a crime done on a boat near the Illinois shore. But the same court in Buck v. Ellenbolt, 51 N. W. 22, 15 L. R. A. 187, denied power in the state to abate a nuisance on an island east of the middle line, saying it was not on the river. But it said in all matters touching commerce on the river the state had concurrent jurisdiction over the whole river. As shown above, a ferryboat is an instrument of commerce and interstate commerce. Where two states bound on a river there is concurrence over the whole stream without compact. Aitcheson v. Endless, etc. (D. C.) 40 Fed. 253; 16 Am. & Eng.

Ency. L. (1st Ed.) 258. By reason of this concurrent jurisdiction, regardless of the line, the decision that Plants was guilty in State v. Plants, cited, was right, as he sold liquor on a boat lying in the water of the Ohio.

It is immaterial that the charge was collected from Winger after leaving the Ohio side.

The fact that the Virginia franchise authorized ferriage both ways would not derogate from the right of Ohio to establish a ferry.

If it would change the result that the defendant was acting under the Virginia franchise before he got the Ohio license, it does not appear which he accepted first.

After further examination of the question involved in this case, I find it settled by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, as also by the Kentucky Supreme Court, in Conway v. Taylor, 1 Black, 603, 17 L. Ed. 191. A Kentucky ferry sought an injunction against an Ohio ferry to prevent its ferriage both ways over the Ohio river, claiming exclusive right to do so under the Kentucky ferry grant. The lower state court awarded a total injunction, thus forbidding the Ohio ferry from ferrying either from Kentucky to Ohio or from Ohio to Kentucky. The Kentucky Supreme Court reversed this decree, and modified the decree of the lower court by limiting the injunction so as to prevent the Ohio ferry only from ferrying from Kentucky to Ohio. It thus recognized the full right of the Ohio ferry to ferry from Ohio to Kentucky. It conceded the right to ferry if "authorized to transport from the Ohio shore from a ferry established on that side under the laws of that state," but held that the Kentucky grant gave exclusive right to ferry from the Kentucky shore. See page 628. The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed this decision, conceding as beyond dispute the right of Ohio to establish a ferry upon its soil, saying that "the concurrent action of the two states is not necessary to the grant of a ferry franchise on a river that divides them. A ferry is in respect of the landing, not the water. The water may be to one; the ferry to another." Here the water is a public navigable way, and who disputes Ohio's right to the bank of the river? Owning the bank, she may attach a ferry to it. The federal Supreme Court further said, in speaking of the Kentucky law and decision: "The franchise is confined to the transit from the shore of the state. The same rights which she claims for herself she concedes to others. She has thrown no obstacles in the way of the transit from the states lying upon the other side of the Ohio and Mississippi. She has left that to be wholly regulated by their ferry laws. We have heard of no hostile legislation and of no complaints by any of those states. It was shown in argument at bar that similar laws exist in most, if not all, the states bordering upon those streams. They exist in other states of the Union bounded by navigable waters." In this extract, and in the whole opinion, the Supreme Court concedes and recognizes the right of Ohio to establish and regulate ferries on its bank of the Ohio. The Kentucky court, though it had statutes prohibiting apparently any ferriage from the Ohio shore except under a Kentucky franchise, refused to apply those acts to an Ohio ferry, and so did the national Supreme Court. How could it be otherwise considered alone under the compact made by Virginia upon the admission of Kentucky into the Union? 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 59. That compact makes the Ohio a public highway, and gives concurrent jurisdiction over it to all states bordering on it, and deprived Virginia of exclusive jurisdiction over it. Wheeling Bridge Case, 13 How. 518, 14 L. Ed. 249. Yet in this case Faudre was fined for charging a passenger going from Ohio to West Virginia, not from West Virginia to Ohio.

The decisions cited above were based on the compact between Virginia and Kentucky, but when we consider the later Virginia act (Code 1849, c. 1, § 2) it is still plainer. Virginia thereby again ratified that compact by asserting jurisdiction for herself, "subject to the provisions contained in the articles of compact between Virginia and Kentucky hereinafter mentioned." See section 6. Our Code claims for this state jurisdiction over the Ohio "where there is no statute or compact to the contrary." Chapter 1, § 2, Code 1899. This recognizes the concurrent jurisdiction conceded by that compact. Under such concurrent jurisdiction granted by Virginia, it would seem to me that Ohio could grant a ferry valid to carry from both sides of the Ohio; but that is only a suggestion of my own, and not involved in the case. It has been remarked that this doctrine would enable Ohio to ruin every West Virginia ferry. What of it? We cannot help it. It is the result of lawful competition in business under authority of law. It would redound to the public interest in cheapness of ferriage. Transp. Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 50 W. Va. 611, 40 S. E. 591, 56 L. R. A. 804, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895. In Cross v. Hopkins, 6 W. Va. 323, the validity of a ferry grant by Ohio is recognized, though the subject is not discussed. "And in case of boundary rivers like the Mississippi a ferry granted by a single state is valid without the sanction of Congress or the state which bounds upon the opposite side of the river, or the right of landing beyond the limit of the state by which the grant is made." Gould on Waters, § 35. I think the case of Memphis v. Overton, 3 Yerg. 387, sustains the foregoing view. See City of Newport v. Taylor's Ex'rs, 16 B. Mon. 784, 787. In McFall v. Com., 2 Metc. (Ky.) 394, a man was fined for celebrating marriage on a boat on the Ohio; but the court conceded that if Ohio had passed a law to authorize the minister to marry, and had thus exercised concurrent jurisdiction with Kentucky, there could be no conviction. Under these principles West Virginia ferry rates apply only to West Virginia ferry franchises, and Faudre was not subject to them.

Having taken up this case again, I have just noticed that in Garner's Case, 3 Grat. 655, Judge Johnson said: "I conclude, therefore, that Virginia has exclusive jurisdiction to low-water mark on this side of the river, and Ohio has exclusive jurisdiction on the other, while over the permanent river they both possess concurrent jurisdiction; the ultimate property in the whole river to low-water mark on the Ohio side remaining in Virginia." Here is properly conceded concurrent jurisdiction. The soil on which the river runs is West Virginia soil to low-water mark on the Ohio side, but the water flowing over it is subject to concurrent jurisdiction of both states for certain purposes. It is this concurrent jurisdiction that rules this case. Above I have stated what it means. I add other authorities. Concurrent is "running together; having the same authority. Thus, we say such and such courts have concurrent jurisdictions; that is, each has the same jurisdiction." Bouv. Law Dic. "By conferring 'concurrent jurisdiction' Congress intended to declare that transactions occurring anywhere on that river between the two states might lawfully be dealt with by the courts of either according to its laws. Where a court of one state assumed jurisdiction in a particular case it would be exclusive until relinquished." Sanders v. New Orleans & St. Louis Anchor Line, 97 Mo. 26, 10 S. W. 595, 8 L. R. A. 390. See State v. George, 60 Minn. 505, 63 N. W. 100; Opsahl v. Judd, 30 Minn. 129, 14 N. W. 575; Memphis v. Pikey, 142 Ind. 304, 40 N. E. 527; Welsh v. State, 126 Ind. 71, 25 N. E. 883, 9 L. R. A. 664; Meyler v. Wedding (Ky.) 60 S. W. 20. Rorer on Interstate Law, 337, lays down correct law: "The existence of concurrent jurisdiction in two states over a river that is a boundary between them vests in each of such states, and its courts, except as to things permanent, and except as to maritime and commercial matters cognizable by the national government and its courts, jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, from shore to shore, of all matters of rightful state cognizance occurring upon such river in all parts thereof where it forms such common boundary." Observe that it says that this concurrent jurisdiction applies to "all matters of rightful state cognizance occurring upon such river in all parts thereof."

Now, is not the establishment and regulation of a ferry a matter of rightful state cognizance? Indeed, is it not a right of navigation? Can you deny that to a state on the Ohio river? Is it not a means of commerce on the water of the river? Can you deny the right of commerce? Observe that there is a difference between the soil or ground over which the Ohio runs, and its flowing water. The soil and things permanent in or attached to it—as a bridge, for instance—are not subject to Ohio jurisdiction; but a boat used in ferriage is not such, a thing floating on the water. Many cases draw this distinction, holding that, where there is concurrent jurisdiction in two states upon a river, a state has no power over soil or things fixed in it beyond its line, but as to things not such, but transitory, floating upon it, both have common concurrent powers. The late well-considered case of Roberts v. Fullerton, 93 N. W. 1111, in the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, shows this distinction. There it is held that, as to soil and things attached, the concurrent jurisdiction does not extend, but, as to things having relation to the water, things transitory or floating upon it, it does fully extend. Mississippi v. Ward, 2 Black, 485, 17 L. Ed. 311. Judge Talliaferro, in Garner's Case, 3 Grat. 655, said it refers "only to things afloat." Surely, both states may establish and regulate ferries over the Ohio.

For these reasons we set aside and reverse the finding and judgment of the circuit court, and find the defendant not guilty, and that he be discharged from the indictment and go thereof without day.

NOTE BY BRANNON, J. I have not said that Ohio could establish a ferry on the West Virginia shore, but I think an Ohio ferry could carry back persons to Ohio.

POFFENBARGER, J. (concurring). I do not wish to be understood as agreeing to all that is said in the opinion on the subject of concurrent jurisdiction and the character of the ferry franchise. The exercise of a ferry franchise is clearly not a mere incident to the right of navigation. All citizens may use the navigable waters of this country without a license or permit of any kind from any of the states, and are only subject, in that respect, to such regulations as are imposed by the acts of Congress. The right to operate a ferry is an entirely different matter. The right of navigation is exercised in the operation of a ferry, but it confers no right to operate it. That right must be acquired by legislative grant. Conway v. Taylor, 1 Black, 603, 17 L. Ed. 191; 2 Wash. Real Prop. (6th Ed.) § 1215; Huzzey v. Field, 2 C. M. & R. 431; Mayor, etc., v. Starin, 106 N. Y. 1, 12 N. E. 631; Newton v. Cubitt, 12 C. B. 31. A ferry right is separate and distinct from, and subordinate to, the right of navigation. Tied. Lim. Police Powers, 621; Huzzey v. Field, 2 C. M. & R. 431; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 441; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1089.

Washburn on Real Property says: "Ferries—that is, rights of carrying passengers across streams, or bodies of water, or arms of the sea, from one point to another, for a compensation paid by the way of a toll—are, by common law, deemed to be franchises, and could not, in England, be set up without the king's license, and in this country without a grant of the Legislature as representing the sovereign power, and do not belong to the riparian proprietors of the soil." Conway v. Taylor, cited, expressly holds that "the authority to establish and regulate ferries is not included in the power of the federal government to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes."

I find no authority which, in my opinion, gives a shadow of countenance to the proposition that a state bordering upon a navigable river, and having concurrent jurisdiction with another state bordering upon the opposite side of such river, may establish a ferry from its own shore across the river and also from the shore of such other state across the river. None of the cases referred to in the opinion stand upon such a state of facts. No such claim was made or upheld in any of them. The nature of a ferry franchise, and the obligations imposed upon the state in the granting of it and upon the licensee in accepting it, stand opposed to such an idea. A ferry franchise is a valuable right. It is property created by law, by the sovereign power of the state. Patrick v. Ruffner, 2 Rob. (Va.) 222, 40 Am. Dec. 740; Huzzey v. Field, 2 C. M. & R. 431, 440; Reg. v. Railway Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. 422; Mayor, etc., v. Starin, 106 N. Y. 1, 12 N. E. 631; Conway v. Taylor, 1 Black, 603, 17 L. Ed. 191.

As said in the opinion of Judge BRANNON, a ferry "is in respect to the landing place, and not of the water." Ohio certainly has no right to the West Virginia shores. All that can possibly be conceded to her is jurisdiction of the shore on her own side of the Ohio river.

As against all except the sovereign granting a ferry franchise, it is exclusive, and shuts out all other persons from the exercise of the right conferred. Concurrent jurisdiction for the establishment of ferries from both sides of the river by each state at the same place is contradictory. Neither state could protect and uphold the right granted by it by controlling the rates, and the result might be a service wholly inadequate to, and unsuitable for, the accommodation of the public. Such a construction would give conflict of jurisdiction rather than concurrence. A safe rule for arriving at a conclusion is the conduct of the states and the construction adopted by them. So far as I am able to find, no state has ever attempted to do such a thing. West Virginia and Kentucky content themselves with granting franchises from their own shores to the opposite shore, and Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois with granting franchises from their shores to the opposite shores only. The only real and substantial concurrence in respect to the granting of ferry franchises is to be attained by limiting the power of each state to the granting of such franchises from its own shore to the opposite shore. That gives each state power over the river in that respect. Concurrence is thereby effectuated. The nature of this exercise of the sovereign power is such that, if it be carried further, there is direct and useless conflict between the two states, which it cannot be supposed was ever intended.

Another view which supports this proposition is that the granting of a franchise does not carry with it a right of landing. 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1097; Burrows v. Gallup, 32 Conn. 499, 87 Am. Dec. 186; Walker v. Armstrong, 2 Kan. 198; Prosser v. Wapello, 18 Iowa, 327; Gant v. Drew, 1 Or. 35. Some decisions are to the contrary, but they are against the weight of authority. 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1097.

In Conway v. Taylor, an effort was made by persons under an invalid grant of a ferry franchise from the city of Newport, and a license granted by the state of Ohio, to obtain the right to ferry from the Kentucky side, to the detriment of another person holding a valid Kentucky franchise. It does not appear from the report of the case whether the Ohio license purported to give such right to ferry from the Kentucky shore, but the decree of the Kentucky court, which the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed, inhibited the parties claiming under the invalid Kentucky franchise and the Ohio franchise from ferrying from the Kentucky shore.

My concurrence goes only to the extent of conceding the validity of the ferry franchise from the Ohio side to the West Virginia side granted by the city of Gallipolis, and the right to the holder of that franchise to charge the rate of ferriage fixed by the Ohio authorities, and his innocence of any violation of the West Virginia ferry law in so doing.

DENT, J. (concurring). While I concur in the conclusion, there are some things in the opinion of Judge BRANNON that I do not assent to without reservation. This case depends on the ownership of the northwestern bank or shore of the Ohio river. If it belongs to West Virginia, Ohio has no control over the same, and no right to establish ferries therefrom. The Constitution of this state (art. 2, § 1) claims it to be a part of this state, and it has been so held in the case of Ravenswood v. Flemings, 22 W. Va. 52, 46 Am. Rep. 485. The Constitution also provides in article 1, § 1, that "the Constitution of the United States and the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land." This necessarily includes the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. That court has held that exclusive jurisdiction to determine the boundary between states rests with it. Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wall. 39, 20 L. Ed. 67. It has already determined the boundary between this state and the Northwestern Territory ceded to the United States by the state of Virginia, including the state of Ohio, to be low-water mark on the Ohio side. Handly's Lessees v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. 374.

5 L. Ed. 113; Indiana v. Kentucky, 186 U. S. 479, 10 Sup. Ct. 1051, 34 L. Ed. 329; Bridge Co. v. Henderson City, 173 U. S. 592, 19 Sup. Ct. 553, 43 L. Ed. 823. This should settle this question and put it forever at rest unless the Supreme Court of the United States should be led to change its position, which is not at all likely, for the very reason that it is the only truly equitable conclusion under the circumstances that the court could justly reach in the interest of the general public good. This gives this state the land to low-water mark on the Ohio side and Ohio the land between high and low water mark on the same side, which necessarily includes the shore. The shores and bed of the river are thus held respectively by the two states in trust for the public good, and they cannot become the subject of private ownership. Ohio then has control of its shore, with the exclusive sovereign right to establish ferries therefrom to the opposite shore, while West Virginia has the same exclusive right to establish ferries from its shore. To make a complete ferry from shore to shore, both going and coming, requires the consent of both states. The navigable waters that run between the shores is under the concurrent jurisdiction of both states for the purposes of navigation, although from low-water mark on the Ohio side to the West Virginia shore they are within the state of West Virginia. Conway v. Taylor, 1 Black, 603, 17 L. Ed. 191; section 15, c. 44, Code 1899.

In the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Constitution of this state, and the holding of this court in the case of Ravenswood v. Flemings, 22 W. Va. 52, 46 Am. Rep. 485, are wrong in so far as the Ohio shore and banks of the Ohio river are concerned, for, when Virginia ceded to the United States all the territory northwest of the Ohio river, the word "river" meant the line of the waters of the river at low-water mark. This is a question which in my opinion has been and should remain settled. Garner's Case, 3 Grat. 655; Code Va. 1860, c. 1, § 2. The great states of Ohio and West Virginia by mutual compact should fix this line by permanent monuments, so as not to permit it to be subject to the changes of the bed and shores of the river caused by natural and artificial fluctuations. Wisdom would dictate such a course.

PENCE v. BRYANT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1903.)

PUBLIC STREET—OBSTRUCTION—PUBLIC NUISANCE—INJUNCTION—PARTIES—VACATING—DEDICATION—RETRACTION—PRIVATE BENEFIT—VALIDITY—REDUCTION OF WIDTH.

1. Obstruction of a public street by an individual is a public nuisance and an indictable offense, and an injunction may be maintained to stop or abate it, not only by the county or municipality, but by an individual whose lot abuts on the street, and is materially injured by such obstruction.

2. One owning a lot abutting on a street may maintain an injunction against a person obstructing it by the erection of a permanent building upon it, if it injures the lot.

3. By section 28, c. 47, Code 1899, a town council may vacate a street, in whole or in part, for public welfare, but not that the ground may go to private use.

4. When land has been dedicated for a public street, and it has been accepted by long use by the general public as a street, so that retraction would be hurtful to the public, the dedication cannot be retracted, though no municipal order or action has accepted the dedication, and it is a valid street as between the dedicator and his alienees and the public. Without such corporate acceptance the town would not be chargeable with the street.

5. Can the owner of a lot upon a street, damaged in access by reason of the vacation of the street, recover damage from the town? Is such access a property right adhering to the lot, so that such vacation cannot be made without compensation?

6. The statute giving the town council power to vacate streets does not give it power to vacate a street or a part with sole intent and purpose for the benefit of a private person, or to free his land from public easement, but only for public ends and reasons. An ordinance of vacation made, not for public benefit or purpose, but only for the benefit of a private individual, is void.

7. Whether the motives of a town council in vacating a street are proper cannot be judicially inquired into, but the aim and purpose of the vacation, and the end accomplished, may be considered in passing on its validity. If the purpose effected by it is within the power of the council, its act will be valid; otherwise not.

8. An ordinance of a town council reducing the width of a street from 40 to 15 feet simply, not specifying what part of the street is to remain such, is void for uncertainty.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Bill by Jennie K. Pence against R. G. Bryant and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. O. & B. McLaugherty and Mr. Williams, for appellant. A. W. Reynolds, J. S. Clark, and J. M. McGrath, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. Jennie K. Pence is the owner of a lot lying between Main and North River streets, in the town of Bramwell, Mercer county. It fronts on both streets. Along its side, between it and the depot lot owned by the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, is a space of ground about 41 feet wide, and extending 125 feet between those streets. R. G. Bryant and W. W. Hamilton purchased part of this parcel of land, and upon it were excavating for the erection of a building, its wall to be 15 feet distant, but leaving along her lot a street or alley 15 feet wide between Main and North River streets. Jennie Pence claims that the entire space was years ago dedicated by the Bluestone Coal Company as a public street, and has been recognized by the town and used as such. The council of Bramwell, 22d January, 1902, adopted the following ordinance: "It appearing that the plat of the town of Bramwell, which is of record in the clerk's office of the county court of Mercer county, does not show the width of the street adjoining lot No. 1 in said town, and extending from Main street to North River street, and on the request of the Pocahontas Coal & Coke Company, who own the land lying between said street and the station grounds of the Norfolk & Western Railway, that council determine on the width of the street, it was, on motion, unanimously resolved, that the width of the street be fixed at fifteen feet, and hereafter to be known as Pence street, and to extend from Main street to North River street." When Bryant and Hamilton were engaged in the work of erecting their building, Jennie Pence obtained an injunction against their further work, but on hearing it was dissolved, and the court later refused to reinstate it, and she appeals.

For the defense it is claimed that equity has no jurisdiction, as title is in controversy, and the right in contest must be first adjudicated at law before an injunction can be allowed, and Watson v. Ferrell, 34 W. Va. 406, 12 S. E. 724, and Becker v. McGraw, 48 W. Va. 539, 37 S. E. 532, are cited to support this position. These cases have no application. This is no controversy as to title to land. The plaintiff claims no ownership in the ground. She claims that a public highway affording access to her property is being permanently taken from the public, and passage over it forever obstructed, to the special and lasting detriment of her property. If this is true, a public nuisance is being maintained; for from the earliest period the common law has branded the closing or obstruction of a highway as a public nuisance indictable as a public offense, and our Code 1899, c. 43, § 45, makes it an indictable offense. 4 Bl. Com. 167. That injunction lies in the first instance, without first having recourse to a law tribunal, to prevent a public nuisance in the start, to prevent its maintenance, and to abate it, is shown by abundant authority, and this includes obstruction of a highway. Moundsville v. Ohio R. Co., 37 W. Va. 92, 16 S. E. 514, 20 L. R. A. 161. Authorities collated in Town of Weston v. Ralston, 48 W. Va. 194, 36 S. E. 456. See Columbian Club v. State, in volume 2, p. 340, of that late valuable work, Amer. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 340, and note, page 352; Huron Bank (S. D.) 66 N. W. 815, 59 Am. St. Rep. 769.

But though there is jurisdiction, there is a question, not of jurisdiction exactly, but whether the plaintiff has such interest as will enable her to invoke that jurisdiction. The nuisance is a public one. Beyond question the town could invoke such jurisdiction, but can she as an individual? The general rule is that an individual cannot enjoin a public nuisance, but, if it peculiarly affect him by material and substantial damage to the use and value of his estate, he can have the benefit of an injunction. Talbott v. King, 32 W. Va. 6, 9 S. E. 48; 2 Amer. & Eng. Dec. in Equity, 355. I conceive that I need not elaborate to show that when one is unlawfully building a house in a public street which gives access to a hotel, though it be not the only access, narrowing it from a street 41 feet wide to an alley of 15 feet running along the length of the hotel, an entrance being on that street, peculiarly affects the hotel in use and value as a great damage to it. As an abutter he has a peculiar interest; he is an adjoining owner, and has peculiar interest in the street. 2 Smith, Munic. Corp. § 1214; Elliott on Streets, §§ 709, 876; 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 224.

Counsel have discussed the question whether the space of 41 feet was dedicated to public use and accepted as a dedication, and whether its use as a street made it such. Then we meet with the town ordinance above given. It fixed the width of the street, if it never had been fixed; and, if it had been a street 41 feet wide, that ordinance operated as a vacation in part, if valid. Our statute gives a town council wide power to "vacate, close, open, alter," etc., "roads, streets, alleys." Code 1899, c. 47, § 28. This subject is treated in that latest and elaborate work on Municipal Corporations by Smith (volume 2, § 1283). It says: "Where the power to vacate a street is vested in the municipality, the exercise of that power is discretionary." "A part vacation, leaving access to the property one way the same as before, does not entitle the owner to damages." "In the absence of fraud, courts will not review the action of a city council in vacating a street, and the general rule is that the determination of a proper board as to the opening or closing of a street is not the subject of review by the courts. The right to vacate includes the right to vacate a part of the street as well as the whole." Elliott on Streets, § 879, states the same law. In section 451 we read: "Power to regulate and improve streets and sidewalks includes the power to determine their width." Our act gives all these powers. "A statute authorizing the vacation of a highway will, it seems, authorize the vacation of a part thereof." 15 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 397.

The appellee says that the street claimed by Jennie Pence to be a street is not a street, because never dedicated or recognized by the corporate authority of Bramwell by council action, since there is no evidence of acceptance of the dedication, and before acceptance it may be withdrawn, as may be said to have been done by the sale of a part of the street to the defendants. I think the lawbooks will sustain the position that for some purposes such municipal acceptance is necessary, for others not. If it is sought to charge the town with neglect to repair, it is necessary; but when the contest is, as in this case, between dedicator or his alienees and a private individual or the public, it is not indispensable. Hast v. Railroad Co., 52 W. Va. 396, 44 S. E. 155. "While acceptance by formal adoption by public authorities or by public user is necessary to impose on the public the duty to keep in repair a dedicated highway or street, still that is not necessary to the consummation of the dedication so as to cut off the owner from the power of retraction, or to subject the dedication to the public use wherever, in the estimation of such authorities, the wants or convenience of the public require it for the purpose for which it was originally given." Board v. Seal (Miss.) 5 South. 622, 3 L. R. A. 659, 14 Am. St. Rep. 545; Moose v. Carson (N. C.) 10 S. E. 689, 7 L. R. A. 548, 17 Am. St. Rep. 681; 2 Smith, Munic. Corp. § 1281; 2 Dillon, Munic. Corp. § 642; 2 Greenleaf, Ev. § 662; Elliott, Roads and Streets, §§ 150, 154; City of Winchester v. Carroll, 99 Va. 727, 40 S. E. 37. The owner of the land where now is the town laid it off into squares, lots, and streets, and made a plat. That plat shows North River street and Main street. Between these streets we find squares 1 and 3; on the south side of Main street we find squares 2 and 4. Each of these squares is laid off into lots by number. In square 1 we find lot 1, between those streets, and along its side an open area, not marked as a street, between lot 1 and the right of way of the railroad. It looks like the company owning the land designed letting that whole area remain open for ready access to what was designed to be the station, and where it now is. While such was the state of things, the Bluestone Coal Company by deed, 26th February, 1885, conveyed to William Berry lot 1 in square No. 1, now owned by Jennie Pence. This deed makes the lot begin "at the southwest corner of square No. 1," and runs thence to lot No. 3, and thence 125 feet to North River street, and with it 40 feet to the "N. W. corner of square No. 1," and says the lot is known "as lot No. 1, and for which reference is made to town plat of Bramwell, recorded in clerk's office, county court." This deed recognizes the square and this lot and this plat. That plat shows a vacant area along the side of lot No. 1. Why did the owner lay out the land into squares and lots, leaving this space vacant? Why did it not cut it into lots and make lot No. 1 there? Because the intention was to have it open. It was designed to have at least a street there, because the series of lots between North River and Main streets did not include the area. No square or lot took it in. Such the start. The engineer laying off the town staked off a street there. While we admit that a mere officer of a corporation cannot make a dedication, yet this engineer Welch was deputed to lay off the town, and I incline to think that his action is binding to show an intent to dedicate, as the company sold lots by his work. Later, Bluestone Coal Company, by deed, 27th June, 1887, conveyed a lot in that area to the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, and the deed makes this lot begin at a point on the right of way of the railroad company "in line with the north boundary of lots from No. 1 to No. 13, inclusive, thence south 7 degrees, 8 minutes west, 125 feet along the west side of — street to a street corner on the north side of Main street." This deed calls for a street then and yet unnamed along the west side of the Pence lot. It says, also, that the land conveyed to the railroad company "is described in the survey thereof made by W. W. Coe." Now, this gives this street a place certain, a corner on North River street, and a corner on Main. Looking at the plat, we see this street laid down along the Pence lot—between it and the lot conveyed to the railroad company. This deed is a plain dedication. The plat is part of the deed, and proof of dedication like it—express dedication. Riddle v. Charlestown, 43 W. Va. 796, 28 S. E. 881; Noonan v. Braley, 67 U. S. 499, 17 L. Ed. 278. Is it said that it has no fixedness in place? Who can say that the Pence lot cannot be located, or that the railroad lot cannot be? They can be fixed with mathematical precision. This street occupies all the ground between them. The call for a street corner on Main street indicates that the grantor company regarded this unnamed street as antecedently dedicated; but this is not material, as this deed is a plain dedication. Thus we have a dedication. Can the land company revoke it? No, because the dedication has been accepted and acted on by the public by use for many years. It has always been driven over and walked over and used by the public as a street, and not a word said against such use by the land company or anybody else. This cannot be denied; is not. This acceptance and dedication makes the ground a street, as between a dedicator and the public, and as between the dedicator and those claiming under it and Jennie Pence. So we held in Hast v. Railroad Co., 52 W. Va. 396, 44 S. E. 155. "Acceptance may be by such long use by the public as to render its reclamation unjust and improper. Both dedication and acceptance may be presumed by long user." Winchester v. Carroll, 99 Va. 727, 40 S. E. 37. See 2 Smith, Munic. Corp. § 1498; Elliott, Roads and Streets, § 133; City v. Stokes, 31 Grat. 713. We may stop here and say that this street in its whole width was a street from dedication and user merely, without corporate acceptance. Such corporate acceptance is immaterial for the purpose of this case. Hast v. Railroad Co., 52 W. Va. 396, 44 S. E. 155; Yates v. West Grafton, 33 W. Va. 507, 11 S. E. 8; Moose v. Carson (N. C.) 10 S. E. 689, 7 L. R. A. 548, 17 Am. St. Rep. 681; Board v. Seal (Miss.) 5 South. 622, 3 L. R. A. 659, 14 Am. St. Rep. 545; City v. Stokes, 31 Grat. 713.

We do not need to say, but do say, that this street is a street as to the town. The mayor put step stones across it on North River street; it was cleared of rubbish by the town, and as much work done on it as on any other street; the town allowed in it a car used as a house for photography, and received rent for it; the town council declared it a nuisance, and ordered it removed, and it is reasonable to say that it was held a nuisance only because in the street; and the town allowed a post office on it, showing that it was regarded a street. Looking at the ordinance of council above fixing the width of the street, it imports the antecedent existence of a street. So we have a street, of its original width 40 feet, unless it has been cut down to 15 feet by the ordinance of the council above given. Jennie Pence, as owner of a lot on that street, had a very valuable vested right in it—that of access. By it the main entrance to her hotel is reached. She built on the faith of its continuance as a street. Many cases hold this right of access as a vested property right annexed to her lot, protected by that clause of the Constitution saying that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation. 2 Smith, Munic. Corp. § 1283; 5 Amer. R. & Corp. Cases, 117; 2 Dillon, Munic. Corp. § 656b; Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 877; Sherlock v. Kansas City (Mo. Sup.) 43 S. W. 629, 64 Am. St. Rep. 551; Lewis on Em. Domain, § 134; Moose v. Carson (N. C.) 10 S. E. 689, 7 L. R. A. 548, 17 Am. St. Rep. 681. There are cases which hold that the act of vacation will avail and entitle the lot owner to no remedy. McGee's Appeal, 114 Pa. 470, 8 Atl. 237; Barr v. City, 45 Iowa, 275; State v. Deer Lodge, 19 Mont. 582, 49 Pac. 147; Levee Dist. v. Farmer, 101 Cal. 178, 35 Pac. 569, 23 L. R. A. 388; Mills, Em. Domain, § 317. The former line says that a vacation of a street ends its existence so far as concerns the town or the general public, but that one owning a lot on the street has a special, peculiar interest from the general public, and can recover damages. I suppose the town and party obstructing would be liable.

It has been suggested that the order of council narrowing the street is void because made only to give back part of the street to the land company owning the fee, or, rather, to free it from street service for its benefit. I grant that a council cannot, under the guise of the power to vacate a street, do so, not for public interest, but only for private use. The Virginia court, in Norfolk v. Chamberlaine, 29 Gratt. 534, only spoke the general decision in saying: "Public streets are for public use, and the use is none the less for the public at large as distinguished from the municipality because they are situated within the limits of the latter. In other words, public streets are not the property of the municipality, or of the people of the municipality, but of the public at large. * * * Upon these principles I am of the opinion that the council of the city of Norfolk had no authority to pass the resolution granting permission to appellee to occupy, by the steps of his building, any portion of a public street." In Smith v. McDowell, 148 Ill. 51, 35 N. E. 141, 22 L. R. A. 393, the subject of power of vacation is well discussed. It is held that by platting of a village the streets, "in their entire width and length," are dedicated to the use of the public, and the village is seised in fee of the streets for the use of the local and general public, holding them in trust for such use and none other; and it may vacate them only where its authorities, in their discretion, determine the street is no longer required for public use; the power of vacation is to be construed in view of the purpose for which the village holds the streets; that it has not unqualified control and disposition of the streets, "and cannot alien or otherwise dispose of them for private use. The municipal authorities cannot vacate a strip of land along and in a street for the sole purpose of enabling a private person to occupy such strip with a permanent structure appurtenant to his building. Whether the motives of village trustees in voting for an ordinance are proper cannot be judicially inquired into, but the purpose accomplished by the ordinance—the object attained—may always be considered in determining its validity. If the purpose effected by it is within the power of the trustees, the act will be valid; otherwise not." I do not question these principles; but they do not fit this case. In the Virginia and Illinois cases, the orders of the councils on their face showed that they had for purpose the conversion of the street from public to private use, not the public interest. In this case the owner of the fee simply asked the council to fix the width of the street, and, while the result of its action was the return of the ground to the owner free of easement, that does not appear to be the purpose and aim of the council, but only resulted as a consequence by law. The fee was in them, and the action took away its servitude; this was a legal result. But we find the council ordinance void for another reason. It is void for uncertainty. What part of the street remains a street? Which side? Why that next to the lot of Jennie Pence rather than the other side? For this reason we reverse the decrees and reinstate the injunction.

Reverse decrees made in vacation of the circuit court on 30th September, 1902, and 19th December, 1902, and remand case for further proceedings.

WILLSON v. IMPERIAL FERTILIZER CO. et al.(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 27, 1903.)PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—DUE CARE OF AGENT
—SALE OF GOODS—APPEAL—EXCEPTIONS—AMENDMENT—CONTRACT—ASSIGNMENT.

1. Where an agent under a power of attorney was appointed to take charge of the business of a party who had contracted to sell fertilizers, and prices advanced during his agency to such an extent that he was in a position, without incurring further expense, to dispose of all fertilizers unsold at a good profit, whereas, if he had waited to sell to the country trade with the usual proportion of credit sales, he would have run the risk of loss from bad debts and the danger of a decline in prices, his act in making such sale showed reasonable care and prudence.

2. Where an agent was engaged in selling fertilizers, his act in closing out all the fertilizers in bulk showed prudence and care in view of a letter from one fertilizer company to another, who was using its brand, claiming the right to terminate such use on demand.

3. A motion to amend an exception on appeal, where the effect is only to amplify it and make it clearer, will be denied.

4. A party to a contract waives his right to object to an assignment thereof by the other party where he actively co-operates in procuring the assignment.

5. Though the agent of a party contracting to sell fertilizers is liable to his principal for the difference between the price at which he could have sold the goods and the price at which he did sell them, the purchaser from such agent is not liable where there was no evidence that he acted in a fiduciary capacity in bringing about the appointment of the agent.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Gage, Judge.

"On January 1st, 1900, if the above amount of goods has not been placed by you, we are to have the option of cancelling the balance of the contract, if so desired by us, or adding to same if the above amount has then been placed.

"All contracts to be taken on your forms, and when goods are sold on time, as far as possible with planters' notes as collateral security to the notes of the purchasers, and said contracts are to be submitted to this company for approval, they having the right of rejecting any contracts not satisfactory to them, and not to be bound to fill any contracts so rejected.

"You hereby agree to procure from the proprietor of the Etiwan Phosphate Works a lease of said plant for the ensuing season; that the question of the use of their brands by you may be legally established, should it become necessary.

"Imperial Fertilizer Company,

"By G. Walter McIver, Treasurer.

"The above is accepted upon the terms and conditions stated therein.

"Willson Griffith, Lessee."

Mitchell & Smith, for appellants. Nathans & Sinkler, for appellee.

WOODS, J. On June 26, 1899, the Imperial Fertilizer Company made a contract with Willson Griffith for the sale of 4,000 tons of fertilizers. The terms and prices are set forth in detail in the letter from the company to Griffith making the proposition. This letter and Griffith's note of acceptance, being essential to an understanding of the issues involved, will be found in the report of the case. The contract contemplated that Griffith, who was a fertilizer salesman of fine judgment and high character, should sell the fertilizers at an advance on the prices he was to pay, and the difference was to constitute his profit. As each separate sale was made and reported by him, the goods were to be shipped as he directed, and charged to him on the Imperial Company's books at the contract price. The company was to hold all notes and accounts taken by him as collateral, to be credited on his debt when collected, and all cash payments made by customers were to be remitted to it for like credit. All credit sales were to be subject to the approval of the company. The contract does not expressly stipulate that the fertilizers should be delivered under the brands of the Etiwan Phosphate Works, but this is implied by the last clause, which was to the effect that Griffith was to procure "from the proprietor of the Etiwan Phosphate Works a lease of said plant for the ensuing season, that the question of the use of their brands by you may be legally established should it become necessary." The Etiwan Company had ceased to manufacture, but its brands were popular, and it was expected their use would aid Griffith to resell the goods at a profit. In the contract he is spoken of as "lessee," the reference being to his supposed lease and control of the Etiwan brands. The Imperial Fertilizer Company had the option of canceling the contract as to all goods not sold by January 1, 1900, "or adding the same if the above amount has then been placed."

After Griffith had sold 718 tons of the 4,000, his friends and business associates observed a marked decline in his physical health, accompanied by some eccentricity of conduct. For this reason G. Walter McIver, manager of the Imperial Fertilizer Company, became much concerned on account of the company's interest in this contract, and consulted with Griffith's sister and some of his friends as to the best course to be pursued. It seems all concurred in the opinion that he would not be able to carry on his business for several months at least, and that it would be necessary for him to appoint an agent to act for him. Griffith acquiesced in this conclusion, and on October 10, 1899, assigned his interest in the contract to W. I. Smith, then a book-keeper of Imperial Fertilizer Company, and on October 13, 1899, expressed his intention that Smith should act for him under the assignment by executing a power of attorney authorizing him, among other things, "to manage, conduct, and carry on my business concerning phosphates or fertilizers, removing, employing, or substituting agents under him; * * * to settle and to compromise, and to submit to arbitration all accounts to claims and disputes between me and any other person arising in or out of said business; to make new contracts and agreements or continue old ones with any person, firm, or corporation, as the conduct of my said business and affairs may, in his best judgment, require." McIver, in the interest of his company, energetically advocated this action by Griffith, and had the papers prepared. The price of fertilizers rose in the autumn of 1899, and late in November of that year Smith, while the market was advancing, released to the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, which in the meantime had purchased all the assets and stock of the Imperial Fertilizer Company, all Griffith's interest in the contract for the consideration of a profit of 25 cents per ton for the unsold portion of the 4,000 tons, amounting in the whole to $2,432.25.

On April 25, 1900, Griffith was declared a lunatic, and the plaintiff, who was appointed his committee, immediately commenced this action for a general accounting by Smith, as attorney in fact, and particularly to require Smith and Imperial Fertilizer Company and Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company to account for the true value of Griffith's interest in the contract sold and released to Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, it being alleged in the complaint that his interest was sold at much less than its real value. The cause was referred to G. H. Sass, Esq., master, who reported, among other things, that with reasonable diligence Smith could have realized 50 cents per ton more than he received.

and that he should be held liable for this neglect. As to the other defendants, the master holds that they acted in their own interest in dealing with Smith, without unfairness or impropriety, and are therefore not responsible to plaintiff. The circuit judge modified the report of the master, and found that the Imperial Fertilizer Company and the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company were also liable for the true value as fixed by the master, on the ground that they occupied a fiduciary relation to Griffith; that the circumstances indicated Smith was their agent as well as the agent of Griffith, and therefore they could not purchase from him.

There are many exceptions, but the only two questions involved in this appeal are: (1) Did Smith, under all the circumstances, exercise reasonable care and prudence in making the sale, and, if not, what was the resulting loss for which he is liable? and (2) did the Imperial Fertilizer Company and the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, or either of them, occupy such fiduciary relation to Griffith or Smith as to make them jointly liable with Smith for any loss arising from the inadequacy of the price?

In endeavoring to determine whether Smith is liable, it is necessary to consider the obligations he assumed to Griffith and his rights at the time he made the release, as against the Imperial Fertilizer Company, or rather the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, which had by purchase assumed the position of the Imperial Fertilizer Company. The terms of the power of attorney indicate the expectation, at least, that Smith, as agent, was to carry on the business on the same plan that Griffith himself had initiated, and he did sell on this plan a small quantity of fertilizers. Nevertheless the evidence makes it very clear he exercised good judgment in not continuing this plan. Prices had advanced, under conditions somewhat abnormal, to such extent that he was in a position, without incurring further expense, to dispose of the entire 3,200 tons remaining unsold at a good profit; whereas, if he had waited to sell to the country trade, with the usual proportion of credit sales, he would have run the risk of much loss from bad debts, and the still greater peril of a decline in prices. It is also to be borne in mind that the company had the power to reject any credit sales he might make. In addition, it should be observed he had a very short time to learn the bearings of the business and dispose of the goods in the country before January 1, 1900, and on that day the contract would have been subject to forfeiture at the option of the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company. The same risks would have been incurred in turning over the contract to Mr. Earle Sloan, who wished to undertake its performance on Griffith's part, in order that he, as part owner and manager of the Etiwan Phosphate Works, might keep its brands on the market, and at the same time, as Griffith's friend, conserve his interests. Aside from the letters of Sloan to the president of the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, which were excluded by the master as incompetent, the evidence of McIver, and Sloan's letter to Messrs. Mitchell and Smith, make it manifest there was such lack of confidence and acute business antagonism between him and the managers of the Imperial Fertilizer Company and the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company as to forbid any hope that this business, which involved in the credit sales of fertilizers so much reciprocal confidence, could have been successfully transacted between them. Besides, Smith could not have forced the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company under a contract of this kind to accept Sloan or any one else as a substitute for himself. Another difficulty under which Smith would have labored if he had endeavored to continue the business on the plan upon which Griffith had begun it was the doubt as to his right to use Etiwan brands. He could find no written authority to use them among Griffith's papers, and we think the letter of Sloan, the manager of the company, to McIver, claiming the right to terminate their use at his demand, was clearly competent, not to prove that Sloan had this right, but to show that Smith had reason to apprehend that he might make such claim, which would seriously embarrass him, in view of the fact that he could not meet it by written authority from the Etiwan Company.

The defendants have moved in this court to amend subdivision 3 of the second exception, so as to make the point that the letters of Earle Sloan to Morgan, president of the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, should have been admitted in evidence, as tending to show "that no use of the Etiwan brands or disposition of the unsold fertilizers, originally included in the agreement of June, 1899, was possible by W. I. Smith, assignee, and that any delay on the part of the said W. I. Smith, assignee, in effecting a settlement of the unsold portion of that contract would have been destructive of any remaining value thereof in his hands." In these letters Sloan does propose to sell to the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company the Etiwan Works, with the right to use its brands for the year 1900, and we think they were competent to enlighten the court as to the extent which the value of Griffith's claim to deliver the fertilizers under Etiwan brands might have been impaired in Smith's hands by an adverse claim. The motion to amend the exception was, in effect, only to amplify it and make it clearer. Watts v. R. R. Co., 60 S. C. 67, 38 S. E. 240. The motion cannot be granted, however, for the reason that the letters were excluded by the master, and no exception was taken to his ruling.

Excluding these letters, upon the testimony to which no objection was made we think Smith was without doubt justified in not running the risk of continuing the business on the plans laid out by Griffith. Indeed, as we understand, the plaintiff does not now seriously question the wisdom of a sale in bulk on the Charleston market, but it is insisted that, if Smith had offered the goods to brokers, he could have sold for a better price than he received. Smith admits he made no effort to sell except to the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, and there seems to be no doubt that, if he had 3,200 tons of fertilizers for sale, free of any contract restrictions, he could, with reasonable effort, have made a cash sale at 50 cents per ton more than he received. The important inquiry therefore is, did the Virginia-Carolina Company, as assignee of the Imperial Fertilizer Company, have such rights under Griffith's contract as to enable it to interfere in any way with his selling in open market in Charleston all the unsold goods? Assuming the contract was of such a personal nature as to deny to Griffith the right to assign it, and thus put in his place one with whom the Imperial Fertilizer Company would not care to deal in a relation implying so much confidence, the assignment to Smith was made with the company's active co-operation, and upon the very valuable consideration that by the assignment it was released from the embarrassment of being bound in a contract to furnish a large quantity of goods to Griffith, a man whose condition had become such as to place the company in a position of great uncertainty as to whether he would be able to take the goods or not. The company therefore waived the right of denying the validity of the assignment to Smith. But, if the assignment is disregarded, the result would not be affected, because Smith had a power of attorney to act for Griffith under the contract, the validity of which has not been disputed. The question, then, of Smith's right to reassign the contract is of no practical importance, because if he, as agent of Griffith, had the right to demand of the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company the delivery of the unsold fertilizer in bulk at the prices named in the contract, it is manifest he himself could have contracted for the sale of these goods, and directed the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company to deliver them to the person purchasing from him.

This leads to the inquiry whether he could have demanded of the company the delivery of the unsold goods without Etiwan brands, and in bulk, upon payment of the agreed price in cash. The contract was for only one season, and the goods were not to be sold under Imperial brands. It is therefore obvious no future advantage to the company for any trade Griffith might establish was contemplated. Griffith contracted to procure a lease of the Etiwan Phosphate Works, so as to establish his right to use the brands of that company, and it was understood the Imperial Company would place those brands of goods shipped out on Griffith's orders, but neither the Imperial Company nor the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company had, when the contract was made, any interest in the Etiwan brands, and they have not since acquired such interest. The sacking and branding of the goods was a burden imposed on the Imperial Company by the contract, and there is not the slightest evidence that this burden ever became a benefit to it. It was therefore subject to waiver by Griffith. Hence, even if Griffith had no legal right to use these brands, as it is alleged was the case, this fact would be of no concern to the Imperial Fertilizer Company or its assignee, the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, if Griffith or his agent could effect a sale of the entire quantity without the brands. It seems perfectly clear that the sole interest the Imperial Company had in the contract was to secure the sale of 4,000 tons of its goods at the prices herein stated, and to collect the purchase money, and all the duties of the contract imposed on the parties were only means provided for the accomplishment of this end. Smith could have demanded the delivery for cash of all the goods, waiving the requirement that Etiwan brands should be used and the condition that he might sell on credit. We suppose it will hardly be contended that the Imperial Company had the option to require Griffith or his agent, Smith, to undertake to sell some indefinite quantity of fertilizers beyond 4,000 tons, after that quantity had been sold. The testimony affords no ground for imputing bad faith, but we cannot avoid the conclusion that Mr. Smith, as a business man, should have known the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company would be obliged to deliver the 3,200 tons in bulk, without Etiwan brands, to his order, on payment of the purchase money; and that he should have offered the goods to the trade, instead of restricting his negotiations to the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company. He must therefore be held responsible for the loss which resulted from his failure to do so. The fact that Griffith owed Imperial Fertilizer Company on transactions for past years about $25,000 does not enter into this question, because this debt was not in any way affected by the assignment and release made by Smith.

We are unable to find any sufficient basis for holding the Imperial Fertilizer Company and the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company liable for the loss on the ground taken in the circuit decree that they occupied a fiduciary position, and that Smith was acting as their agent in this business. It is true Smith was the bookkeeper of the Imperial Fertilizer Company, and afterwards shipping clerk of the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, but these positions do not imply agency to transact business of this character; and we find no evidence that any such trust was given by the companies, or undertaken by him. McIver conducted for them all the negotiations and transactions connected with the matter. It is true, he suggested that Griffith should give up his business until his health should improve, and that in the meantime he should appoint Smith his agent, and he had the power of attorney and assignment prepared; but it was certainly made perfectly clear to Griffith, as well as to his sister and his friends, that McIver was acting for the Imperial Company, and in its interest. The fact that Smith was bookkeeper for the Imperial Fertilizer Company was also well known to Griffith and his friends. McIver suggested that independent investigation should be made as to his capacity and character. The master found "that at the time that Mr. Griffith made this assignment and power of attorney he was mentally competent to do so, and, while he was not in his usual health, there was no reason to suppose that he was not fully aware of the force and effect of his actions, and that the said assignment and power of attorney were properly executed by him, without any undue influence being brought to bear upon him in the premises." This finding was not disturbed by the circuit judge, and we think it is supported by the evidence. That Smith was in the employment of the companies interested of which McIver was manager, and that they were advised by the same attorney, made their relations sufficiently delicate to warrant careful scrutiny of their dealings, and the exaction of more than ordinary candor and fairness; but these facts alone, in the absence of such gross inadequacy of price as to be suggestive of fraud, are not sufficient to make the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company liable for buying at a price somewhat below the market value. Not only is there lack of evidence of collusion, but Smith assumes the whole responsibility of the transaction, and says he acted independently of McIver, refused to accept his first offer, and traded with him only after trying to bring him to a higher price than he obtained. McIver had a right to buy at the lowest price to which he could get Smith to agree, in the absence of fraud or imposition; and there is nothing in the evidence to suggest any inference of that kind. Smith made a bad trade, because, as we have seen, he did not use proper efforts to get a better one, but there is no evidence that McIver persuaded or influenced him not to make such efforts. Looking at the situation of affairs from the company's point of view, McIver seems to have conceived the idea that Smith could not sell the fertilizers without the Etiwan brands, and without following out the provisions of the contract which had been inserted solely for the purpose of obtaining sale and payment. This view was so clearly erroneous that Smith, from his point of view of Griffith's representative, should have rejected it; but there is no reason to doubt McIver honestly entertained it, and there was no impropriety in his urging it in the negotiations.

For these reasons the judgment of the circuit court is modified as above indicated, and the report of the master is confirmed.

(67 S. C. 481)

BROWN v. CAROLINA MIDLAND RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 28, 1903.)

RAILROADS — FIRES COMMUNICATED FROM RIGHT OF WAY—PLEADINGS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EVIDENCE.

1. A complaint alleged that the depot of defendant railroad was situated on its right of way, and that the company allowed fire to remain so near the building that it caught fire, which fire was communicated to property of the plaintiff. Held to state a cause of action within Code Laws 1902, § 2135, providing that a railroad company shall be responsible to any person for damages to property by fire communicated by its locomotives or originating within its right of way.

2. An allegation in the complaint that the fire which injured the property of plaintiff originated in consequence of the act of defendant railroad company is equivalent to an allegation that the fire "originated in consequence of the act of any of defendant's authorized agents or employes," as prescribed by Code Laws 1902, § 2135.

3. Code Laws 1902, § 2135, rendering a railroad company liable to the owner of the property injured by fire communicated from its right of way, is not unconstitutional, as in violation of the Constitution of the United States (article 14, § 1, of the amendments).

4. Under an allegation that a fire was communicated to plaintiff's property from a depot, it is competent to prove that the stove in the depot was defective.

5. A judgment will not be reversed for alleged error in the admission of evidence where the same kind of evidence is afterwards introduced by appellant.

6. The words "right of way," as used in Code Laws 1902, § 2135, rendering a railroad liable for fire communicated by its locomotives or originating on its right of way, do not refer to the title of the railroad company, but are used to designate the locality from which a fire must originate to render the company liable.

7. That, in determining an objection raised, the court gave an erroneous reason, is no ground for reversal, where its conclusion was correct.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; Gage, Judge.

Action by Jennie Brown against the Carolina Midland Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robt. Aldrich, Izlar Bros., and Bellinger & Townsend, for appellant. Davis & Best, R. C. Holman, J. C. Patterson, and W. A. Holman, for appellee.

GARY, A. J. The nature of this action being in dispute, it will be necessary to refer to the complaint:

Paragraph 1 of the complaint alleges the corporate existence of the defendant. Paragraph 2 alleges that, as such corporation, it owns cars and engines, and operates its said railroad through the county of Barnwell. The other allegations of the complaint are as follows:

"(3) That on or about the 9th day of January, A. D. 1899, the plaintiff was the owner of valuable buildings, known as the Brown Cotton & Manufacturing Company, * * * in the aggregate value of $10,000.

"(4) That on the night of the 10th or the early morning of the 11th (about 1 o'clock a. m.) of January, A. D. 1899, as hereinbefore alleged, the defendant corporation, whose depot was situated on its right of way, near its line of road, and the plaintiff's buildings and other property, as aforesaid, being situated a like distance therefrom, to wit, five or six feet, allowed fire to remain in or so near said depot building that the same caught or took fire, communicating same to plaintiff's buildings, as hereinbefore alleged, completely destroying them, together with the cornmill outfit, cylindrical cotton press outfit, cotton gin, gins, feeders, condensers, fans, shaftings, conveyers, and pulleys. That said fire also destroyed the cotton, corn, cotton seed, cans and cases, engines and boilers, shaftings and pulleys, and each and every article as enumerated in the third paragraph of this complaint.

"(5) That, among other things, it was the duty of the defendant company to retain a night watchman at and around said depot, at night, to prevent such conflagrations as herein complained of, which they failed, negligently, so to do.

"(6) That said fire would not have occurred but for defendant's carelessness and negligence in allowing the same to remain in their stove or heater in said depot, and other fire to remain near or about said depot, and the plaintiff further charges that said defendant allowed a box car to stand between their depot and plaintiff's buildings in a dangerous condition, to wit, a hot box being thereto attached, all of which facts were well known, or should have been known, to said defendant; and by reason of the aforesaid facts the defendant has damaged the plaintiff ($10,000) ten thousand dollars."

The answer of the defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and set up the defense of contributory negligence.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant appealed, upon exceptions which will be considered in their regular order.

The first exception is as follows: "(1) That his honor the circuit judge erred in holding that the amended complaint stated a cause of action under the statute (Gen. St. 1882, § 1511; Rev. St. 1893, § 1688; Code Laws 1902, § 2135): (a) In that the said complaint does not allege that the fire originated within the limits of the right of way of the defendant corporation. The allegations merely being that the defendant 'allowed fire to remain in or near [its] depot building.' (b) In that said complaint does not allege that the fire 'originated in consequence of the act of any of the defendant's authorized agents or employees.' (c) In that the statute does not render railroad corporations liable, without regard to negligence, for fires originating in depot buildings situate on their right of way, from fire allowed to remain therein, unless such fire was used in such building for a purpose peculiar to the business of a railroad, and other than for ordinary heating purposes. (d) In that the said complaint does not allege that fire was allowed to remain within the limits of the right of way, other than in the depot building which was situate thereon, and in holding that, under the statute, a cause of action is stated by the allegation that defendant allowed fire to remain in a depot building on its right of way, which became communicated to plaintiff's buildings, his honor the circuit judge deprived the defendant of the equal protection of the laws, and held it to an unconditional liability for the use of property in a manner similar or identical with such use by other persons, without regard to negligence or care, in violation of section 1 of article 14 of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and of section 5 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, and of section 12, of article 1 of the Constitution of 1868. (e) In that the construction placed by the circuit judge on the statute deprives the defendants of equal protection under the laws, and subjects them to an unconditional liability, without regard to negligence or care, for the use of property in a manner similar or identical with such use by other persons, and subjects defendants to other restraints in regard to their use of their property than such as are laid upon others under like circumstances, in violation of section 1 of article 14 of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and of section 5 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, and of section 12 of article 1 of the Constitution of 1868, whereas such statute should have been construed, in conformity with said provisions of the United States Constitution and of the Constitution of this state, to apply only to fires 'communicated by its locomotive engine, or originating within the limits of the right of way of said road, in consequence of the act of any of its authorized agents or employees' in the use of fire, for the purposes peculiar to a railroad."

The first assignment of error on the part of his honor the circuit judge, in ruling that the complaint stated a cause of action under the statute, is set out in "a." The statute is as follows (Code Laws 1902, § 2135): "Every railroad corporation shall be responsible in damage to any person or corporation whose buildings or other property may be injured by fire communicated by its locomotive engines, or originating within the limits of the right of way of said road in consequence of the act of any of its authorized agents or employes, except in any case where property shall have been placed on the right of way of such corporation unlawfully or without its consent, and shall have an insurable interest in the property upon its route for which it may be so held responsible and may procure insurance thereon in its own behalf." The right to bring an action at common law, founded upon negligence, was not superseded by the statute. Hunter v. R. R., 41 S. C. 90, 19 S. E. 197; Dent v. R. R., 61 S. C. 329, 39 S. E. 527. The allegations appropriate to an action under the statute are set out in the fourth paragraph of the complaint, and those appropriate to an action at common law are alleged in the sixth paragraph. It is true, the complaint does not follow the exact language of the statute, but it does not allege that the defendant, whose depot was situated on its right of way, allowed fire to remain in or so near said depot building that the same caught or took fire. The allegations of the complaint were in this respect a substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute.

The second assignment of error will be found in "b." While again, the complaint does not use the very words of the statute, it nevertheless alleges that the fire originated in consequence of the act of the defendant, and this is equivalent to alleging that the fire "originated in consequence of the act of any of the defendant's authorized agents or employes." The act of an authorized agent or employe is the act of the principal. "Qui facit per alium facit per se."

The third assignment of error is contained in "c." In the first place, the statute makes no such exception as that for which the appellant contends, and very properly so, for the use of a depot building on the right of way is as strictly a purpose peculiar to the business of a railroad as the locomotive that draws its cars. Furthermore, the heating of a depot building may be as necessary for the health and comfort of those working within the building as the heating of a passenger car for those traveling on the train. It may properly be said that both are railroad purposes. A depot building and its proper equipment are incidental and essential to the orderly operation of a railroad.

The other assignments of error are in "d" and "e." We do not regard the constitutionality of this statute as an open question, either in this state, or under the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. McCandless v. R. R., 38 S. C. 103, 16 S. E. 429, 18 L. R. A. 440; St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Mathews, 17 Sup. Ct. 243, 41 L. Ed. 611, in which this question is ably and elaborately discussed. This last case cites the case of McCandless v. R. R., 38 S. C. 103, 16 S. E. 429, 18 L. R. A. 440; and the case of St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Mathews, 17 Sup. Ct. 243, 41 L. Ed. 611, is cited with approval in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Mathews, 19 Sup. Ct. 609, 43 L. Ed. 909.

The second exception is as follows: "(2) That his honor the circuit judge erred in admitting testimony to show that the stove or heater, or flues leading therefrom, were defective; no such defect being alleged in the complaint." The complaint alleged that the "fire was communicated," but does not set forth in what manner. The testimony was explanatory of this fact, and was responsive to the allegation of the complaint.

The third exception is as follows: "(3) That the plaintiff having specifically alleged in the sixth paragraph of the complaint 'that the fire would not have occurred but for defendant's allowing, first, fire to remain in the stove or heater in said depot; and, second, other fire to remain near or about said depot; and, third, a box car to stand between the depot and plaintiff's buildings, in dangerous condition, to wit, a hot box being thereto attached'—he confined the issue as to the origin of the fire to the three facts alleged, and the circuit judge erred in admitting testimony to show that the stove or heater was defective, or left in a defective condition, such defect not being alleged in the pleading." In the first place, these specifications of negligence are only appropriate to an action at common law. And in the second place, this exception is disposed of by what was said in considering the second exception.

The fourth exception is as follows: "(4) That his honor the circuit judge erred in admitting parol testimony to show that the lands on which the fire occurred was a right of way of defendant's company, inasmuch as the best evidence of right of way is the record evidence of same." After a lengthy discussion of this question, the presiding judge concluded as follows: "The Court: I think in a case like this, where the railroad company is defendant, and the allegation is that the fire occurred on the right of way, that it is competent to prove the distance of the building from the track, the manner in which the building was used, and every other relationship of it to the railroad company, and leave it to the jury to say whether or not it is on the right of way. Mr. Aldrich: Your honor rules he can prove orally the right of way? The Court: I will define to the jury what a right of way is, and leave them to say whether or not this place called a 'right of way' is a right of way. He can prove all the circumstances in connection with the use of the depot, its location," etc. In this we see no error. But apart from this, the defendant afterwards introduced in evidence the deed of the plaintiff conveying the right of way to the defendant. In the case of Taylor v. Dominick, 36 S. C. 368, 15 S. E. 591, the court ruled that it "is not sufficient ground to reverse the judgment, when it appears that the testimony, though erroneously ruled out at one stage of the trial, was in fact received, and went before the jury." For a stronger reason, the judgment should not be reversed when the defendant furnishes the kind of testimony which it insisted should have been introduced by the plaintiff, especially as the plaintiff did not dispute the accuracy of the description mentioned in the deed.

The fifth exception is as follows: "(5) That his honor the circuit judge erred in admitting parol testimony as to the limits of the defendant's right of way, in order to show that the fire originated within such limits." This exception is disposed of by what was said in considering the fourth exception.

The sixth exception is as follows: "(6) That his honor the circuit judge erred in construing the deed by which Mrs. Brown conveyed the right of way to the railroad company (Exhibit C) in his charge to the jury in which he gave no effect to, but ignored, the portion of said deed conveying the land on which the depot was situated, whereas he should have construed said deed to exclude said lands on which the depot was situated from the limits of the right of way." The use of the words "right of way" in this statute has no reference to the title of the railroad company—whether having a mere easement or a greater estate—but they were intended to designate the locality within which the corporation would be liable under the statute.

The seventh exception is as follows: "(7) That his honor the circuit judge erred in refusing to charge, as requested by the defendant, 'that, if the jury find from the evidence that the fire originated in the depot building mentioned in the complaint, then the statute cannot apply, whether such building be on the right of way or not, and the defendant cannot recover without proving negligence.' Inasmuch as the statute (Gen. St. 1882, § 1511; Rev. St. 1893, § 1688; Code Laws 1902, § 2135) cannot be construed to apply to fires originating in buildings on the right of way without denying to the defendant corporation the equal protection of the laws guaranteed it by section 1 of article 14 of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and by section 5 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, and by section 12 of article 1 of the Constitution of 1868; and, where a statute can be given construction consistent with the Constitution of the United States and of the state. It should not be so construed as to conflict with either of them." This question has already been discussed.

The eighth exception is as follows: "(8) That his honor the circuit judge erred in refusing to charge, as requested by the defendant, 'that, if the jury find that the fire originated in a building, then, whether such building be on the right of way or not, the liability of the defendant for damages to the property of others to which the fire might extend is no greater than the liability of any other person owning or occupying the building, situate otherwise, in which a fire originates under similar circumstances,' in that he thereby gave the statute (Gen. St. 1882, § 1511; Rev. St. 1893, § 1688; Code Laws 1902, § 2135) a construction inconsistent with, and in violation of, section 1 of article 14 of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, section 5 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, and section 12 of article 1 of the Constitution of 1868, guarantying the defendant equal protection under the laws." This question has likewise been considered.

The ninth exception is as follows: "(9) That his honor the presiding judge erred in holding and charging the jury, that the language of the statute (Gen. St. 1882, § 1511; Rev. St. 1893, § 1688; Code Laws 1902, § 2135) is broad enough to cover fires originating in the buildings of a railroad company, inasmuch as such construction of the statute subjects railroad corporations to other restraints in regard to personal rights than such as are laid upon other persons under like circumstances, and imposes a burden upon railroad companies which is not imposed upon other persons owning houses, in violation of section 1 of article 14 of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, section 5 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, and section 12 of article 1 of the Constitution of 1868, securing to the defendant equal protection under the laws." This question has also been disposed of.

The tenth exception is as follows: "(10) That his honor the circuit judge, having no doubt that the Legislature, when it passed the act in question, never contemplated a case like this, erred in holding that the language of the act is broad enough to cover a case like this, inasmuch as the intention of the Legislature should govern in the construction of the act." When a circuit judge errs as to his power to decide, a question, his ruling will be reversed. State v. David, 14 S. C. 428. The rule in cases where his conclusion is correct, but his reason erroneous, is thus stated in Taylor v. Dominick, 36 S. C. 368, 15 S. E. 591: "It is well settled that this court confines itself to a consideration of the question determined by the court below, without regard to the correctness of the reasons which may be given for the conclusion that may there be reached, and that, if the conclusion reached is correct, the fact that erroneous reasons are given for such conclusion will not warrant this court in reversing the judgment appealed from."

The eleventh exception is as follows: "(11) That his honor the circuit judge erred in not passing on the constitutional question as to the constitutionality of the statute (Gen. St. 1882, § 1511; Rev. St. 1893, § 1688; Code Laws 1902, § 2135), under his construction that it applies to fires originating in the building of a railroad company, and thereby imposes a burden upon a railroad company owning houses which it does not impose upon other people owning houses. Such construction being clearly in violation of section 1 of article 14 of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, of section 5 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, and of section 12 of article 1 of the Constitution of 1868." We have already considered the constitutional question which his honor declined to consider, just as if he had ruled upon it adversely to the defendant.

The twelfth exception is as follows: "(12) That his honor the circuit judge, having concluded and held that the statute (Gen. St. 1882, § 1511; Rev. St. 1893, § 1638; Code Laws 1902, § 2135) imposed a burden upon railroad companies owning houses not imposed on other persons owning houses, erred in not concluding that this was a denial to the defendant railroad company of the equal protection of the law, in violation of the Constitutions of the United States and of this state." This question is disposed of by what was said in considering other exceptions.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

The petition for a rehearing in this case having been withdrawn, it is ordered that the order heretofore granted staying the remittitur be revoked.

TENCH v. GRAY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 14, 1904.)

MOTION FOR JUDGMENT—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY—COMMENCEMENT OF TERM.

1. On a motion for judgment for money under section 3211, Code 1887, the notice takes the place of both writ and declaration, and must summon the party upon whom it is served to a fixed and certain day.

2. A notice on a motion for judgment for money under Code 1887, § 3211, must be served on defendant at least 15 days before the day on which the motion is to be made; and where a notice is served on October 13th on defendant, informing him that on the first day of the next term plaintiff would move for judgment, and the day fixed by law for the term to begin is October 27th, the notice is insufficient, though, as a matter of fact, the court did not open until the 29th of October.

Error to Circuit Court, Sussex County.

George Mason, for plaintiff in error. J. F. West, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. On October 13, 1900, the plaintiff in error had written notice served upon the defendant in error by the sheriff of Sussex county, informing him that on the first day of the next term of the circuit court for the county of Sussex she would move that court for a judgment against him for the sum of $615.30, with interest thereon from the 30th day of November, 1898, until paid. This notice was returned to the clerk's office on the 16th day of October, 1900, and was placed by the clerk on the docket of the court. The time fixed by law for the term to begin was October 27, 1900, but the court did not open until October 29, 1900. Under the law, no judgment could be given upon this notice unless served on the defendant at least 15 days before the day on which the motion was to be made. The day fixed by law for the term to begin being October 27, 1900, it is apparent that a notice served October 13, 1900, did not give the 15 days required before the day the motion was to be made. The contention, however, of the plaintiff in error, is that because the court did not open until October 29, 1900, the last-named day became the first day of the term, and, the 15 days having then elapsed, she could, under the notice given, obtain judgment on that day.

It is true that courts view with indulgence these proceedings by motion upon notice, but this liberality has not gone to the extent of dispensing with the necessity for fixing a definite and certain day when the defendant can answer the demand for a judgment against him. The names of the parties, the amount for which judgment will be asked, and the time and place at which the motion will be made, must be stated in clear and unmistakable terms.

This court has held that on motion for judgment for money, under section 3211 of the Code, the notice takes the place of both the writ and the declaration. Morotock Ins. Co. v. Pankey, 91 Va. 259, 21 S. E. 487; Grubbs v. National Life Ins. Co., 94 Va. 589, 27 S. E. 464. As the notice is in lieu of the writ, it must, like the writ, summon the party upon whom it is served to a fixed and certain day, when he can appear and make his defense. The statute declares when the terms of courts shall commence, and a litigant has a right to assume that the law will be complied with, and should not suffer loss from acting on that assumption.

In the case at bar the defendant in error had the right to interpret the notice, which informed him that judgment would be asked against him on the first day of the next term, to mean that the motion would be made on the day fixed by law for the term to begin. In short, that notice, as given, was equivalent to saying "on the first day of the next term, that being the 27th day of October, 1900." Indeed, it would have been a violent presumption that he was expected to make his defense on some other day, to be determined by the judge, whose mind on the subject was unknown to the defendant in error. If the court had opened on the first day of the term fixed by law, it cannot be denied that the notice in question would have been insufficient, and no judgment could have been had upon it. The mere circumstance that the court did not open for several days after the day fixed by law for the term to begin could not operate to revive and lengthen a notice that had already perished by reason of the inherent infirmity of being too short.

The case of Skipwith's Ex'r v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 271, 31 Am. Dec. 642, is not authority for the position taken by counsel for plaintiff in error. That case turned upon the question whether a judgment related back to the first day of the term appointed by law, or to the first day of the term on which the court actually commenced its session. It was held that the judgment related back to the commencement of the term, that being regarded as the day the session actually begun, and did not, therefore, have priority over a deed of trust recorded the day appointed by law for the court to begin. In other words, the decision was that the commencement of the term was the first day on which the court was actually in session.

The question in the case at bar is not when the term actually commenced, but when was the first day of the next term of the circuit court for the county of Sussex, in contemplation of the notice that judgment would be asked on that day against the defendant in error. The statute answered that question for the defendant in error by providing October 27, 1900, as the first day of the term in question. Under the notice, that was the only day that could possibly have been known to the defendant in error upon which he could have appeared to defend the motion.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court, quashing the notice as insufficient and dismissing the motion, must be affirmed.

HANCOCK v. WHITE HALL TOBACCO WAREHOUSE CO.

JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA—ENTIRE CONTRACT—SEPARATE ACTIONS FOR BREACH—DAMAGES PROVABLE.

1. A lessor contracted to build for the lessee a factory equipped with modern appliances, to be ready by a certain date. The contract expressly stipulated that the lessor was to be at no charge during the term, except for insurance and taxes. It failed to build and equip the factory by the date specified, and the lessee sued to recover damages for a breach of the contract. Held, that the contract being entire, and the breach complete, the right of action at once accrued to recover damages for the entire contract, and the lessee could not recover any further damages for the same breach in a subsequent action.

2. It is not essential that all the injurious effects which arise from a breach of contract should have been suffered before suit, in order to enable the injured party to recover therefor; but not only are the actual effects down to the time of trial provable, but also those which may ensue can be taken into account, where they are imminent and reasonably certain.

Error to Circuit Court, Buckingham County.

Action by the White Hall Tobacco Warehouse Company against A. J. Hancock, doing business under the style of the Lynchburg Tobacco Company. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

F. C. Moon, for plaintiff in error. S. S. P. Patteson, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This controversy arose out of a contract between the defendant in error, the White Hall Tobacco Warehouse Company, and the plaintiff in error, A. J. Hancock, doing business under the style of the Lynchburg Tobacco Company, whereby the defendant in error agreed to erect and have ready for occupancy by October 1, 1898, a tobacco factory for the use of plaintiff in error. The factory was to be built according to specifications, and "equipped with modern appliances for the proper steaming and handling of tobacco." Plaintiff in error agreed to lease the factory for a term of two years, with the privilege of extending the lease three years longer, from October 1, 1898, at an annual rental of $450.

The defendant in error failed to equip the factory with modern appliances, agreeable to contract; and in September, 1900, plaintiff in error brought an action of trespass on the case against it, demanding damages to the amount of $6,000 for the breach, in which action she recovered a verdict and judgment for $250.

Prior to that suit, plaintiff in error had elected to continue the lease for the additional period of three years, and, having made default in the payment of rent, attachment proceedings were instituted against her for its collection. In those proceedings the defendant tendered a special plea of set-off, under section 3299 of the Code of 1887, in which $5,000 damages, alleged to have been sustained by reason of the continuing breach of the contract on the part of the plaintiff with respect to appliances for steaming and handling tobacco since the first suit, were claimed. The trial court rejected the plea, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff, which ruling constitutes the assignment of error relied on here.

The single question thus presented for decision is whether the verdict and judgment in the former action conclude the plaintiff in error, and bars a further recovery for damages alleged to have been subsequently sustained by the original breach of contract. In that connection it is proper to observe that there is nothing in the pleadings in the first suit to have limited the recovery to damages accruing prior to its institution, and, while the record does not disclose the range taken by the testimony, the verdict and judgment are general in their terms. In other words, the pleadings are sufficiently broad to have entitled the plaintiff to recover damages for the whole term of five years, and there is nothing in the record to show that the recovery was for a less period. It is an ancient and firmly established rule of law that only one action can be maintained for the breach of an entire contract. 2 Sedg. on Dam. (8th Ed.) § 642; 1 Suth. on Dam. (2d Ed.) § 108.

In Clark on Contracts, at page 705, the author says: "The right of a party to sue for a breach of contract is discharged by the final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, either in his favor or against him. In the former case the cause of action merges in the judgment, while in the latter the judgment estops him."

The same author, discussing merger and res judicata, at page 71, remarks: "As soon as it [the judgment] is created, the previously existing rights with which it deals merge or are extinguished in it. For instance, when a person sues another for a breach of contract or for a civil injury, and a judgment is entered either by consent or after trial, neither party has any further rights in respect of the cause of action. The judgment conclusively settles their rights, and the matter is said to be res judicata."

It is clear that the contract under consideration is entire, and not severable. By it the lessor obligated itself to build a factory, equipped with modern appliances for steaming and handling tobacco, by October 1, 1898. It was under no obligation to keep the appliances in repair, but, to the contrary, the contract expressly stipulated that the lessor was to be at no charge during the term, except for insurance and taxes. So that, if it had built and equipped the factory by October 1, 1898, according to contract, its responsibility in respect to it would have terminated. If, on the other hand, there was a failure to comply with the contract in the particular complained of, the breach was complete, and a right of action at once accrued to recover damages for the entire term. The stipulation is not one of a series of obligations, but an entire promise, calling for one performance, and subjecting the lessor to one action only for a total breach.

It is not essential that all the injurious effects which arise from a breach of contract should have been manifested and suffered before suit. The actual effects down to the time of trial are provable, and those which may ensue can be taken into account where they are imminent and reasonably certain. 1 Suth. on Dam. §§ 110, 113. Thus an agreement to support one during life was held to be an entire contract, and upon a total breach thereof the promisee could recover full and final damages; i. e., not only the expenses of support up to the time of trial, but also the prospective expense during life. Schell v. Plumb, 55 N. Y. 592.

"So of any act done or default made which is a breach of any stipulation in a contract. It is a single and entire cause of action, embracing all ensuing consequences for which compensation is allowed; and, however multifarious may be the stipulations in it, any act which amounts to a total breach constitutes but a single cause of action, unless, perhaps, when the stipulations are so distinct and relate to subjects so disconnected as to have no relation or unity, but such as results from being made at the same time, or contained in one instrument. Nor can an entire claim be severed by partial assignments so as to become the foundation of several suits instead of one." 1 Suth. on Dam. § 113.

It results from the foregoing principles that a demand arising upon an entire contract cannot be divided and made the subject of several suits, and, if several suits are brought for a breach of such a contract, a judgment upon the merits of either will bar a recovery in the others.

For these reasons, the judgment complained of is without error, and is affirmed.

SLAUGHTER v. DANNER.

PARTNERSHIP—DUTY OF KEEPING BOOKS—CHANCERY PRACTICE—ISSUE OUT OF CHANCERY.

1. One partner, in a suit to settle a partnership, having failed to show that the exclusive duty of keeping the books of the partnership rested upon the other partner, cannot recover where, because of their confused and imperfect condition, a commissioner is unable to make any settlement.

2. Whether or not an issue out of chancery is desirable rests always in the sound discretion of the court; it should not be directed in a settlement of partnership accounts where the evidence and accounts are all before the court.

Appeal from Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Bill by J. L. Slaughter against F. W. Danner. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Isaac Diggs and Hugh A. White, for appellant. M. M. Gilliam, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. This suit was brought by the appellant, J. L. Slaughter, for a settlement of the affairs of a partnership between himself and the appellee, F. W. Danner. This partnership was formed in April, 1891, for the purpose of conducting the business of merchants and manufacturers of lime, plaster, and cement, in the county of Augusta. The partnership lasted until January, 1894, when it was dissolved by mutual consent.

The appellant claims that he put into the concern $3,040, and that he is entitled to recover that sum from his copartner. On the other hand, the appellee claims that there were no assets of the concern with which to pay its debts, and that the firm was indebted to him in about twice the sum claimed by appellant, on account of debts for which he had become personally responsible.

There was no contract reduced to writing setting forth the terms of the partnership agreement, and the parties are utterly at variance in their oral statements of the terms agreed upon. The appellant alleges in his bill that appellee agreed to keep all the books pertaining to the business, and his chief contention is that this obligation imposed upon appellee the duty of showing the results of the partnership business and the rights of each partner with respect thereto, and that, having failed to keep proper books, he is liable to appellant for his in-put.

The appellee in his answer emphatically denies the allegation that he was to keep all of the books, and avers that the appellant was to keep, and did actually keep, at the place of their operations, a large and important part of the books of the firm. Certainly, with the exception of the larger part of the first year, the appellant, during the entire period of the partnership, lived in Augusta, at the place of the partnership operations, and the evidence shows that he there had the exclusive management of the business, and undertook to keep a large and important part of the books. The appellant is not, therefore, entitled to recover upon the ground that the exclusive duty of keeping the books rested upon the appellee.

The commissioner to whom the cause was referred for a settlement of the partnership accounts, and a statement showing all claims, debts, and demands between the partners, filed a report, together with a large mass of evidence, oral and otherwise, produced before him. This report discloses the fact that a commissioner of large experience was, on account of the hopeless confusion of the books and papers submitted to him, utterly unable to make any settlement between the parties that would approximate reliability. He says that the only possibility of finding anything due to appellant would be upon the theory that appellee was, under the agreement, to keep the books, and was therefore responsible for their confused and imperfect condition, but that the evidence fails to prove that appellee was charged with or performed that duty, and shows the contrary to be the fact. As confirmation of the condition of the books and papers of this firm, the commissioner adverts to the report of two expert accountants, filed in the record. These experts say: "We have made a careful examination of the books of the firm of Danner & Co. and the papers in the case of 'Slaughter v. Danner,' and find them in such shape that we cannot possibly make up a statement of profit and loss, or of the interest of each partner in the business. Furthermore, we believe that any statement made up by any accountant, attempting to show these facts, if made up from the books and papers submitted to us, would be totally unreliable."

Our examination of the evidence and accounts has resulted in no greater light than was shed upon those who have previously dealt with the subject. It is impossible to say that the appellee is indebted to the appellant. Such a conclusion might be far from correct. The appellant having inaugurated the litigation, and it appearing that he was actively engaged in the management of the business and in keeping a large and important part of the books of the firm, the burden was upon him to show his right to recover from the appellee. This he has wholly failed to do, and there can be no other result than that reached by the lower court in dismissing the bill.

Appellee insists that the lower court erred in overruling his motion for an issue out of chancery. The object of an issue out of chancery is to aid the court in reaching a conclusion. Whether or not an issue is desirable rests always in the sound discretion of the court. It is one of the peculiar functions of a court of equity to settle partnership accounts. In the case at bar the evidence had all been taken, and the accounts were all before the court. It is not perceived that a jury, in the condition of the record, could have brought to the court any aid in solving the difficulties presented. It was a case that the commissioner and the court could deal with far more intelligently than a jury.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that there is no error in the decree appealed from, and it must be affirmed.

WHITE HALL CO. v. HALL

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Dec. 10, 1903.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—ACCOUNT AGAINST HUSBAND—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS OF CORPORATION AGENT.

1. The evidence held insufficient to establish that a running account against the husband was to be applied as a payment upon a bond due to the wife.

2. The admissions and representations made by an agent of a corporation, acting within the scope of his authority, and concerning matters intrusted to him, are binding upon the corporation.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buckingham County.

Bill by Della M. Hall against the White Hall Company. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals, and plaintiff assigns cross-error. Affirmed.

S. S. P. Patteson, for appellant. F. C. Moon, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. The bill in this cause was filed by Della M. Hall to enforce the satisfaction of three claims asserted by her against the appellant company. The first of these is a bond for $3,000, dated November 25, 1893, secured by deed of trust from the appellant upon certain real estate; second, $400 and interest from December 7, 1895; and, third, $859.89 and interest from October 5, 1894. The two last-mentioned claims were not secured, and are eliminated from this controversy by the plea of the statute of limitations.

In its answer to the bill the appellant company sets up as offset to the first-mentioned claim an account against W. E. Hall, the husband of the appellee, Della M. Hall, of sufficient magnitude to satisfy the plaintiff's demand.

The commissioner to whom the cause was referred to ascertain what was due on the deed of trust claim of $3,000 and interest disallowed the account set up by the defendant company, and allowed as a credit an account, consisting of two items, kept by the company against the appellee, Della M. Hall, amounting to $526, and reported the balance due on the debt to be $4,079 as of October 25, 1902. This report was confirmed by the decree appealed from, which we are asked to review.

All of the evidence taken is returned by the commissioner with his report, and we are of opinion that it fully sustains his finding and the action of the circuit court in confirming the same. That the appellee, Della M. Hall, loaned the appellant $3,000 of her separate estate, and had the same secured by the deed of trust mentioned, is not denied. The offset asserted by the appellant company consists of a running account commenced by W. E. Hall with the company, for family supplies, etc., some time prior to the date of the loan made by his wife. The books of the company show that, while this account was being kept against W. E. Hall, a separate account was kept against the appellee, Della M. Hall, and it is to be presumed that she would be charged on her own account with all that was properly chargeable to her. It further appears that on two occasions the company, through its agent, H. M. White, obtained from the appellee this bond to use as collateral security in borrowing money for its own purposes. The last of these occasions was in August, 1898, when it was used by the company as collateral security for a loan of $3,000 obtained by it from the Lynchburg Perpetual Building & Loan Company. A large part of this debt is still unpaid, and the Della M. Hall bond is still held by the building and loan company as collateral security therefor. At the time this loan was negotiated by the appellant company, its books showed the larger part of the account now asserted as an offset to be outstanding, and, if it was then understood by the company to be a payment pro tanto on the bond due appellee, the use of that bond without credit as collateral was, to say the least of it, singular treatment of the building and loan company.

Although the account in question had been running on the books of the company against W. E. Hall, who was its vice president, and one of its stockholders, through a period of nearly 10 years, yet no hint of its existence, or that it was intended as a payment on her debt, was ever at any time communicated to the appellee, she having heard of it for the first time after it was filed as an offset in this suit. That the account was never chargeable to Mrs. Hall, nor intended to be used as an offset to her debt, and that its assertion in this suit is an afterthought, is further conclusively shown by the following correspondence.

As late as January, 1902, when the whole account against W. E. Hall was on the books of the company, the appellee, Della M. Hall, addressed H. M. White, the general manager of the company, the following letter: "Please let me know by return mail when you can pay me the interest on my $3,000.00 mortgage. It is necessary for me to have the money at once." By return mail she received from H. M. White, general manager, the following reply: "Dear Mrs. Hall: Your note dropped in the post office was duly received. Mr. Silvey has arranged to finish paying you the balance on the $500.00 on account of interest on your $3,000.00 this week. As to the balance of the interest, we are in no position to pay this in a lump, and cannot do this until we get a settlement from Browning Bros., which Mr. H. B. Hanford, assignee, says should be made some time in April. I believe we can borrow enough money after the Browning matter is settled to pay any balance of interest due you, as well as the $3,000.00 itself. In the meantime, I would suggest that we pay you the first of each month, commencing February 1st, fifty dollars per month on account of interest, and these payments to continue until we can settle in full. If draft now in the hands of the Building and Loan Co., at Lynchburg, is paid, we will only owe them $1,430.00, whereas we owed them at first $3,900.00, so you can see your loan is in better shape than for the last three years. If draft is not paid we owe them $1,730. I am doing all any one can to pull the company through, and nothing can possibly be gained but a great deal lost by pressing for money at this time. Anything I have you can get at any time."

As secretary and treasurer of the company, the author of this letter would have been fully cognizant of any payments that had been made on the debt in question, and yet the letter is written admitting the entire debt except the $500 alluded to and promising its payment, without the slightest suggestion that the company claimed as an offset the account now asserted, or any part of it. There is other evidence, record as well as oral, to sustain the action of the lower court; but the solemn and unequivocal admission contained in this letter, in direct response to a demand for the interest, that the whole principal and the bulk of the interest was unpaid, would seem to be sufficient without prolonging this opinion by a further review of the evidence.

It is contended that this admission cannot bind the company, because H. M. White, the general manager, had no special authority to make it. This position is not tenable. A corporation can only speak through its officers and agents, and their declarations, made in the course of their employment, and relating to the immediate transaction in which they are engaged, are always competent against the corporation. The admissions and representations made by an agent of a corporation, acting within the scope of his authority, and concerning matters intrusted to him, are binding upon the corporation. Cook on Corporations (4th Ed.) § 726.

In the case before us the author of the admission contained in the letter mentioned had been from its inception the general manager and the secretary and treasurer of the company. He was one of its largest stockholders, and the record shows that for all practical purposes he was the company. Its books were kept under his supervision and control. He managed its finances, negotiated loans, disbursed its money, and controlled its affairs generally. The letter in question pertained to the work and duty that its author appears to have been charged with and constantly performed. That one exercising the broad powers that seem to have been confided to this general manager, secretary, and treasurer had the authority to write the letter and make the admission that he did cannot be doubted.

The appellee, Della M. Hall, assigns as cross-error the action of the circuit court in allowing appellant credit for the $500 alluded to in the letter mentioned. That $500 is one of the two items mentioned in the account kept by the company against the appellee. As to it, the evidence is conflicting, and we would not feel warranted in disturbing the finding of the commissioner with respect thereto, and the confirmation of that finding by the circuit court.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that there is no error in the decree complained of to the prejudice of appellant, and it must be affirmed.

RICHMOND TRACTION CO. v. WILLIAMS.

STREET RAILWAYS—PASSENGERS—POINT OF STOPPING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. It is the duty of the street railway to use extraordinary care and caution to see that passengers are not injured in getting on or off its cars when stopped at a regular point for stopping.

2. If plaintiff undertook to get off a street car while in motion, she was guilty of contributory negligence; but if she retained her seat until the car stopped, and reached the platform before it started, and was thrown, while alighting, by the sudden starting of the car, she was not guilty of contributory negligence.

3. It is not error to refuse instructions when the propositions of law, although correctly stated therein, are sufficiently covered by other instructions which are granted.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by S. M. Williams against the Richmond Traction Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

William L. Royall, for plaintiff in error. Edgar Allan, Jr., for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. The defendant in error, Mrs. S. M. Williams, brought her action in the law and equity court of Richmond City, and recovered judgment against the plaintiff in error, the Richmond Traction Company, for the sum of $500, with interest from the 24th day of April, 1901, as damages for injuries sustained because of the negligence of the defendant, and we are asked to reverse this judgment on the grounds (1) that the court below misdirected the jury as to the law; and (2) because the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence. The defendant below, plaintiff in error here, owns and operates an electric street railway in the city of Richmond, and one of its tracks lies in Cary street, running east and west; and it crosses at right angles Belvidere street, on which the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Steam Railroad has a track, upon which steam cars are operated.

An ordinance of the city of Richmond relative to the conduct of street railways operated within the city contains the provision that, "at every point of intersection of either street car line with a steam railroad, the street car company's cars shall come to a full stop before crossing the tracks of the steam road, and the steam road in each case shall have the right of way," etc.; and one of the printed rules of the plaintiff in error reads as follows: "(16) Steam Railroad Crossings. Motormen must bring their cars to a full stop, not nearer than twenty-five feet to the nearest track—meaning, the nearest track of the steam railroad. The motorman must not proceed with his car until the conductor has gone ahead onto the steam railroad track and looked both ways and given a signal to start. The motorman will also observe the utmost watchfulness for approaching trains, and should, in his judgment, danger be imminent from any source he will refuse to start his car until the crossing is clear and free from all danger. When the conductor has gone ahead of car, before starting, the motorman will look back and see that there is no one getting on or off the car. * * * Another of the plaintiff in error's rules provides: "(39) Approaching Street and Railway Crossings. Approach all street and railway crossings with care, and your car under perfect control; cross the street before stopping."

On the 24th day of April, 1901, the defendant in error was a passenger on one of the cars of the plaintiff in error, having gotten on the car at First and Broad streets, and was going to her home, on Belvidere street, near Cary street. When the car reached the east side of Belvidere street, it came to a full stop, in accordance with the rules of the plaintiff in error, and the conductor went forward to view the steam railroad tracks, to ascertain whether his car could proceed further without danger of collision with the steam cars; and, observing the approach of no steam cars, he signaled the motorman to go forward. In the meantime the defendant in error had left her seat in the car, and was in the act of alighting upon the street, when the car was suddenly started with a severe jerk, throwing her upon the street, causing her the injuries for which this suit was brought. Her contention at the trial was that by custom the place at which she attempted to leave the car had become a regular stopping place for passengers to alight, and that before approaching that point she signaled to the conductor with her hand to stop the car for her to alight, and she supposed he understood and agreed to her signal, whereupon she got up and walked out upon the back platform, supposing that the conductor would be there to assist her off, but when she got upon the rear platform she found that the conductor had gone to the steam road, and, reaching it, and without looking back, he signaled the motorman with his hand to come on, and, the motorman applying the electricity, the car gave a sudden jerk, that threw her to the ground and injured her.

On the other hand, the theory of plaintiff in error was that the defendant in error either attempted to get off the car while moving, thereby contributing to her own injuries, or that, after reaching the rear platform at the steps, instead of getting off of the car, she delayed, and thereby lost her opportunity to get off before the car started. In other words, the contention of the defendant in error was that she received her injuries by reason of the neglect of the plaintiff in error to perform its duty to her, under the law, as a passenger, and in violation of its own rules and regulations, while the theory of the plaintiff in error was that the defendant in error, by her own negligence, contributed to her injuries, whereby she was barred of any recovery in this action.

The defendant in error at the trial asked for two instructions, which the court gave. The second relates to the measure of damages in such an action, and is free from objection, and will therefore not be further noticed. The first instruction is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that it is the duty of common carriers, such as street railway companies, to use extraordinary care and caution to see that passengers are not injured in getting on or off their cars, and that it was the duty of the defendant company, their servants and employes, to take due and proper precaution to see that no one was in the act of alighting before moving their car ahead after the same had been stopped at a regular point for stopping; and if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Mrs. Williams, without negligence on her part, was in the act of alighting from said car, and that the defendant company, their servants or employes, failed to perform their duty in this behalf, and by reason thereof the plaintiff was injured, then the jury shall find for the plaintiff."

This instruction, we think, was clearly right, as it presented the rule of law which this court has frequently laid down with reference to the liability of a street car company to use the utmost care and diligence for the safety of passengers. The most recent case on the subject is that of N. & A. Ter. Co. v. Morris' Adm'r (Va.) 44 S. E. 719. The evidence tended to show that the defendant in error in this case was seeking to leave the car at a point which, by custom, known to the plaintiff in error, had become a regular stopping place where passengers left the car, and she was on this occasion, as she had frequently done before, alighting from the car near her home.

Plaintiff in error asked for five instructions, marked "A," "B," "C," "D," and "E," of which the court refused to give "D" and "E," and modified "A," "B," and "C"; the court giving the instructions as modified as its own instructions, numbering them Nos. 3, 4, and 5. Instruction "A," modified, was as follows:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff undertook to get off of defendant's car while it was in motion, she is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover in this action."

And in lieu of this instruction the court gave the following:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff undertook to get off the defendant's car while it was in motion, she is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover in this action; but if the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff retained her seat until the car had fully stopped, and reached the platform before the car was started forward, and that then, while she was in the act of alighting, by the sudden starting of the car she was thrown to the ground and injured, her conduct cannot be considered as constituting contributory negligence on her part."

If it be conceded that a passenger on a street car is guilty of negligence by leaving his seat while the car is in motion, as to which we express no opinion, instruction "A"

contained a mere abstract proposition of law, which was calculated to mislead the jury in this case; and the court was clearly right in qualifying it by adding thereto, "but if the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff retained her seat until the car had fully stopped, and reached the platform before the car was started forward, and that then, while she was in the act of alighting, by the sudden starting of the car she was thrown to the ground and injured, her conduct cannot be considered as constituting contributory negligence on her part." We are further of opinion that this instruction, as given by the court, together with its fourth and fifth instructions, sufficiently covered every proposition of law contended for in the instructions asked for by the plaintiff in error which were refused. The instructions as given submitted more clearly to the jury the issues presented by the testimony in the case, and it is not error to refuse instructions when the propositions of law, although correctly stated therein, are sufficiently covered by other instructions which are granted. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Tanner, 100 Va. 379, 41 S. E. 721.

We shall not attempt to review in detail the evidence in the case. This is a very different case from that of a trespasser, a licensee, or of a person crossing a street, with rights only equal to those of a railroad company. Here it was a passenger towards whom the railroad owed the highest diligence. While the defendant in error may have known that the regular stopping point at which to take on or put off passengers was on the opposite side of Belvidere street, the evidence was ample to show that by custom, well known to plaintiff in error, its cars had been stopping on the east side of Belvidere street, at which point passengers constantly got off. The jury, therefore, was well warranted in finding that the defendant in error was not guilty of negligence merely by the fact that she attempted to leave the car at that point after it had come to a full stop. It was the duty of the employees of the company to be on the alert to see that passengers seeking to alight from the car at that point were not put in peril by doing so, when, by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of these employees, danger to them might be averted. Whether these employees were negligent in the performance of these duties, as well as the question whether or not the defendant in error was guilty of negligence contributing with that of the plaintiff in error, and causing her injury, was a question of fact for the jury; and, these questions having been submitted fairly to them by the instructions given by the court, we cannot say that the verdict of the jury is without evidence or against the evidence.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.

SAVINGS BANK OF RICHMOND v. POWHATAN CLAY MFG. CO.

PLEADING — DEMURRER — LIMITATIONS — MECHANIC'S LIEN — SUIT TO ENFORCE.

1. Where a demurrer is not passed upon by the decree, it is to be considered as having been overruled.

2. Where a special limitation is prescribed by a statute creating a new right, the limitation may be taken advantage of by demurrer, unless the complaint shows affirmatively that the prescribed period has not elapsed.

3. Under section 2481, Code 1887, a suit to enforce a mechanic's lien must be brought within six months after the whole claim has become payable, and a bill will be demurrable which does not allege that this period has not elapsed.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Bill by the Powhatan Clay Manufacturing Company against the Southern Railway Company and others. From the judgment, the Savings Bank of Richmond appeals. Reversed.

A. W. Patterson, for appellant. W. O. Skelton, Wyndham B. Meredith, and Wm. Crump Tucker, for appellee.

KEITH, P. The Powhatan Clay Manufacturing Company filed its bill in the chancery court of the city of Richmond, to which it made the Southern Railway Company, the Savings Bank of Richmond, Chesterman, and Powers & Bro., parties defendant.

The Southern Railway Company had entered into an agreement with Chesterman, as general contractor, to build for it a brick depot. On the 1st of October, 1899, Powers & Bro., as subcontractors, agreed to do the brickwork on said building, and the Powhatan Clay Manufacturing Company agreed to furnish bricks, for which it claims there is a balance due to it of $1,115.78. The depot was completed in August, 1900, and on the 29th of September, 1900, the Powhatan Clay Manufacturing Company filed its claim in the clerk's office of the chancery court of the city of Richmond against the building and so much land therewith as is necessary for its convenient use and enjoyment—an account showing the amount and character of the material furnished, the price charged, and the balance due, verified by affidavit—and claimed a lien under chapter 110 of the Code of Virginia of 1887, and the acts amendatory thereof. This statement is sufficient to bring out the question to be discussed in this opinion.

The Savings Bank, one of the defendants, demurred to the bill because "it did not show when the amount covered by plaintiff's alleged lien became due and payable, nor allege that the suit had been brought within the six-months period prescribed by statute for filing same." The decree of the chancery court does not, in terms, pass upon the demurrer, and in such a case it is to be considered as having been overruled. Miller v. Black Rock Springs, 99 Va. 747, 40 S. E. 27, 86 Am. St. Rep. 924.

Section 2481 of the Code of 1887 is as follows:

"No suit to enforce any lien perfected under the preceding sections of this chapter shall be brought after six months from the time when the whole amount covered by such lien has become payable."

The lien which the Powhatan Clay Manufacturing Company sought to enforce in this suit is the creature of statute. It had no existence at common law, and was called into being by the "preceding sections" referred to in the section just quoted.

It was held in Hubble v. Poff, 98 Va. 646, 37 S. E. 277, that the statute of limitations cannot be taken advantage of in a court of equity by a demurrer to the bill; but that case dealt with a pure statute of limitations—one which affected the remedy only, and which did not touch the right. In a note to that case, to be found at page 558, vol. 6, of the Virginia Law Register, the distinction and the reasons for it are pointed out; and it is said that, where a "special limitation is prescribed by a statute creating a new right, the bill would seem to be demurrable, not only where it shows on its face the expiration of the prescribed period, but unless it shows affirmatively that the prescribed period has not elapsed."

In McCartney v. Tyrer, 94 Va. 203, 26 S. E. 421, the court, speaking of the mechanic's lien, says: "If, in the creation of the lien, time has been made of the essence of the right, and a condition of its existence and duration, it would be necessary to allege and prove that the suit was brought within six months from the time when the whole amount covered by the lien became payable. * * * The decision of this particular question, however, is unnecessary, as the defense of the statute of limitations has been disposed of on other principles." See, also, Manuel v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 99 Va. 188, 37 S. E. 957. The great weight of authority seems to sustain this position.

In Lambert v. Ensign Mfg. Co., 26 S. E. 431, the Supreme Court of West Virginia says: "It is true that a statute of limitations, pure and simple, must be relied upon by way of plea, because it is personal, and may be waived or its effects avoided by setting up matters in confession and avoidance. But," continued the court, "here the cause of action did not exist at common law, but is created by statute. The bringing of the suit within two years from the death of the person whose death has been caused by wrongful act is made an essential element of the right to sue, and it must be accepted in all respects as the statute gives it. And it is made absolute, without saving or qualification of any kind whatever. There is no opening for explanation or excuse. Therefore, strictly speaking, it is not a statute of limitation." This case is full authority for this. It holds that the question may be raised by demurrer to the bill, and that upon demurrer it is fatal.

In Hill v. Supervisors, 119 N. Y. 347, 23 N. E. 921, the court uses the following language: "It must be evident that as this action is brought under a special law, and is maintainable solely by its authority, the limitation of time is so incorporated with the remedy given as to make it an integral part of it, and the condition precedent to the maintenance of the action at all."

In Taylor v. Cranberry Iron & Coal Co., 94 N. C. 526, which was a suit brought to recover for the death of plaintiff's intestate, caused by the wrongful act of another, the court said: "This is not strictly a statute of limitation. It gives a right of action that would not otherwise exist, and the action to enforce it must be brought within one year after the death of the testator or intestate, else the right of action will be lost. It must be accepted in all respects as the statute gives it."

In Finnell v. Southern Kansas Ry. Co. (C.), 33 Fed. 428, the court said: "There is also another class of cases in which a cause of action which does not exist at common law is created by the laws of a state. Causes of action of that character only exist in the manner and form and for the length of time prescribed by the statutes of the state which created them."

In The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 199, 7 Sup. Ct. 140, 30 L. Ed. 358, speaking of a similar case, the court said: "The right must be taken subject to the limitations which have been made a part of its existence. It matters not that no rights of innocent parties have attached during the delay. Time has been made of the essence of the right, and the right is lost if the time is disregarded. The liability and the remedy are created by the same statutes, and the limitations of the remedy, therefore, are to be treated as limitations of the right."

As illustrating various aspects of the same question, see Ashbey v. Ashbey, 41 La. Ann. 102, 5 South. 539; Hudson v. Bishop (C. C.), 85 Fed. 820; Oochran v. Young, 104 Pa. 333; Bartlett v. Manor, 146 Ind. 627, 45 N. E. 1060; Smith v. Tripp, 14 R. I. 112; Anderson v. Hygeia Hotel Co., 92 Va. 687, 24 S. E. 269.

We are of opinion that the demurrer to the bill should have been sustained.

DOOLEY & BAYLESS v. CITY OF BRISTOL.

LICENSE—USE OF CITY STREETS—NONRESIDENTS.

1. An ordinance of a city provided for a license for vehicles carrying freight over the city streets, and a section of the ordinance provided that any person carrying on a business or profession for which a license is required without obtaining it should be fined. Held not to apply to merchants doing business out of the state, but delivering merchandise in teams to their customers in such city, and delivering merchandise sold by them and shipped out of the city to the railway stations located in such city.

Error to Corporation Court of Bristol.

Dooley & Bayless were convicted of violating an ordinance of the city of Bristol, and bring error. Reversed.

Peters & Lavinder, for plaintiffs in error.
S. V. Fulkerson, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The plaintiffs in error were arrested and fined by the city of Bristol for running a vehicle conveying freight over the streets of the city without a license.

The section of the city ordinance requiring such license is as follows:

"Sec. 78. The license tax for the privilege of running vehicles for conveying passengers or freight over the streets of Bristol shall be as follows: For every one-horse buggy, wagon, dray, cart, or hack, except such buggies and carriages as are kept for pleasure or family use and are not for hire, the license tax shall be two dollars; for every two horse vehicle other than an omnibus three dollars; for every two horse omnibus or hack the tax shall be four dollars; and for every four horse wagon the tax shall be four dollars."

The section relied on as authorizing a fine for its violation is section 80, which provides that "any person conducting a business, occupation or profession for the conduct of which a license is required under this ordinance, without first obtaining such license, shall not be fined less than five dollars nor more than twenty-five dollars for each offense."

Several grounds of error are assigned to the judgment complained of, but, in the view we take of the case, it is only necessary to consider one of them, as the decision of the other assignments of error, no matter how decided, would not affect the result.

The plaintiffs in error are furniture merchants and undertakers, doing business in the city of Bristol, Tenn., and are nonresidents of this state. In conducting their business they use their own wagon and team in delivering merchandise to their customers in Bristol, Va., and in delivering merchandise sold by them and shipped out of the city to the railway stations located in the city of Bristol, Va. They have no place of business in this state, and their wagon and team are kept in the state of Tennessee, except when engaged in the delivery of goods as above stated. It is not claimed that the defendant in error had imposed, or could impose, a license tax upon them for conducting their business as furniture merchants and undertakers in the state of Tennessee, but the contention is that it had the right to impose a license tax upon them for the use of its streets by their wagon and team in delivering goods sold by them.

Conceding, for the purposes of this case, that the city of Bristol is authorized by its charter to impose a license tax upon persons hauling freight or passengers over its streets, and that section 78 of its ordinance does impose such tax, no penalty is provided for its violation unless the person charged with such violation is engaged in some business, occupation, or profession for the conduct of which a license is required by the defendant in error. The plaintiffs in error, not being engaged in any business or occupation for the conduct of which the defendant in error has imposed upon them a license tax, do not come within the provisions of section 80; and as that is the only section authorizing a fine to be imposed upon persons using the streets of the defendant city in violation of the provisions of section 78, the judgment complained of was unauthorized, and should have been set aside by the corporation court, and the warrant dismissed.

This court will enter such judgment as the corporation court ought to have entered.

WASHINGTON NAT. BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. WENDLING.

USURY—APPLICATION OF PAYMENT TO INTEREST—RECOVERY.

1. Where a payment by the borrower is applied to usurious interest, it cannot be recovered after the expiration of one year from the date of the payment.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Alexandria.

Action by George R. Wendling against the Washington National Building & Loan Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Norton & Boothe, for plaintiff in error.
John M. Johnson, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. In January, 1894, the defendant in error, George R. Wendling, borrowed from the plaintiff in error building association, the sum of $3,000, which he secured by the surrender of 30 shares of stock held by him in the association, and by executing a bond in the penalty of $6,000, conditioned to pay $48 per month on such loan, and such fines as might be imposed upon him in accordance with the by-laws of the association. The $48 payable monthly was composed of $18 per month dues and $30 per month premium. These monthly installments were to be paid for 84 consecutive months, if necessary to fully pay up the 30 shares of stock that had been redeemed, but, if not paid up by the end of that period, no further payment on account of stock or premiums was to be exacted; and from the termination of the 84 months only 6 per cent. per annum on the original amount loaned was to be paid in monthly installments until the stock was matured.

The defendant in error lived up to this contract, and paid the monthly installments, of $48 each, regularly, from January 1, 1894, until December 31, 1900. These payments were credited on the books of the company, as made, in accordance with the charter and by-laws of the association, which formed a part of the agreement of the parties. The defendant in error, desiring to withdraw from the association, called for a statement of the balance due from him on account of his $3,000 loan, and on June 3, 1901, discharged that balance, which appeared from the statement made by the association to be $1,094.78. Before the expiration of a year from the time of its payment, the defendant in error brought an action at law to recover back this $1,094.78, upon the ground that the transaction was usurious.

There was no material conflict in the evidence, and the usury was admitted. The only question to be determined was the amount of recovery, if any, the defendant in error was entitled to.

The plaintiff in error asked for three instructions, which were rejected, and in lieu thereof one given by the court which authorized a restatement of accounts between the parties, from the beginning of the transaction, and a recovery by the defendant in error of all payments in excess of the original loan and legal interest thereon. Under this instruction the jury returned a verdict for $1,094.78, the whole of the last payment made, which the lower court refused to set aside.

The statute law of this state relating to the subject of usury, and the decisions bearing thereon, have been fully reviewed and considered by this court in the case of Munford v. McVeigh, 92 Va. 446, 23 S. E. 857; and it is there held that "where payments have been made upon a debt upon which a greater rate of interest than that allowed by law is reserved in the contract, or received in order to secure the forbearance of the lender, and the borrower himself applies the payment to the interest, or the lender so applies it with the assent of the borrower, the appropriation so made will not be disturbed, unless within one year thereafter a suit be instituted by the borrower for its recovery, or a suit be brought by the lender within that period, in which case the borrower may set it off against the demand for which he is sued." This doctrine is again reiterated, as the settled law of this state, in the case of Crab- tree v. Building Association, 95 Va. 670, 29 S. E. 741, 64 Am. St. Rep. 818. This last-mentioned case is in every material particular like that under consideration, and is controlling authority in its determination.

Under the law as established by these authorities, each monthly installment paid by the defendant in error must be dealt with as a separate and independent transaction. If, after the first installment was paid, and applied in accordance with the agreement of the parties, one year elapsed without its legality being attacked, that transaction became final, and it could not thereafter be disturbed. And so with the payment of each succeeding installment. It was forever at rest whenever the one year had passed without its legality being questioned. All of these monthly installments having been made and applied in accordance with the agreement of the parties, and no suit having been brought until after the expiration of one year from the date of the last monthly payment, those transactions were finally closed, and could not be disturbed. The only open question left was the usury, if any, in the payment of the $1,094.78 on the 3d day of June, 1901.

We are of opinion that the instruction given by the court embodied a misapprehension of the law, and should not have been given. We are further of opinion that the three instructions asked for by the plaintiff in error correctly stated the law of the case, and should have been given, as asked, after correcting the typographical error in the last date mentioned in instruction No. 2.

For these reasons, the judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial in accordance with this opinion.

WICKS et al. v. SCULL.

JUDGMENTS — DOCKETING — LAND IN SUBSEQUENTLY INCORPORATED CITY — QUIETING TITLE.

1. Under section 8570, Code 1887, if a judgment is docketed in the county where real estate of the debtor is situated more than 20 days after its rendition, and such real estate is included in the corporate limits of a subsequently incorporated city, in order to be a lien as against a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, the judgment must be docketed in the clerk's office of the corporation court of the city 15 days before the conveyance to him.

2. A judgment, the validity of the lien of which depends upon the question of actual notice to a purchaser, constitutes a cloud on his title, for the removal of which he may maintain a bill in equity.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Newport News.

¶ 2. See Quieting Title, vol. 41, Cent. Dig. §§ 14, 37.

Bill by Allan Scull against D. R. Wicks and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John W. Friend and C. Aylett Ashby, for appellants. Jones & Woodward, E. S. Robinson, and A. C. Garrett, for appellee.

KEITH, P. This is a suit in equity, from the record in which it appears that the Old Dominion Land Company conveyed lot 64 in block 101 in the city of Newport News to Enoch Clayton by deed dated March 29, 1899; that Clayton conveyed the same lot to James and Allan Scull by deed dated April 6, 1899; and that on the 18th of November, 1899, James Scull conveyed his interest in this property, by deed, to Allan Scull.

On the 2d of December, 1872, D. R. Wicks recovered in the circuit court of the city of Richmond a judgment against Enoch Clayton for $1,000. Upon this judgment executions were issued on the 23d day of April, 1873, on the 15th of February, 1893, May 9, 1893, and April 3, 1894. On the 13th of March, 1892, this judgment was docketed in the county court of Warwick county.

On the 20th of May, 1901, Allan Scull filed his bill in the corporation court of Newport News, to which he makes D. R. Wicks, James C. Scull and Prudence Scull (his wife), and Enoch Clayton parties defendant, and in which he avers that the judgment recovered against Enoch Clayton constitutes a cloud upon the title to the real estate which he purchased from Clayton, that said judgment has long since been paid, and that it is barred by the statute of limitations, and prays that the court will cause said judgment to be marked "Satisfied." Wicks, the judgment creditor, filed an answer, in which he asserts that his judgment constitutes a lien upon the real estate in the bill mentioned; prays that his answer may be taken as a cross-bill, and that the lien of his judgment may be enforced. Allan Scull, in his answer to this cross-bill, reiterates his pleas of payment and the statute of limitations; claims that he was a purchaser for value, and without notice of the judgment, and that it does not constitute a lien upon his real estate.

By an act approved January 16, 1896 (Acts 1895-96, p. 74, c. 64), the city of Newport News was incorporated, and was declared to embrace certain territory which had theretofore constituted a part of Warwick county; and it further appears that the lot in controversy lies within the corporate limits of the city of Newport News.

On the 9th of December, 1899, Enoch Clayton filed a petition in bankruptcy in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, and, from the schedule thereto annexed, it appears that he had at that time no property of any kind, and the only debt which he reports is this judgment for $1,000 recovered against him in the city of Richmond by D. R. Wicks.

These being the facts, the corporation court of the city of Newport News, being of opinion that the judgment was not barred by the statute of limitations, and that James and Allan Scull were purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice of the said judgment, the same never having been docketed in the clerk's office of the corporation court of the corporation wherein the land mentioned was at the time of its purchase by the said Allan and James Scull, decreed that the plaintiff in the original bill should hold said land free and clear from said judgment. In this decree there is no error.

The judgment had been kept alive by the executions issued upon it. There is no satisfactory evidence of its payment, and the petition in bankruptcy filed by the judgment debtor is an admission that it had never been paid. There is no evidence bringing home actual notice of the existence of this judgment to Allan Scull, and it is plain that, under the circumstances of this case, this judgment, rendered in 1872 by the circuit court of the city of Richmond, and docketed in Warwick county in 1892, does not operate as constructive notice to Allan Scull, who purchased the lot in question in 1899. The city of Newport News, within the limits of which this lot is embraced, was incorporated in January, 1896. Section 3570 of the Code of 1887 is as follows:

"No judgment shall be a lien on real estate as against a purchaser thereof for valuable consideration without notice, unless it be docketed according to the provisions of this chapter in the county or corporation wherein such real estate is, either within twenty days after the date of such judgment or fifteen days before the conveyance of such real estate to such purchaser."

Allan Scull was a purchaser for a valuable consideration. There is no evidence of actual notice to him of the existence of this judgment, and it was not docketed in the corporation of Newport News within 20 days after its date, nor 15 days before the conveyance to him of the real estate upon which it is now claimed to be a lien. Between January 16, 1896, when the city of Newport News was incorporated, and the 6th day of April, 1899, when this lot was purchased from Clayton by James and Allan Scull, D. R. Wicks, the judgment creditor, had ample time within which to have docketed this judgment in the clerk's office of the corporation court of Newport News.

It is very earnestly insisted by counsel for appellant that the decree is erroneous, because, if the judgment is not a lien upon the property of Allan Scull, it did not constitute a cloud upon the title, and the equitable jurisdiction to remove that cloud, which had been invoked by appellee, did not exist. Wicks had obtained a judgment in the circuit court of the city of Richmond, which, until it was paid, or barred by the statute of limitations, or had in some way lost its validity, constituted a lien upon the real estate of the judgment debtor. It was always competent to show, in a suit upon the judgment, that it had been paid, or that it was barred by the statute of limitations, or that for any legal cause it had lost its force as a lien—as, for instance, that the estate of the original debtor had passed into the hands of a purchaser for value and without notice; but in all these cases the facts relied upon to extinguish the judgment, or to exonerate the property from the operation of the lien thereof, might be matters of controversy. The judgment would serve, therefore, to constitute a cloud upon the title, which might deter purchasers and impair the market value of the property. Where the incumbrance or defect in the title is real, and not merely apparent, it cannot be removed, except by satisfying the incumbrance or supplying the defect, but the case before us belongs to that class where the statute gives to the judgment a prima facie validity. It cannot be said that the claim that the judgment in question constituted a lien upon the land was on its face absolutely without foundation, and that no extrinsic evidence was necessary to show its invalidity, or, to speak more accurately, that extrinsic evidence might not have shown its validity and binding force. On the contrary, here is a judgment which was a lien upon the land in the hands of Allan and James Scull, if they took it with notice of the existence of the judgment; that is to say, unless they were purchasers for value and without notice. Upon the proof of notice by extrinsic testimony depended the entire controversy. If the party claiming under the judgment could have proved notice upon them, the land could be subjected in their hands; and, as long as such an issue could be made, the result of which depended upon extrinsic evidence, so long would that judgment constitute a cloud which would have been a serious injury to plaintiff's title, and greatly deprecate its value. See 3 Pomeroy's Equity (2d Ed.) § 1899.

The decree is affirmed.

HOUSE v. HOUSE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 14, 1904.)

DIVORCE—EVIDENCE—CRUELTY OF WIFE.

1. In an action for divorce brought by a husband on the ground that he had reasonable ground to fear serious bodily hurt from the hands of his wife, evidence of witnesses that, from their knowledge of the character of the wife, they did not believe the husband could safely live with her, was inadmissible, as opinion evidence.

2. Evidence held insufficient to authorize divorce of husband for cruelty of the wife.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Russell County.

Bill by one House against one House, his wife, for divorce. Decree for plaintiff for divorce, and for wife for alimony, and plaintiff appeals from that portion of the decree granting alimony. Decree reversed and bill dismissed.

Finney & Gilmer and J. C. Gent, for appellant. Routh & Routh, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. The appellant filed his bill against his wife (the appellee) to obtain a divorce from bed and board upon the ground that she had attempted to take his life, and he had reasonable ground to fear serious bodily hurt. His wife filed an answer, in which she denied the material charges in the bill, and also filed her cross-bill, in which she charged cruelty and abandonment on the part of her husband, and prayed for alimony. The appellant answered the cross-bill, denying its allegations. Proof was taken by both parties, and upon a hearing of the cause the court was of opinion that the husband had shown himself entitled to a divorce from bed and board, and that the wife was entitled to alimony, and so decreed. From that decree the husband obtained this appeal upon the ground that the court erred in granting alimony to the wife, and seeks to have that portion of the decree reversed.

The wife, under rule 9 (45 S. E. vi), assigns as cross-error that the court erred in rendering a decree of separation from bed and board, and asks to have the decree, to that extent, reversed.

The husband attempted, in part, to sustain the allegations of his bill by introducing witnesses who knew little or nothing about the conduct of the parties toward each other. These witnesses testified, from their knowledge of the character or reputation of the parties, that they did not believe that the husband could with safety cohabit with his wife.

Such evidence is not admissible. The general rule is that witnesses must state facts, not opinions. In order to entitle the husband to a divorce, it was necessary for him to prove facts from which the court could determine or legally infer that the fact in issue had been established. Whether or not the husband was in danger of bodily injury from his wife was a question for the court, upon all the facts proved. 2 Bish. on M. & D. § 769; Richards v. Richards, 37 Pa. 225.

The evidence introduced by both parties is of the most unsatisfactory character. The witnesses who lived in the home, and had the best opportunities to know how the husband and wife conducted themselves toward each other, appear from their own testimony and from that of other witnesses to be entitled to little credence. The other witnesses testify to little that is material to the issues involved. No good purpose could be subserved by discussing the evidence at length.

It appears that the parties, who had been married for ten years or more, had for two or three years before the institution of this suit lived very unhappily. Both parties, as one of the husband's witnesses testifies, and as is apparent from the record, were in fault—the wife, however, much more than the husband. The evidence shows that she is a woman of violent temper and quarrelsome disposition; that occasionally, in fits of passion, she had threatened to take the husband's life, and had once or twice slapped him in the face with her hand. But it does not show satisfactorily that she had attempted or really intended to do her husband bodily harm, or that he had reasonable ground to apprehend danger of life, limb, or health. Though the complaint of cruelty or fear of bodily harm usually comes from the wife, yet the husband is entitled to protection if he really needs it. 2 Minor's Insts. 281, 282, and cases cited. But in either case the charge should be clearly proved, for marriage is a contract formed with a view not only to the benefit of the parties themselves, but for the benefit of their offspring and the moral order of society, and should not be dissolved in whole or in part unless the ground for it is satisfactorily made out. 2 Bish. M. & D. § 762.

Neither does the evidence sustain the wife's claim for alimony. She was more to blame than the husband for the unhappy manner in which they lived. She provoked by her misconduct the alleged mistreatment upon which she relies for alimony. To give her alimony under the facts of this case would be to reward her for her own wrongdoing. It may be that the parties cannot live happily together, but that is no sufficient reason for granting to either the relief sought.

"The law," as was said by Sir William Scott in Evans v. Evans, 1 Hagg. Cons. R. 35, and quoted with approval in Latham v. Latham, 30 Grat. 307, 321, 328, "has said that married persons shall not be legally separated upon the mere disinclination of one or both to cohabit together. When people understand that they must live together, except for a few reasons known to the law, they learn to soften by mutual accommodation that yoke which they know they cannot shake off. They become good husbands and good wives from the necessity of remaining husbands and wives, for necessity is a powerful master in teaching duties which it imposes." Again he says the suffering party "must bear in some degree the consequences of an injudicious connection; must subdue by decent resistance or prudent conciliation; and, if this cannot be done, must suffer in silence. And if it is complained that by this inactivity of the courts much injustice may be suffered and much misery produced, the answer is that courts of justice do not pretend to furnish cures for all the miseries of human life."

We are of opinion that neither party is entitled to the relief sought, and that the decree complained of must be reversed and the bill dismissed.

TOMPKINS v. DYERLE et al.

JUDICIAL SALES—APPLICATION OF PURCHASE MONEY—RESALE—BOND OF COMMISSIONER.

1. The purchaser of land at a judicial sale made by a special commissioner is, under the direct provisions of sections 3398-3402 of Code of 1887 protected in making payment to such special commissioner if the latter has actually given the bond required by law, or has appended to his advertisement of sale the clerk's certificate that such bond has been given. If this certificate is not appended, he is put upon inquiry as to the authority of the special commissioner.

2. A special commissioner to sell lands does not have a right to resell the land without giving bond to cover such resale, unless his first bond was sufficiently broad for that purpose.

Cardwell and Harrison, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Montgomery County.

Action by one Tompkins, receiver, against A. J. Dyerle and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. A. Phlegar, for appellant. R. E. Scott and W. W. Moffett, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. At the May term, 1884, of the circuit court for Montgomery county, a decree was entered in the case of Northcross v. Davis' Heirs, directing James C. Taylor and George G. Junkin, who were appointed commissioners for the purpose, to sell certain real estate, and providing that either or both of them might act, but before doing so they should execute bond in the penalty of $500, conditioned as the law directs. They advertised the land directed to be sold, appending to their advertisement of sale the clerk's certificate that the bond required had been given. One parcel of the land was purchased by George T. Gross, who paid the cash payment required and executed bonds for the deferred payments, with A. T. Gross and A. J. Dyerle as his sureties. This sale, with another made under that advertisement, was reported to and confirmed by the court at its November term, 1884. At the same term of the court George G. Junkin, one of the commissioners to sell, was appointed receiver to collect all sale and rent bonds due under the proceedings in that cause, and was required to give bond in the penalty of $10,000. The receiver failed to give bond.

At the May term, 1887, of the court, the receiver reported to the court that Gross was in default in the payment of the purchase money due from him, and that notices had been served upon him and his sureties for a resale of the land purchased by him. At the same term of the court a decree was entered, directing George G. Junkin, as commissioner, to resell the Gross land at the risk and charges of Gross and his sureties, on the terms of one-fourth cash and the residue on a credit of 6, 12, and 18 months, after advertising as required by the original decree for sale. That decree did not require Junkin to give bond before selling.

The land was advertised and sold by Junkin, as commissioner, and A. J. Dyerle, one of the sureties on Gross' purchase-money bonds, and John H. Northcross, became the purchasers, paid the cash payment, and for the residue executed bonds with sureties. This sale was reported to the court, and confirmed at its November term, 1887. No order was made for the collection of those bonds until the May term, 1895, of the court, when the appellant was appointed receiver and directed to collect them. It subsequently appeared that the said Junkin had, before the appellant's appointment as receiver, collected from Dyerle and Northcross the whole of the purchase money due from them, and had failed to account for a large part thereof to the parties entitled.

After various proceedings had, which it is unnecessary here to state, the court held that the payments made by Dyerle and Northcross to Junkin were valid payments, and discharged them and the land purchased by them from further liability to the extent of such payments. From that decree this appeal was granted upon the petition of the receiver.

Two errors are assigned, but they both raise the same question, and that is the propriety of the court's action in holding that the payments to Junkin by Dyerle and Northcross were valid payments.

Unless the appellees come within the provisions of the act of February 25, 1884 (Acts 1883-84, pp. 213, 214, c. 164), now found in chapter 167 of the Code of 1887 (sections 3398 to 3402, inclusive), their payments to Junkin, who had no authority, either as commissioner or as receiver, to collect the purchase-money bonds due from them, were clearly invalid. That act was construed in part by this court in Pulliam v. Tompkins, 99 Va. 602, 604, 605, 39 S. E. 221—a controversy growing out of the same case as does this appeal. The first section of the act provides that no special commissioner appointed by a court to make sale of land shall execute the decree until he shall have given bond in such penalty as the court shall fix, with security to be approved by the court or clerk thereof; and that no such commissioner shall advertise the sale of land without first obtaining from said clerk a certificate that the bond required by law or by the decree has been executed, and appending such certificate or a copy thereof to the advertisement. The second section provides that when such certificate has been published with an advertisement of sale, any person purchasing such land in pursuance of such advertisement shall be relieved from all liability for the purchase money, or any part thereof, which he may pay to any special commissioner, as to whom proper certificate shall have been appended to such advertisement. The fifth section provides that the commissioner or commissioners appointed to make the sale shall receive and collect all the purchase money unless by decree of court some other person is appointed to collect the same, in which event the clerk is required to issue notice of such appointment to the purchaser, to be served as other notices are served, provided that, if any payment is made to a special commissioner making the sale before the purchaser has notice of the appointment of another person, such special commissioner and his sureties shall be responsible for the money so paid and the purchaser shall not be responsible therefor.

In order for a purchaser of land sold by a commissioner of court under a decree which directed the sale to be advertised to bring himself within the provisions of that act so as to be protected from paying a second time where he has paid his purchase money to a person not empowered to receive it, and who has failed properly to account for it, he must show that there was appended to the advertisement of the sale at which he purchased the certificate of the clerk showing that the bond required by law or the decree of the court had been given. No bond was required by the decree directing the resale. Whether this was because the court was of opinion that the bond required by the decree of the May term, 1884, appointing Taylor and Junkin or either of them to sell, was sufficient to authorize a resale by Junkin, commissioner, or that the bond he was required to give as receiver to collect would protect all parties on the resale, or the not requiring a bond was a mere oversight of the court, is not material. The fact that no certificate was appended to the advertisement of the sale at which Dyerle and Northcross purchased ought to have, and in contemplation of law did, put them on inquiry as to the authority of Junkin to collect the purchase-money bonds executed by them. The act of February 25, 1884, was not intended to protect, and does not protect, purchasers of lands at judicial sales in their payments of purchase money to persons not authorized to receive it, and who fail properly to account for it, unless the facts exist upon which this protection is by the act made to depend.

The fact that the sale at which Dyerle and Northcross purchased was a resale does not protect them. The language of the act applies to all judicial sales made by special commissioners appointed by decree or order of court to sell land. It is just as important that the parties in interest should be protected by a proper bond on a resale as on an original sale. In saying this, however, it is not to be understood that the court may not require the special commissioner appointed to make the original sale to give bond sufficiently broad to cover not only the original sale but any resale made by him. This is the practice in some of the circuits of the state. If such bond be required and given under the original decree of sale, there would be no difficulty in the clerk making the required certificate and in the special commissioner appending it to his advertisement of resale.

The appellees' counsel insist that, if Dyerle had paid the purchase-money bonds of Gross, upon which he was surety, to Junkin, commissioner, without a resale of the land, the payment would have been valid, under the decision in Pulliam v. Tompkins, Receiver, supra, and that, as the resale at which the appellees purchased was to collect the same debt, its payment after the resale must also be valid, since the said commissioner was expressly authorized to "receive and collect."

Conceding that, if Dyerle had paid his principal's debt to Junkin, commissioner, without a resale, his payment would have been valid, it by no means follows that a payment of the resale purchase-money bonds by the appellees to Junkin, commissioner, was valid. One of the vices of the appellees' contention is that Junkin, commissioner, was authorized to "receive and collect" purchase-money bonds given by Gross, and upon which Dyerle was surety. Junkin was not authorized to receive and collect either the purchase-money bonds given at the original sale or those given at the resale. By the terms of section 5 of the act of February 25, 1884, the commissioner to sell is authorized to receive and collect all the purchase money, unless by decree or order some other person be appointed to collect the same, in which case the court shall require of such person bond in such penalty as it may see fit. In this case Taylor and Junkin, commissioners, had no authority to "receive and collect" the purchase-money bonds for the land sold by them, because the court at the very term at which it confirmed the sales made by them appointed Junkin receiver to collect those bonds. After the decree was entered appointing Junkin receiver, neither Taylor and Junkin, as commissioners, nor either of them, had any authority as such to receive and collect said bonds. The decision in Pulliam v. Tompkins, receiver, was not based upon the ground that Junkin, commissioner, had any authority or right to collect the Barnett bonds, but upon the grounds that the certificate of the clerk that bond had been given as required by law was appended to the advertisement of the sale at which Barnett, Pulliam's vendor, had purchased, that the purchase price was paid to one of the special commissioners who made the sale, and that neither Barnett nor Pulliam had notice that Junkin had been appointed receiver to collect the purchase money. The purchaser of land at a judicial sale made by a special commissioner, whether it be an original sale or a resale, must ascertain, before paying the purchase money to such special commissioner, either that the special commissioner has actually given the bond required by law or that he appended to his advertisement of sale the clerk's certificate that such bond had been given. If the purchaser can show that either of these facts exist, then he is fully protected in paying to such special commissioner until he has notice that some other person has been appointed to collect on the same.

Again, this contention proves too much. If it were true that a special commissioner to sell has the right to resell the land without giving bond to cover such resale, because he has authority to "receive and collect" the original purchase price, it would follow that if at the resale the land did not bring a sufficient sum to pay the original purchase price, and it became necessary to get judgment for the deficiency, and to sell other lands of the purchaser or his sureties to pay such deficiency, the special commissioner could sell that land and collect the purchase price without giving a new bond, and thus bind his sureties on the original bond for any default which he might make. In addition, notwithstanding Dyerle's denial that he had notice that Junkin had been appointed receiver, it quite clearly appears from the record that he must have known that Junkin, commissioner, was not authorized to receive and collect the money due from him, either as surety for Gross or as purchaser of the land when resold. The decree which appointed Junkin receiver removed Dyerle as receiver in the cause, gave a personal judgment in favor of Junkin, the new receiver, against Dyerle, and directed him to turn over all rent bonds in his hands, or proceeds thereof, to Junkin, the new receiver. By the report of Commissioner Harless settling the account of Junkin as commissioner and receiver it appears that Dyerle, receiver, obtained credit as of May 11, 1886, for $128.94 paid or turned over to Junkin, receiver, under the decree removing the one and appointing the other receiver. But, whether he had notice or not, neither he nor his co-purchaser, Northcross, was justified in paying their purchase-money bonds to the said Junkin, nor are they entitled to credit therefor on the purchase price of their land, further than the money so paid was properly accounted for by him.

The decree appealed from must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had in accordance with law, and not in conflict with this opinion.

CARDWELL, J. I cannot concur in the conclusion reached by a majority of the court in this case. From my understanding of the record the learned judge who entered the decree under review was plainly right in the view stated in his written opinion, made a part of the record, that the fact that Dyerle, who was a surety for Gross, paid the amounts that he paid after a resale of the land instead of before did not exclude him from the benefit of the principle announced by this court in Pulliam v. Tompkins, Receiver, 99 Va. 602, 39 S. E. 221.

The bond executed by Taylor and Junkin, commissioners, pursuant to the decree of the May term, 1884, authorizing either of them to act upon the giving of the bond, omitting the formal part and the signatures and seals thereto, is as follows:

"The condition of the above obligation is, whereas the above bound James O. Taylor and Geo. G. Junkin, hath been appointed commissioners of Montgomery Circuit Court to sell land in suit of E. P. Northcross v. W. H. Davis' heirs:

"Now, if the said J. C. Taylor and Geo. G. Junkin shall faithfully discharge the duties of their office or trust as commissioners as aforesaid, then the above obligation is to be void, else to remain in full force and virtue."

Upon the execution of the bond and the attachment to their advertisement of the sale of the land the required certificate of the clerk that the bond had been given, Taylor and Junkin, or either of them, were authorized to receive all the purchase money for the land sold until by decree in the cause some other person was appointed to collect the same, and notice of such appointment served upon the purchaser as required by the statute; the statute expressly providing that, if any payment be made to a special commissioner making the sale before the purchaser has notice of the appointment of another person to collect it, such special commissioner and his sureties shall be responsible for the money so paid, and the purchaser shall not be responsible therefor. Acts 1883-84, p. 213, c. 164.

At the sale by Taylor and Junkin, commissioners, pursuant to the decree of the May term, 1884, one of the parcels of land sold was purchased by J. W. Barnett, who made his cash payment and executed his bond for the three deferred payments. The decree of the May term, 1887, recognized P. B. Pulliam as substituted purchaser of part of the land bought by Barnett, and directed Junkin, as commissioner, to unite with Barnett and wife in a deed to Pulliam. Pursuant to this decree, Junkin, commissioner, and Barnett and wife conveyed the land to Pulliam, reserving to Junkin, as receiver, a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money. The entire purchase price of the land was paid by Barnett and Pulliam, the cash payment to Taylor and Junkin and the deferred payments to Junkin.

In Pulliam v. Tompkins, Receiver, supra, in which it was sought to have Pulliam repay so much of the purchase money for the land he bought through Barnett as was necessary to make up for the default of Junkin in not accounting for the money received of Pulliam and others, the court, reviewing the act of February 25, 1884 (Acts 1883-84, p. 213, c. 164), entitled "An act to provide for the protection of purchasers at, and other persons in, judicial sales," held that, as the sale by Taylor and Junkin, commissioners, under the decree of the May term, 1884, was after the passage of the act of February 25, 1884, supra, and the required copy of the certificate from the clerk appended to and published with the advertisement of their sale of the lands, and the purchase price of the land bought by Barnett, subsequently transferred to Pulliam, having been paid in full by Barnett and Pulliam to one of the special commissioners who had made the sale, and the payments made without notice of another person having been appointed to collect them, Pulliam was relieved from all liability; "otherwise," says the opinion, "the law which was intended for his protection would be converted into a trap for his destruction." In other words, the opinion in that case, after reviewing the statute, holds that Commissioners Taylor and Junkin, having complied with the statute as to the bond required of them, and appended to their advertisement of the sale of the land by them a copy of the certificate of the clerk that the bond had been given, they were authorized to receive the whole purchase money until the purchaser was notified, as the statute required, that some other person had been appointed by the court to collect it; and that a payment to these commissioners, or either of them, by a purchaser, without such notice, was a valid payment, and absolved him from further liability therefor.

It will be observed, therefore, that the only features in the case at bar differentiating it, if at all, from that just quoted from, are (1) the decree of the resale of the Gross land as a means of collecting the purchase money due by Gross and his sureties therefor, remaining unpaid, one of the sureties being Dyerle, appellee here; and (2) the provision in the decree of the November term, 1884, removing Dyerle as receiver in the cause, charged only with the duty of collecting certain rents, and requiring him to turn over to Junkin, appointed receiver to collect both rent and purchase-money bonds, the rent and money bonds then in the hands of Dyerle.

The statute, now section 3398 of the Code of 1887, is: "No special commissioner appointed by decree or order of court, or of a judge in vacation, to sell or rent any property, shall advertise the property for sale or renting, or sell or rent the same until he has given bond," etc.; and the decree of the May term, 1887, does not appoint a special commissioner to sell the Gross land, but merely directs Junkin, as commissioner appointed by the decree of the May term, 1884, and authorized to collect all of the purchase money for lands sold under that decree until some one else was appointed to collect it and notice of the appointment of such person served on the purchasers, to resell the Gross land for the unpaid purchase money due for it, and "at the risk and charges of Gross and his sureties," who were liable for the unpaid purchase-money bonds given for the deferred payments at the original sale. The payment of the purchase money at this resale, evidenced as to the deferred payments by three bonds, not payable to Junkin as receiver, but as "commissioner of the circuit court of Montgomery county in the suit of Northcross v. Davis' Heirs," was but a payment of the purchase-money bonds due on the original sale of this land, which Junkin, commissioner, was undoubtedly authorized to collect; it not being pretended that Dyerle, who was bound as surety therefor, had been served with the required notice of the appointment of Junkin as receiver in the cause. As said by the learned judge below, if Dyerle had paid the bonds to Junkin, upon which he was bound as surety for Gross, before the resale, such payment would have been good. Pulliam v. Tompkins, Receiver, supra.

It has not been the practice in this state, so far as I am advised, to require a commissioner already appointed and qualified to receive the whole of the purchase money for land sold in a cause, to give a bond before proceeding to execute a decree merely directing him to resell the land for the unpaid purchase money due therefor, and only as a means of collecting it. The learned judge who entered the decree of the May term, 1887, of long experience on the bench, considered it unnecessary to require a new bond of Commissioner Junkin, who was thereby directed to resell the Gross land.

How it can be said in the opinion of the court that payments made to Junkin, commissioner, by Dyerle, before notice to him, as required by the statute, of Junkin's appointment as receiver in the cause, were not valid payments absolving Dyerle from further liability therefor, when payments made to Junkin by Pulliam under the same circumstances were held in Pulliam v. Tompkins, Receiver, supra, to be valid payments absolving Pulliam from further liability therefor, I am wholly unable to comprehend. Nor can I agree that because the decree of the November term, 1884, appointing Junkin receiver to "collect all rent and sale bonds due under the proceedings in this court," removed Dyerle as receiver to collect the rents only from the lands under the control of the court before their sale, and required him to turn over to Junkin the rent and rent bonds then in his hands, this case is differentiated from that of Pulliam v. Tompkins, Receiver, supra, when in the last-named case the deed to Pulliam from Junkin and others, as we have seen, reserved to Junkin, as receiver, a vendor's lien on the land conveyed for unpaid purchase money, which was afterwards paid to Junkin as commissioner, and held by this court to be valid payments, notwithstanding Junkin never gave the bond required of him as receiver; the decision absolving Pulliam from liability to repay the same resting on the ground that Pulliam was protected by the provisions of the statute of February 25, 1884, supra.

The object of the statute was to protect purchasers at judicial sales from the hardship to which they had been so often subjected of having to pay their purchase money twice. It was the purpose of the Legislature, clearly expressed in the statute, to avoid such injustice by laying down the only terms upon which a purchaser should be held to pay again his purchase money. If the express provisions of the statute may be avoided, because of a decree of resale of land as a means of collecting unpaid purchase money due therefor, or because of inferences drawn from an old decree in the case, that Dyerle, who was a surety for the unpaid purchase money for the land resold, must have known that Junkin had been appointed a receiver to collect the unpaid purchase money for the lands sold under the decree of the May term, 1884, and required to give a bond as such receiver, or because Commissioner Junkin gave no bond as the commissioner to resell the Gross land, none being required of him by the decree of resale, then the door is thrown open, and not only the letter, but the entire spirit, of the statute may be rendered nugatory; and it would be better for the purchaser if the statute had not been enacted, for it is thus made to operate as a snare, rendering it necessary for the purchasers to examine records and decrees (as of old), and determine for themselves, at their peril, whether or not they can safely pay.

CARSON LIME CO. v. RUTHERFORD'S ADM'R.

NEGLIGENCE—PRIVATE BRIDGE—UNSAFE CONDITION—INVITATION TO USE.

1. Defendant erected a private bridge on its own land for its own use, placed gates at either end, and posted a notice forbidding persons to enter thereon without permission. When these gates were broken open or the sign torn down, defendant replaced them. For 18 months prior to the collapse of the bridge, it had been disused, except for foot passengers and empty vehicles, and then only used by defendant's employes. Defendant, having sold some goods, arranged with its vendee to have them hauled by another route, and the vendee's teamsters were so instructed both by the vendee and by defendant's manager. There was evidence that an employe of defendant, who had no authority in the premises, had failed to object when told that the teamsters were about to use the bridge, but this he denied. After the teams had entered on the bridge, it collapsed, and one teamster, a youth of 15, was killed. Held, that defendant was not liable; there being no invitation, express or implied, to the teamster to use the bridge.

Error to Circuit Court, Warren County.

Action by James Rutherford, as administrator of the estate of Joseph Rutherford, deceased, against the Carson Lime Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. E. Byrd and C. W. Forsyth, for plaintiff in error. Downing & Richards, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. This action was brought by James Rutherford, personal representative of his son Joseph Rutherford, deceased, against the Carson Lime Company, a corporation, to recover damages for the death of the deceased, caused, as alleged, by the negligence of the defendant company. There was a verdict in the lower court in favor of the plaintiff for $1,750, and a judgment thereon, to which judgment a writ of error was awarded by a judge of this court.

The demurrer to the declaration was not insisted on in the argument here, and the error assigned to the ruling of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial because of the insufficiency of the evidence to establish negligence on the part of the defendant company is mainly relied upon for a reversal of the judgment.

In our view of the case, that is the only question that requires consideration. The Carson Lime Company, plaintiff in error, was at the time of the accident engaged at Riverton, Warren county, in the manufacture of and sale of lime for building and agricultural purposes. For many years the entire works of the company were situated on the northern bank of the Shenandoah river, and some years ago the company bought a tract of land, known as the "Marshall Tract," which is opposite and across the Shenandoah river from the main works, and on the south side of the river. Upon this tract the plaintiff in error erected a stavemill, and later a kiln; and, as a means of approach to these premises, it constructed a private road, leading from the Southern Railway at Riverton Junction, to the stavemill and limekiln, or near thereto, and at a point where this road crossed Happy creek, which flows between the kiln and the stavemill and the tracks of the Southern Railway, and, as a part of this private road, built over the creek a wooden bridge 169 feet in length, and about the height of 35 feet from the bed of the stream. There was also a switch connecting the railroad track with the stavemill and kiln. The bridge was wholly upon the property of plaintiff in error; and was closed at both ends by gates, and there was also a sign thereon, certainly up to within a few months before this accident, which prohibited the use of the bridge, except by permission from the office of the plaintiff in error. It had never been dedicated to the public, nor had the public been expressly or impliedly invited to use it. This private road, of which the bridge was a part, was primarily built for the purpose of egress and ingress from and to the stavemill on the Marshall tract, the kiln thereon not having been built till 1898; and the stavemill was totally abandoned in December, 1898, nearly two years before the accident. In the years 1899 and 1900 no building lime was burned at all at the kiln on the Marshall tract, and the kiln was only operated for about two months in each year, burning lime suitable only for agricultural purposes, and it had not been in operation for ten months before the accident. The only business, therefore, of any sort carried on by the plaintiff in error on the Marshall tract for more than a year prior to the accident, was crushing rock, which was furnished for ballast to the Southern Railway Company, and all this rock was hauled over the switch by the railroad company; and all the agricultural lime which was burned on the infrequent occasions mentioned, and which plaintiff in error sold, with perhaps the exception of a few lots hauled from the kiln by wagons in 1899, was also hauled over this switch by the railroad, wherefore, at the time of the accident, and for some time prior, there was no business of any sort conducted on the Marshall tract which required the use of the bridge by the public, nor was there any inducement to the public or to any customer of the plaintiff in error to use it, and plaintiff in error was purchasing nothing on the opposite side of Happy creek from its main works, and was selling nothing which required the use of the bridge by its customers.

In the early part of the year 1900, W. E. Carson, the general manager for plaintiff in error, discovered that the bridge was unsafe for heavy loads, but safe for light loads and foot passengers; and the only use made of it thereafter by plaintiff in error was by the men who worked at the crusher on the Marshall tract walking over it to and from their work, or to cross over with light loads or empty vehicles. As before stated, the bridge was inclosed by gates, one at its northern and one at its southern extremity; and the gate on the inside of the bridge was laced with iron, which swung to a post, and was caught with a hasp to keep it closed; a weight being affixed thereto, so that it continually pulled the gate closed. On the southern side, towards the railroad, there was a double gate, to which was fixed a hasp to close it, and a place at the bottom with a bolt to keep it closed. In addition to the sign on the bridge, the plaintiff in error, up to within a few months, at least, of the accident, kept the gates locked, and on innumerable occasions the locks were replaced when broken by persons in the effort to use the bridge without plaintiff in error's consent. The sign had been broken down on several occasions, but was replaced, and there is evidence that it probably went down with the bridge when it fell in. At the side of the limekiln on the Marshall tract a quantity of refuse lime had been thrown, and had laid there for some time, and was useful only for agricultural purposes. Mr. Henry Downing, of Warren county, owned a farm southeast of the Marshall tract, and only separated therefrom by the land of Mr. Bush Maddox; and on several occasions Carson, the general manager of plaintiff in error, suggested to Mr. Downing the purchase of this refuse lime for use on his farm. In these negotiations, which begun some time in 1899, and resulted in the sale of the lime in August, 1900, it was understood that the lime was to be hauled by a route over the Maddox land, which was by far the shortest route to Mr. Downing's farm, and the latter co-operated with Carson in obtaining the consent of Maddox that the lime might be hauled over his land. The agreement or understanding between Mr. Downing and Carson as to the route by which the lime was to be hauled was renewed on August 12, 1900, when Mr. Downing announced that he was ready to take the lime, and would begin hauling it the next day, at which time Carson was to send some of his men to aid in making any needed repairs to the road over which the hauling was to be done. On the next day (Monday, August 13, 1900) Carson went to the Marshall tract, and found Mr. Downing's two teams there, ready to begin hauling the lime. The men in charge of the teams stated to him that they had come by the Maddox route, and that, while the road was rough, it was all right, except there were some weeds in it. Thereupon Carson, instead of sending men to work the road, or to help to work it, as he had agreed to do, put two of his men to help load the lime on the wagons; telling the teamsters, of whom defendant in error's intestate was one, that they were to haul by the Maddox route, which instruction was but a repetition of the order which Mr. Downing himself had already given his teamsters. After so instructing the teamsters, Carson left the limekiln, and, when the wagons were loaded, instead of returning by the Maddox route, the teams returned to Mr. Downing's farm by the route which carried them over the bridge across Happy creek; but there is no proof that plaintiff in error assented to this, or knew of it. The second load made on Monday and the first load made on Tuesday following were carried by the Maddox route, but when the second load, which was the fourth, was gotten on Tuesday, August 14th, the teamsters determined to go again by the route over the bridge; and upon approaching the bridge they found the gates closed, but not locked, and one of the men with the teams opened the gate at the entrance, whereupon the two teams—the one right after the other—were driven upon the bridge; the first team, of four mules, being driven by defendant in error's intestate, who was upon the saddle mule, followed immediately by a team of two horses driven by another of the crew; the result being that a span of the bridge gave way under the front team, precipitating it and the defendant in error's intestate into the creek below, causing him injuries from which he died several days thereafter.

The first question presented upon this state of facts is, was plaintiff in error guilty of any negligence which rendered it liable in damages to the defendant in error; in other words, were the injuries to the deceased the result of a failure to perform a duty which the plaintiff in error owed to the deceased? The only duty suggested as owing from the plaintiff in error to the deceased was that it should have kept the bridge in good and safe repair; that is, in good and safe repair for use by loaded wagons. Such a duty might have rested upon the plaintiff in error, if an invitation, expressed or implied, had been given the injured man to cross the bridge with loaded wagons; but obviously there was no express invitation, since it is conceded that it was understood between Mr. Downing, whose servant the injured man was, and the general manager for plaintiff in error, that the lime should be hauled over the Maddox route. In addition, the deceased, as well as all others in charge of the teams with which the lime was being hauled, was instructed, not only by his employer, but by the general manager of plaintiff in error, before any of the lime had been moved, that it was to be hauled over the Maddox route.

It is equally clear, we think, that there was no implied or general invitation to the deceased or to the public to haul with loaded wagons over the bridge. The bridge was on the private property of the plaintiff in error, and for months prior to this accident every effort had been made by it to prevent its use by the public. It had made persistent efforts to keep the gates locked, and the public was notified by a sign, easily to be read, posted on the bridge, not to cross the bridge, except by permission from the office of plaintiff in error. For 18 months before the accident the public had done no hauling over the bridge—certainly not with loaded wagons; and plaintiff in error's business was transacted with the general public on the north side of the Shenandoah river alone, where its main works were located. We see nothing whatever in the evidence showing that the plaintiff in error had reason to expect that the deceased would attempt to cross the bridge with wagons heavily loaded with lime, in violation of the express instructions clearly appearing to have been given him by his employer, and which had been repeated in his presence by Carson before any of the lime had been moved. The deceased was nearly 15 years of age, and is shown to have been a young man of at least ordinary intelligence, and there appears no reason why plaintiff in error should have been on its guard lest he would violate the instructions which had been given him as to the route by which the lime was to be hauled; and hence the plaintiff in error was without reason to consider it necessary for it to take any further precaution against the use of the bridge by Mr. Downing's teamsters in hauling the lime. One of the witnesses for defendant in error, who was among the teamsters with Mr. Downing's wagons on the day of the accident, but not on the day before, testifies that one St. John, an employé of the plaintiff in error, was present at the limekiln when the teams were about to start by the route over the bridge just before the accident occurred, and that witness said to St. John that they were going by the bridge, as the road over the Maddox route was such they could not go that way, etc., to which St. John made no response; but St. John denies that any such statement was made in his presence, and there is not the slightest evidence that he had any authority whatever to authorize a disregard of the understanding between plaintiff in error's general manager and Mr. Downing that the lime was to be hauled over the Maddox route, or to give the assent of the plaintiff in error that the teams might pass over the bridge. His uncontradicted statement, in substance, is that his employment with plaintiff in error was as foreman at the rock crusher, with only the additional duty of looking after the limekiln when in operation, to keep an account of the loads of lime carried from the kiln, and to make report to the office; that he was at the limekiln on this occasion with the view of performing the latter duty; and that he had no connection or concern with the other works or business of the plaintiff in error at that time or at any time theretofore.

Whether the understanding between Mr. Downing and General Manager Carson that the lime was to be hauled by the Maddox route was due wholly, as is contended, to the consideration that the Maddox route was much shorter than the other, or to the unsafe condition of the bridge, does not alter the case. With that understanding, the lime was sold to Mr. Downing, and plaintiff in error had every reason to expect that it would be carried out; and there is not the slightest testimony that the plaintiff in error had notice of any purpose on the part of those in charge of Mr. Downing's teams to violate that understanding. As to whether Mr. Downing's teamsters were warned of the unsafe condition of the bridge, according to the testimony of Carson and another witness for plaintiff in error, there is conflict of evidence, but that there was the understanding between Mr. Downing and Carson as to the route by which the lime was to be hauled is not controverted; nor is it controverted that both instructed the teamsters that they were to haul by the route agreed on, and before any of the lime had been moved.

"An essential ingredient to any conception of negligence is that it involves the violation of a legal duty which one person owes to another—the duty to take care for the safety of the person or the property of the other; and the converse proposition is that, where there is no legal duty to exercise care, there can be no actionable negligence. Therefore it is reasoned that a plaintiff who grounds his action upon the negligence of the defendant must show not only that the conduct of the defendant was negligent, but also that it was a violation of some duty which the defendant owed to him." Thompson's Com. on L. of Neg. (2d Ed.) §§ 3, 945; Bishop's Noncon. L. § 446.

The party who affirms negligence must establish it, and this rule is never to be lost sight of. Bailey on P. I. § 1674.

In our view of the case at bar, it never got to the point where the contributory negligence of the deceased became a matter for consideration, as the evidence of the defendant in error fails to establish any negligence on the part of the plaintiff in error rendering it liable in damages in this action.

It is therefore wholly unnecessary for us to discuss other questions presented in the record, and the judgment of the circuit court complained of must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. v. BEALE, Judge.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 14, 1904.)

COUNTIES—DEFAULTING DEPUTY TREASURER —MOTION FOR JUDGMENT ON BOND—JURIS-DICTION OF COUNTY COURT.

1. Code 1887, § 910, provides that, if the deputy of any officer commit any default or misconduct in office for which his principal is liable, such principal, on motion, may obtain a judgment against the deputy and his sureties "for the full amount for which such principal * * * may be so liable." Section 912 provides that such a motion may be made in the county court. In other instances the jurisdiction of the county court is limited to $100. Held, that such court had jurisdiction of such a motion by a county treasurer for judgment for $1,800 on the bond of his deputy, though it only covered embezzlements and larcenies, and though the deputy might have been liable for other delinquencies, so that there might be one measure of recovery against the deputy, and another against the sureties.

Error to Circuit Court, Westmoreland County.

Petition for a writ of prohibition by the Fidelity & Deposit Company against Judge Beale, to restrain the county court of Westmoreland county from taking further jurisdiction in proceedings by R. H. Stuart against A. C. Brown and the petitioner. Judgment denying the writ, and the petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

Leake & Carter and R. C. Mayo, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Chinn, Jr., and T. J. Downing, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. R. H. Stuart was the treasurer of Westmoreland county. A. C. Brown was his deputy, who gave a bond, with the Fidelity & Deposit Company as his surety, conditioned to reimburse the principal, to the extent of $4,000, such pecuniary loss as he might sustain by any act of larceny or embezzlement upon the part of A. C. Brown in the performance of his duties as deputy treasurer of R. H. Stuart, treasurer of Westmoreland county, for the year beginning October 22, 1900, and ending October 22, 1901. On the 13th of November, 1902, R. H. Stuart caused a notice to be served upon his deputy, A. C. Brown, that he would move the county court of Westmoreland county to give judgment against him and the surety for a sum not exceeding $1,800, for which Brown had failed to account, being part of the taxes for the year 1900. The Fidelity & Deposit Company having accepted service of the notice of this motion, certain proceedings were had, which need not now be considered. Thereafter the Fidelity & Deposit Company gave notice to A. C. Brown and R. H. Stuart that it would on the 23d day of January, 1903, apply to the judge of the circuit court of Westmoreland county for a writ to prohibit and restrain the county court of Westmoreland county and the parties to the proceeding from taking further jurisdiction over the Fidelity & Deposit Company in the motion pending in said court under the style of R. H. Stuart v. A. C. Brown and the Fidelity & Deposit Company. In pursuance of this notice, a formal petition, praying that the writ of prohibition issue, was filed. R. H. Stuart appeared, demurred, and answered, and upon these pleadings the judge of the circuit court, in vacation, denied the writ; and to that order a writ of error was awarded by one of the judges of this court.

It is claimed upon the part of the Fidelity & Deposit Company that, inasmuch as judgment is asked for more than $100, the county court has no jurisdiction to entertain the motion, while defendant in error relies upon sections 910 and 912 of the Code of 1887, which are as follows:

"If any deputy of a sheriff, sergeant, or other officer commit any default or misconduct in office, for which his principal or the personal representative of such principal is liable, or for which a judgment or decree shall be recovered against either, such principal or his personal representative may, on motion, obtain a judgment against such deputy and his sureties, and their personal representatives, for the full amount for which such principal or his personal representative may be so liable, or for which such judgment or decree may have been rendered. But no judgment shall be rendered by virtue of this section for money for which any other judgment or decree has been previously rendered against such deputy or his sureties or their personal representatives."

"Any motion under either of the two preceding sections may be made in the court of the county or corporation, or in the circuit court of the county or corporation, in which the default or misconduct of the deputy occurred or was committed."

The office of the writ of prohibition is not to correct error, but the sole question is whether the proceeding sought to be prohibited is in excess of the jurisdiction of the court or judge to whom it is directed. Hogan v. Gulgon, 29 Grat. 705.

If the county court had jurisdiction to enter any judgment upon the notice presented for its consideration by R. H. Stuart, the petition for a writ of prohibition was properly rejected.

Counsel for plaintiff in error relies upon that clause in section 910 of the Code which says that, in case of default of the deputy, the principal may obtain a judgment against him and his sureties "for the full amount for which such principal or his personal representative may be so liable," and points out that the contract of indemnity in this case is not for the faithful performance of duty by A. C. Brown as deputy treasurer of Westmoreland County, but that the guaranty company only undertakes to provide indemnity for the principal for acts of larceny or embezzlement upon the part of the employé in the performance of his duties as deputy treasurer. It is true that the surety or guarantor can only be held by the express terms of his contract, and it may be that there would be one measure of recovery against the principal under this notice, and another measure of recovery against the guarantor or surety. Derelictions of duty on the part of the deputy which could not be classified as acts of larceny or embezzlement would not be within the undertaking on the part of the Fidelity & Deposit Company, but this consideration is wholly independent of the general jurisdiction of the tribunal in which the principal, R. H. Stuart, seeks redress for the default of his deputy. It grows out of the contract between the parties. The law did not require Stuart to take any bond from his deputy. In his effort to protect himself against the delinquencies of his deputy, he was at liberty to take a bond with such conditions as to him seemed best. He could have required the surety to indemnify him against all default in the performance of his duties, but he contented himself with taking indemnity only against his acts of larceny and embezzlement. It is not perceived that this can affect the jurisdiction of the tribunal in which he seeks to secure such indemnity as he is entitled to demand by virtue of his contract. If the county court has jurisdiction over the subject, it would proceed in the same manner, be controlled by the same mode of procedure, be governed by the same law, in ascertaining the rights of the parties, and enter the same judgment as would under like conditions have been rendered in the circuit court. Section 912 expressly provides that any motion under section 910 or section 911 may be made in the county court of the county or corporation, or in the circuit court of the county or corporation, in which the default or misconduct of the deputy occurs or was committed. That section has been construed by this court in Hall v. Ratliff, 93 Va. 327, 24 S. E. 1011, in which the jurisdiction of a county court over a motion by a county treasurer against his deputy and sureties is fully sustained. "Whether or not the deputy has committed any default or misconduct in office, and to what extent, if any, his sureties are liable to the principal," are questions which, as counsel for defendant in error has well said, "can only be determined by the evidence introduced on the trial of the motion, of which the bond upon which it is sought to hold the surety liable would form a part."

The general jurisdiction of county courts in respect to pecuniary matters is limited to $100. When, therefore, it was determined to give those courts jurisdiction over controversies between sheriffs, sergeants, or other officers, and their deputies, on account of their default or misconduct in office, it was provided that the judgment might be "for the full amount" in controversy. It seems plain that this language was used, not as a limitation upon the jurisdiction of the county courts, and as operating to confine their jurisdiction within a class of cases in which the liability of the deputy and his sureties would be coextensive, but was necessary and proper by reason of the fact that under the general law the jurisdiction of county courts with respect to matters merely pecuniary was limited to sums not greater than $100, whereas, with respect to matters embraced in section 910, it was the purpose of the Legislature that the county courts should have jurisdiction over them without respect to the amount involved.

There is no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and it is affirmed.

FULKERSON et al. v. TAYLOR et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 14, 1904.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—DEFECT IN TITLE—CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE—CORPORATIONS—RAILROADS—JUDGMENT—DOCKETING—INDEX—LIEN—EXECUTION—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. Under Code 1887, § 3561, requiring every judgment to be indexed in the judgment docket in the name of each defendant, the word "Same," occurring immediately below the name of a judgment debtor on the index, constitutes a sufficient index of the judgment next listed against him.

2. An execution which is voidable but not void, cannot be attacked in another case in which the judgment on which it is based is sought to be enforced.

3. Where one purchases land by parol, and is put in possession, he is not protected, to the extent of the purchase price paid, as to judgments against the vendor, until he has acquired a perfect equitable title by paying the entire price.

4. Where an examination of the records would have shown an infirmity in the title to a right of way granted to a railway company, it is bound by notice of the defect.

5. In view of Code 1887, §§ 1079, 1083, providing how a railroad corporation may acquire perfect title to land needed for its purposes, it is, in the absence of charter provisions to the contrary, subject to the same rules in acquiring title to land and making improvements thereon as private individuals.

6. Where a railway company has acquired a portion of its right of way by a defective title, of which it had constructive notice, a court may decree that the land be sold, with the portion of the roadbed thereon, to satisfy a judgment against the company's vendor.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lee County.

Suit by Eliza A. Taylor and others against L. D. Fulkerson and others. From a decree in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed in part.

C. T. Duncan and H. B. Sewell, for appellants. R. T. Irvine and L. T. Hyatt, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. This case has been appealed twice. The decision of the court in the former appeal is reported in 100 Va. 428-437, 41 S. E. 863, and the proceedings had in the case prior to that time are set out in the opinion of the court.

The first assignment of error upon this appeal is that the court erred in holding that J. M. Wheeler, Sr., at the time he purchased and paid for the 113.80 and 51 acre tracts of land in the proceedings mentioned, had actual notice of the judgment of C. B. Baylor against L. D. Fulkerson.

The appellees assign as cross-error, under rule 9 (45 S. E. vi), that the court erred in not holding that Wheeler had constructive notice, even if he did not have actual notice, of that judgment. If this be true, it will be unnecessary to consider the question of actual notice.

Upon the former appeal, it appeared that the judgment had been properly docketed upon the judgment lien docket, as provided by section 3560 of the Code of 1887, but it did not appear that the docketing had been indexed as required by section 3561. The case was remanded to the circuit court without passing upon that question. After the case went back, the deposition of the clerk of the county court of Lee county was taken, and with his deposition was filed extracts from the index of the judgment lien docket. One of these extracts is as follows:

"Same ads. A. L. Pridemore, p. 168.

"Same ads. Rosetta Harber, p. 168.

"Same ads. Bays Children, p. 168.

"Same ads. Chas. E. Baylor, p. 168."

The circuit court was of opinion that the use of the word "Same" in the index in the place of the full name of the judgment debtor was not a compliance with the provisions of section 3561 of the Code of 1887, which requires that every judgment shall be, as soon as it is docketed, indexed by the clerk in the name of each defendant, and shall not be regarded as docketed as to any defendant in whose name it is not so indexed.

It is true, as contended, that the name of L. D. Fulkerson, the judgment debtor, is not written out in the index to the docket in which the Baylor judgment is docketed, yet the word "Same" follows the name of L. D. Fulkerson in such connection that it could refer to and mean nothing else than "L. D. Fulkerson." If it does not mean that, it is without any signification whatever. "Same" is no one's name. If not the usual, it is a very common, method of indexing both recorded deeds and docketed judgments. To hold that such a mode of indexing is invalid would unsettle many titles, and might result in much injustice. The object of the provision of the Code for docketing and indexing abstracts of judgments is to apprise third persons—as, for instance, intending purchasers—of the existence and character of the judgment if they exercise ordinary care and intelligence. Cooke v. Avery, 147 U. S. 377, 13 Sup. Ct. 346, 37 L. Ed. 209. In the case cited, which involved the construction of a statute similar to the one under consideration, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "The only ground upon which this abstract and index could be held insufficient was that the names of the plaintiffs were not given in full in either abstract or index. Was this omission fatal to the lien? The circuit court did not think so, and we concur in that view. Willis v. Smith, 66 Tex. 31 [17 S. W. 247]. 'The object of the statute is not to incumber the register with full information, but to excite inquiry and indicate the source of full information.' It appears to us that the source of full information was so indicated in this instance that no reasonably prudent or cautious inquirer could go astray." To hold that the index to the docketed judgment in this case is sufficient, it is not necessary for us to go as far as did the Supreme Court in the case cited. It is always safest, however, for clerks, in the performance of their duties in indexing recorded writings and docketed judgments, to comply with the letter of the statute imposing such duties upon them.

The refusal of the court to quash the execution which had been issued upon the Baylor judgment in violation of the agreement of the parties is assigned as error.

The administratrix of L. D. Fulkerson, in an answer filed on the 8th day of June, 1901, set up the plea of the statute of limitations to the judgment of Baylor, upon the ground that more than 10 years had elapsed between the date of its rendition and the institution of this suit, and that no valid execution had ever issued thereon. She filed with her answer a notice served upon the personal representative of the judgment creditor, that she would on the 7th day of that month move the circuit court to quash the execution in question upon the ground that it was prematurely issued. Upon the same day upon which the answer was filed, a decree was entered in this cause overruling a motion made by the administrator of L. D. Fulkerson. What that motion was is not disclosed by the record. If it was the motion to quash the execution, it does not appear to have been made on the day named in the notice, and, besides, could not have been legally made in this case.

Conceding that the execution was improperly issued, it was not void, but only voidable. Until it is avoided it must be regarded as a valid execution, and could not be avoided by plea or proof in this, a collateral suit. Fulkerson v. Taylor, supra.

In Beale's Adm'r v. Botetourt Justices, 10 Grat. 278, the execution issued more than a year and a day from the date of the decree, without any proceeding by way of scire facias or otherwise to authorize the same. In that case it was held—though the conclusion may not have been necessary to a decision of the case—that the validity of the execution could not be attacked in that, a collateral proceeding. The reasoning, however, of Judge Moncreux in that case, and the authorities cited by him, sustain the doctrine that an execution issued improperly, which is voidable, but not void, upon a judgment or decree rendered in one case, cannot be attacked in another case in which such judgment is sought to be enforced, but that, if such execution is to be avoided, it must be done in some independent proceeding instituted for that purpose.

The appellees also assign as cross-error that the circuit court erred in decreeing that the sum paid by J. M. Wheeler on the purchase price of the 113 and 51 acre tracts of land prior to the rendition of the Baylor judgment should be a lien on these tracts of land prior to the Baylor judgment.

If it be true, as insisted by counsel for Wheeler's heirs, that his contract of purchase from Fulkerson was in parol; that Wheeler had been put in possession under it, and paid part of the purchase price before the Baylor judgment was rendered and docketed—it does not, to the extent of such payment, give them priority over the lien of the Baylor judgment. In order for a purchaser, under a contract which is not required to be recorded, to be protected as to subsequent judgments against his vendor, he must, before the date of such judgment, have become invested with a perfect equitable title. Withers v. Carter, 4 Grat. 407, 412, 50 Am. Dec. 78; Floyd, etc., v. Harding, 28 Grat. 401, 414, 416; March, Price & Co. v. Chambers, 30 Grat., at page 303; Long v. Hagerstown Agricultural Co., 30 Grat. 665; Brown v. Butler, 87 Va. 621, 13 S. E. 71; Powell v. Bell's Adm'r, 81 Va. 222. Wheeler did not have at that time a perfect equitable title, as he had only paid a part of the purchase price.

Prior to the Code of 1887, a subsequent purchaser under a contract not required to be recorded was not protected against a prior unrecorded conveyance unless he had paid the whole purchase price before he received notice of the unrecorded conveyance. 4 Minor's Inst. 968, and cases there cited. Now, under section 2472 of that Code, such a purchaser is protected to the extent of the payments made when he receives notice of the prior unrecorded deed or writing, and has a lien on the property purchased for so much of the purchase money as he had paid before notice. But this highly equitable provision has no application to judgment creditors. The word "writing," in that section, refers to contracts in writing by which a party acquires some interest in, not to judgments by which a party acquires a mere lien upon, land.

The action of the court in decreeing a sale of the improvements made by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company on the Vanoy Railroad strip, and especially without compensating the railroad company for said improvements, is assigned as error.

The Vanoy strip of land conveyed to the railroad company, and upon which it had constructed its improvements, it is conceded by the assignment of error, was liable for the liens for which it was decreed to be sold, but the contention is that the improvements placed thereon by the railroad company are not liable. This contention is based upon two grounds: First, that the railroad company made its improvements in good faith, believing that it had good title to the strip of land; second, that the same principles of law do not apply to allowances for improvements when made by a public improvement company or corporation like a railroad as apply when made by private individuals.

As to the first ground, that the railroad company made its improvements in good faith, believing that it had good title to the land: This contention is not sustained by the facts. The railroad company, when it purchased the land and made its improvements thereon, knew, or ought to have known, that it was not acquiring a good title. An examination of the records would have shown this, and that judgments against Fulkerson, theretofore or thereafter rendered, in the then condition of the title, would bind the land in its hands. Under these circumstances, it is immaterial whether or not it had actual notice of the infirmity of the title. It had the means of knowledge, and means of knowledge with the duty of using them is equivalent to knowledge itself. Jameson v. Rixey, 94 Va. 342-348, 28 S. E. 861, 64 Am. St. Rep. 726, and cases cited.

As to the second ground, that a railroad or other quasi public corporation is not governed by the same principles as are private individuals, in claiming for compensation for the value of improvements: Code 1887, §§ 1079, 1083, provide how such corporations may acquire perfect title to lands needed for their purposes, and transfer any controversy as to the title to the lands, or as to incumbrances upon them, to the damages assessed in the condemnation proceedings. C. & W. Railroad Co. v. W. C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 99 Va. 715, 723, 40 S. E. 20. Where such a corporation attempts to acquire title to lands by purchase from the occupant or supposed owner, we know of no rule of law which exempts it from the ordinary principles of law applicable to private individuals purchasing under like circumstances. A corporation, except where it is otherwise provided in its charter, expressly or by clear implication, in the acquisition and use of its property, the exercise of its powers, and the transaction of its business, stands upon the same footing as private individuals. See R. & F. R. Co. v. City of Richmond, 26 Grat. 83; Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 514, 7 L. Ed. 939; Hope v. N. & W. R. Co., 79 Va. 283.

It is further insisted that, even if the railroad company is not entitled to compensation for the value of the improvements it placed upon the land, the court erred in decreeing a sale of the strip of land with the improvements thereon. A number of cases are cited to sustain this contention. Conceding that it is true, as these cases, or some of them, at least, hold, that detached portions of the roadbed of a railroad cannot be sold to satisfy judgment or other liens upon its property for debts of the company, it does not follow that, where a railroad company has constructed a part of its roadbed upon lands which are subject to liens of judgments against the persons from whom it acquired the lands, such lands cannot be sold to satisfy such liens. The lien creditor has no claim against the railroad company. It can pay the debt, if it chooses, and relieve the property of the lien, but the creditor cannot compel it to do so. Where a railroad is in the hands of a receiver of the court, as was the case of Wheeling Bridge & Terminal Ry. Co. v. Reymann Brewing Co., 90 Fed. 189, 32 O. C. A. 571, cited and much relied on by appellants' counsel, the court might, as was suggested in that case, direct the liens to be paid out of the earnings of the railroad, or it might, if the railroad was insolvent, direct a sale of the entire property of the railroad company, and a satisfaction of the liens out of the proceeds of sale. But where the railroad company is solvent and not in the hands of a receiver, as in the case at bar, how can the court control its earnings, or order a sale of its entire property to satisfy a debt which it does not owe?

In the case of Hope v. N. & W. R. Co., supra, where the same arguments of public policy and inconvenience were urged as in this case against interference with the operations of a railroad company by depriving it of a part of its roadbed, it was said by Judge Lewis, in delivering the opinion of the court, "that questions of inconvenience discussed by counsel cannot be considered by the court. The fact is that the defendant unlawfully withholds possession of the plaintiff's property, to which it has acquired no title, and for which he has received no compensation. It is competent, however, for the company, if it cannot acquire the land by private agreement, to condemn it; and thus it is hardly probable that public inconvenience will result from a reversal of the judgment complained of. But be that as it may, the plaintiff has not shown himself entitled to recover, and the judgment must be reversed." If a plaintiff in an action of unlawful detainer is entitled to a writ of possession, as was adjudged in that case, for a detached portion of the bed of the railroad, clearly the judgment lien creditor in this case can subject the detached portion of the railroad upon which he has a lien to its payment by a sale thereof.

We are of opinion that the circuit court did not err in decreeing a sale of said strip of land, including the improvements thereon. The Baylor judgment, having, as we have seen, been properly docketed, is a prior lien upon all the lands directed to be sold by the decree appealed from, including said railroad strip, and is also a lien upon the strip of land purchased by the said railroad company from J. M. Wheeler, together with its improvements, and the circuit court erred in not so holding.

The decree appealed from must be reversed in so far as it is in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion, and affirmed in other respects, and the cause will be remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had in accordance with law, and not in conflict with this opinion.

1. One paying the purchase price of land under contract with the grantor, but having the conveyance made to a third person, is the equitable owner of the land at the time conveyed.

2. Facts disclosed by a deed, which is a link in the chain of title under which right to possession is claimed, are binding on one asserting title by reason of such deed.

3. Where there is no exception to the report of a commissioner on a question of fact, objection cannot be made for the first time on appeal.

4. Where a deed conveyed a right of way to lands "lying in the county of Wise" the conveyance will be limited to his lands in Wise county, though the grantor owns lands in other counties, title to right of way through which, under the terms of the deed, without the limitation, would pass to the grantee.

5. Code 1887, § 2915, limiting the time within which suit may be brought to recover land, has no application to the suit of a judgment creditor to enforce his lien against the land.

6. Code 1887, § 3573, providing that no suit shall be brought to enforce the lien of a judgment on which the right to issue an execution or bring a scire facias or action is barred under other sections of the Code, does not affect the validity of a decree of sale of lands by a court of equity in a proceeding brought within the time for issuance of execution or bringing a scire facias or action.

7. It is not against public policy to decree a sale of a portion of a roadbed of a railroad to satisfy prior liens on the land.

8. Enforcement of judgment lien against grantees of judgment debtor does not involve the equity maxim that he who comes into equity must do equity.

9. The rule of caveat emptor applies to judicial sales.

10. After a judgment creditor has docketed his judgment, grantees of the judgment debtor put improvements on the lands at their peril.

11. Const. § 88, providing that the Supreme Court of Appeals may have jurisdiction in civil cases involving not less than $300, does not proprio vigore confer that jurisdiction.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lee County.

Suit by I. P. Kane and others, as creditors of James P. Barron, to subject land owned by the latter or conveyed to others by him to the payment of judgments. From a decree in favor of plaintiffs, C. E. Flanary and others, grantees of Barron, appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Bullitt & Kelly and Duncan & Sewell, for appellants. R. T. Irvine, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. This is a creditors' suit to subject the lands now owned by James P. Barron and certain lands formerly owned or claimed to have been owned by him to the payment of the judgments asserted in this case.

C. E. Flanary, one of the petitioners for appeal, assigns as error the action of the court in holding the Hall tract of land, now owned by him, liable to said judgments.

The ground of his contention is that Barron never had any such interest in the Hall land as could be subjected to his debts, or, if he did, that he (Flanary) was a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice of such interest.

Flanary claims that about the 2d of December, 1891, Barron offered to sell the Cove Hill tract of land to J. A. G. Hyatt at the price of $7,000, who declined at first to purchase it, but afterwards purposed to do so if Barron would accept in payment thereof certain property, among which was the Hall tract of land, valued at $2,000. Barron declined Hyatt's proposition, but afterwards returned to Hyatt's house and accepted it. On both occasions when Barron was negotiating with Hyatt he was accompanied by W. N. G. Slemm, from whom Barron was endeavoring to purchase the tract of land known as the "Bruce Tract." After the first interview between Barron and Hyatt, Slemm proposed to Barron that, if he and Hyatt traded, he would take the Hall tract of land in part payment of the purchase price of the Bruce tract, and with this understanding Barron returned to Hyatt's, and accepted his proposition, and also entered into a contract with Slemm for the purchase of the Bruce land. Barron executed a title bond to Hyatt, by which he sold and agreed to convey to him the Cove Hill tract of land upon the payment of the consideration stated above. In that title bond it is provided that "the said Hyatt is then to convey said Barron at the price of $2,000 the Hall tract of land." At the same time Barron executed a title bond, by which he sold the Hall tract of land to Slemph at the price of $2,000, and bound himself to make or cause to be made a good title thereto. It was then agreed that deeds should be prepared—one by which Barron and his mother should convey the Cove Hill land to Hyatt, another by which Slemph and wife should convey the Bruce land to Barron, and a third by which Hyatt and wife should convey the Hall tract to Slemph. Hyatt prepared all the deeds, and on or about the 11th of that month they were executed. There was no tripartite agreement between Hyatt, Barron, and Slemph, as Mr. Flanary insists, by which Slemph purchased the land from Hyatt or Hyatt sold it to Barron for Slemph. Slemph was no party to the agreement between Barron and Hyatt. Hyatt was not a party to the agreement between Barron and Slemph. Barron paid Hyatt the consideration for the Hall land, and by his direction Hyatt conveyed it directly to Slemph. Barron was clearly the equitable owner of the Hall tract of land when, by his direction, it was conveyed to Slemph. Mr. Flanary insists that, even if this be so, he had no notice of it when he purchased and paid for the Hall land, and that he is entitled to protection as a bona fide purchaser for value, and without notice. There is no evidence that Mr. Flanary had actual notice that Barron was ever the equitable owner of the Hall tract of land, but the recorded deed from Hyatt to Slemph of December 11, 1891, contains a statement which shows that Barron had an interest in the land. That statement is as follows: "Witnesseth, that the parties of the first part, for and in consideration of a deed executed by James P. Barron and Louisa J. Barron for 200 acres of land on Cove Hill, being lots Nos. 4, 5, 6 and 7 as partitioned among B. F. Harber's heirs, to the parties of the first part, in which the following conveyance was taken and is considered at the price of two thousand dollars, the parties of the first part doth by these presents grant, bargain, sell and convey unto the said W. N. G. Slemph, at the instance of the said James P. Barron, the following described tract or parcel of land, being the lot deeded to Joannah Hall and her husband, John Hall, by the heirs of John W. Slemph, and by them deeded to said J. A. G. Hyatt, which tract of land is bounded as follows." Then follows a description of the land by metes and bounds. This deed was a link in the chain of title under which Flanary claimed. It was his duty to examine it before purchasing. Means of knowledge, with the duty of using it, is equivalent to knowledge itself. Jameson v. Rixey et al., 94 Va. 342, 26 S. E. 861, 64 Am. St. Rep. 726, and cases cited; Fulkerson v. Taylor (decided at this term of court) 46 S. E. 309.

The second error assigned by C. E. Flanary is that the court erred when it decreed said land (Hall tract) to be sold, in not substituting or subrogating W. N. G. Slemph to the sum of $2,000, which was the purchase price of said land, and which he had paid to Barron for Hyatt, and which Hyatt had held for Barron towards the purchase price of the Bruce land. This assignment of error seems to be based upon the view that Slemph was a party to the agreement by which Barron purchased the Hall land from Hyatt. As we have before seen in discussing the first assignment of error, Slemph was no party to the agreement between Barron and Hyatt of December 2, 1891. He did not pay Hyatt $2,000, the purchase price of the Hall land, for Barron. Barron paid the purchase price thereof himself, and had the land conveyed directly to Slemph in part payment of the purchase price of the Bruce land.

The third and last assignment of error made by C. E. Flanary is that, if he is wrong in the first and second assignments of error, then he is advised the court erred in decreeing a sale of the entire Hall tract, but should only have decreed the sale of one-half thereof.

It is true that the mother of J. P. Barron united with him in his deed to Hyatt conveying the Cove Hill land, and that said land was paid for in part by the Hall land; but there is nothing in the record to show that she claimed any interest in the Hall land. Flanary, in his answer, does not raise this question. The commissioner, in his report of liens and of the lands which are liable to their payment, reports that the Hall land is liable to the payment of all the liens in Statement C, except as to certain named judgments. There was no exception to this report upon the ground that Mrs. Barron, the mother, owned any interest in the land. That question was not raised in the circuit court, and it is too late now to raise it here after the report of the commissioner that the entire tract was liable to the judgments was confirmed without exception on that ground.

The Virginia & Southwestern Railway Company, B. S. Clarke, and Thomas Clyde assign as error the action of the court in holding that certain judgments against James P. Barron were liens upon the right of way of said railroad company, with the improvements thereon, through lots Nos. 21 and 22 of the W. N. G. Barron, Sr., land, lying in Lee county.

Whether or not the said strip of land is subject to the judgments for the payment of which the court decreed its sale depends upon the construction of a deed executed by W. N. G. Barron, Sr., and wife to the Bristol Coal & Iron Narrow Gauge Railroad Company on the 6th day of January, 1881. The deed describes the land conveyed as lying in Wise county. This description, it is contended by appellants, is a false description, and will be regarded as mere surplusage, since the deed as a whole shows that a right of way was intended to be conveyed through Barron's whole farm, which was located in both Lee and Wise counties.

The motives of the parties in entering into the contract evidenced by the deed, as set out therein, and the description of the land affected by it, are as follows:

"Whereas, it is proposed by the Bristol Coal and Iron Narrow Gauge Railroad Company to lay out and construct and to operate their road from Bristol-Goodson, in Washington county, through and across the lands of W. N. G. Barron and Anna Barron, of the county of Wise and Lee, and state of Virginia, by way of Estillville and Spears Ferry, in Scott county, to a point at or near Big Stone Gap, in Wise county, Virginia, and to extend its line from any point on the same to Cumberland Gap, at any time when a majority of the stockholders shall deem it to the interest of said company to do so.

"And, whereas, for these purposes, the said railroad company propose and desire to purchase of the said Barron and wife a belt of land fifty (50) feet in width along, and lying equally on either side of, the center line of their railway track, as the same may be finally located and established, with the privilege of any increase of such width at any point of the line as may be required to embrace deep cuts and fills, waste and borrowing pits, as needed in the construction of the said railway through his said land.

"And, whereas, the said W. N. G. Barron and wife believe an appreciation in the value of his property will arise by the construction of the said road, and his estate so materially benefited by the same, now, therefore,

"This indenture, made this 6th day of Jan., 1881, between the said Wm. N. G. Barron and Anna Barron, his wife, and the Bristol Coal and Iron Narrow Gauge Railroad Company,

"Witnesseth, that the said Wm. N. G. Barron and Anna Barron, his wife, for and in consideration of one dollar ($1.00) to them in hand paid by the said Bristol Coal and Iron Narrow Gauge Railroad Company, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, have given, granted, bargained and sold, and by these presents do give, grant, bargain, sell and convey, in fee simple, and with general warranty, to the said Bristol Coal and Iron Narrow Gauge Railroad Company, all right, title, interest and estate in and to a piece or lot of land fifty (50) feet in width, along the line of said company's railroad, as the same may be finally located and established, measuring twenty-five (25) feet at right angles from the center line of the same on either side, and extending for the entire length of the said railroad through the land and premises of the said Wm. N. G. Barron; the same lying in the county of Wise; and also such additional width of land on each side of the said twenty-five (25) feet as may be required to construct any deep cut or filling found necessary in the grading of the said road, and such land as may be necessary for waste and borrowing pits, and any other purpose necessary, and also sufficient timber for cross-ties, stringers, and for other purposes as the same may be needed in the construction of the said railroad through his said land."

It is well settled that where the subject-matter of a deed or will is sufficiently and clearly ascertained, though there be added particulars of description which are found to be false or mistaken, effect will be given to the grant or devise notwithstanding, and these false or mistaken particulars of description will be rejected. In such a case the maxim, "falsa demonstratio non nocet cum de corpore constat," applies. Wootton v. Redd's Ex'r, 12 Grat. 196, 208; State Savings Bank, etc., v. Stewart, 93 Va. 447, 451, 25 S. E. 543. But, in order to bring a case within the influence of the principle invoked, it must appear that the other words of the grant or devise give a clear, certain, and unambiguous description of the subject granted or devised, and that the particulars given are but words of suggestion and affirmation superadded as further description of a subject otherwise and sufficiently described. If, on the other hand, such particulars are restrictive in their character, if they serve to narrow and limit the extent of the subject pointed out by the other words, they can never be rejected. Wootton v. Redd's Ex'r, 12 Grat. 211; State Sav. Bank v. Stewart, 93 Va. 451, 452, 25 S. E. 543; 2 Minor's Inst. (4th Ed.) 1063-1065.

Applying these principles of construction to the deed under consideration, it seems to us clear that the words of the deed describing the land conveyed as "lying in the county of Wise" cannot be treated or rejected as superfluous. The other parts of the deed are very general. The railroad had not then been located, and was not located until several years afterwards. Where it would run was not known. The grantor owned lands, as appears from the record, in the counties of Scott, Lee, and Wise. Without the words describing the land as "lying in the county of Wise," the language of the deed was sufficiently broad to cover any tract of land of the grantor through which the railroad company or its successors might locate the road. The super-added words cannot be regarded as merely words descriptive of a subject already sufficiently described, but must be regarded as words of restriction. To reject them would be to construe the deed as conveying the Lee county land as well as the Wise county land. "If the words," as was said by Judge Lee in Wootton v. Redd's Ex'r, supra, "be restrictive, they can never be rejected; and it must be equally clear that they cannot be rejected if it be doubtful, as they stand, whether they are descriptive merely or descriptive and restrictive. For while there is such doubt it can never be said that the subject is clearly and sufficiently described. Nor, in such a case, will the law intend error or falsehood."

To reject them would violate another well-settled rule of construction that every part of a writing must be so construed, if possible, as to take effect. By holding that the deed only conveyed a right of way through such part of the grantor's land as lies in Wise county, we give some effect to every part of the deed.

The railroad company, Clarke, and Clyde assign as error the court's action in decreeing a sale of the said right of way, because the railroad company and those under whom it claims have had the actual adverse possession of the property for more than 10 years prior to the commencement of this suit.

The statute of limitations invoked has no application to this case. This is clear from the language of that statute (section 2915 of the Code of 1887) and of the statute (section 3573) which limits the time within which judgment liens may be enforced in equity.

Section 2915 applies only to the right to make an entry or to bring an action to recover land. The suit of a judgment creditor to enforce his lien against land is not a suit to recover it. He has no right to the possession of the land. "The principle on which the statute of limitations is founded," as was said by Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, in Pratt v. Pratt, 98 U. S. 704, 24 L. Ed. 805, "is the laches of the plaintiff in neglecting to assert his right. If, having the right of entry or the right of action, he fails to exercise it within the reasonable time fixed by the statute, he shall be barred forever. But this necessarily presupposes the right of entry or the right to bring suit. There can be no laches in failing to bring an action when no right of action exists."

Section 3573 provides that no suit shall be brought to enforce the lien of a judgment upon which the right to issue an execution or bring a scire facias or action is barred by sections 3577 and 3578. This implies, as has been frequently decided, that, as long as the right to issue an execution or bring a scire facias or action thereon exists, the lien may be enforced in equity, and this is so not only when the lands subject to the lien of the judgment are in the hands of the judgment debtor, but also in the hands of subsequent purchasers, whether they had actual notice or not, if the judgment was duly docketed. Taylor v. Spindle, 2 Grat. 44; Leake v. Ferguson, Id. 419; Borst v. Nalle, etc., 28 Grat. 423; Hutcheson v. Grubbs, 80 Va. 251; 4 Minor's Inst. (4th Ed.) 314, and cases cited.

They also claim that, although the strip of land in question was subject to the judgment liens, as the court held, it erred in decreeing a sale of the strip, because a railroad company is a quasi public corporation, and it is against public policy to sell a portion of a railroad track. This question was considered and passed upon in the case of Fulkerson, etc., v. Taylor, etc. (decided at this term of the court) 46 S. E. 309, and a contrary conclusion reached. It is unnecessary, therefore, to do more than to refer to the opinion in that case for the reasons which induced us to reach a conclusion adverse to the contention of the appellants.

They further assign as error the action of the court in holding that the improvements on the land, as well as the land itself, are liable to the lien of the judgments.

It is conceded, and properly so, that the provisions in chapter 124 and chapter 125 of the Code on the subject of improvements, have no application to a judgment creditor seeking to enforce his lien upon the land, upon which improvements have been made. The language of the statutes referred to, when considered as a whole, clearly shows that their provisions for allowing compensation for improvements only apply to actions of ejectment, or to cases in which a decree or judgment is rendered against a defendant for land. This was the construction placed upon them by President Moncure, if not by the whole court, in Graeme v. Cullen, 23 Grat. 286-295; by Judge Staples in Wood, etc., v. Krebbs, 33 Grat. 685-691; and by Judge Lewis in Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 94-107.

The contention of appellants is that where a purchaser, without knowledge of a defect in his title to land, puts improvements thereon, a creditor who afterwards comes into a court of chancery to enforce his judgment will be required to allow for the improvements put upon the property, upon the principle that he who asks equity must do equity. The maxim that he who asks equity must do equity only applies, says Mr. Pomeroy (volume 1, § 386), where a party is appealing as actor to a court of equity in order to obtain some equitable relief.

In Wood v. Krebs, supra, at page 689, Judge Staples says it seems to be well settled that, where the legal title is in one person, who has made improvements in good faith, and the equitable title is in another, who is compelled to resort to a court of equity in support of his equitable claim, that court, acting upon the principle that he who seeks equity must himself do what is equitable, will require as a condition of such relief that the true owner shall make compensation for such improvements. See Graeme v. Cullen, supra, at pages 296 to 301; Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 103, 104.

A judgment creditor, who comes into a court of equity to enforce his lien upon land, is not asserting an equitable right or seeking equitable relief. His judgment is a legal lien.

In Gordon, etc., v. Rixey, etc., 76 Va. 704, Judge Staples, speaking for the court, said: "In Borst v. Nalle, 28 Grat. 430, and in Price v. Thrash, 30 Grat. 515, it was held that the lien of a judgment is an express absolute statutory lien on the debtor's real estate, and the right to resort to the courts to enforce it is a legal right, without terms and conditions imposed." Leake v. Ferguson, 2 Grat. 419; 2 Minor's Inst. 314, 315.

The right of the judgment creditors to subject the strip of land held by the railroad company to the lien of their judgments recovered after the judgment debtor had parted with his interest therein results from the failure of his vendee to comply with the registry acts, which provide that every contract in writing made for the conveyance or sale of real estate for a term of more than five years, and any deed conveying any such estate or term, shall be void as to subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice and creditors until and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record in the county or corporation wherein the property embraced in such contract or deed may be. Code 1887, §§ 2463, 2465; March, Price & Co. v. Chambers, 80 Grat. 299, 303, 304.

As against the creditors of the judgment debtor, such writing is a mere nullity. As to them it has no existence in contemplation of law, and their rights must be determined as if it had never been executed. Bankers', etc., v. Blair, 99 Va. 606, 610, 39 S. E. 231, 86 Am. St. Rep. 914. The strip of land in question must, therefore, as to such appellee creditors, be treated as if James P. Barron were still the owner of it. If he be still the owner of the land in contemplation of law, he is owner of the improvements also, for it is a general rule of the common law, subject to some exceptions—as in the case of fixtures—that everything annexed to the freehold becomes a part thereof. Graeme v. Cullen, 23 Grat. 287; Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 103. If the creditors have the right, by virtue of the registry laws, to subject the land, of which the improvements are a part, to the payment of their judgments, how can a court of equity, in enforcing their legal rights, compel the creditors to account to the railroad company for the value of the improvements, by charging the same upon the land as a prior lien to their judgments? Counsel have not cited us to a case, nor have we found one in our own researches, which, in the absence of statute, holds that a creditor, in enforcing the lien of his judgment, must account for the improvements placed upon the land by an allenee who acquired his interest by a writing which is void under the registry laws.

As to the suggestion made by the appellants that they are protected because they derive title through a judicial sale, it is sufficient to say that the rule of caveat emptor applies to judicial sales, and that they only acquired such title as the parties had who were before the court. The judgment creditors are not shown to have been parties to that suit, and their rights are not impaired by said sale. March, Price & Co. v. Chambers, 80 Grat. 305.

As to the contention that the judgment creditors were guilty of laches in asserting their claims, it is only necessary to say that a judgment creditor's right to enforce his lien under the registry acts is not affected by his knowledge of the fact that the property has been aliened and that the allenee is making improvements thereon. When he docketts his judgment as provided by statute, he has done all he is bound to do, and parties dealing with the property do so at their peril, and in complete subjection to the lien. Graeme v. Cullen, 23 Grat. 286, 307; Wood v. Krebbs, 83 Grat. 685, 692.

As to the assignment of errors by the appellant John Gilly:

He insists that the court erred in holding that his 34½-acre tract of land was liable to the lien of the judgments, for whose payments it was decreed to be sold—First, because the evidence does not show that James P. Barron ever had any interest in that land; and, second, because, if Barron ever owned it, the record does not show that appellant had actual notice of it.

The commissioner found upon the evidence, which was conflicting, that the 34½-acre parcel of land was assigned in the partition of the real estate of W. N. G. Barron, Sr., to the heirs of Joseph Barron, one of whom was the wife of W. N. G. Slemp; that Slemp became the purchaser and had conveyed to him all the land except the interest of his wife, who died intestate, leaving five children, all infants, for all of whom their father was appointed guardian; that some time prior to August, 1888, Slemp sold the land to the mother of James P. Barron, and executed to her a title bond, which was never recorded; that Slemp, as guardian of his children, by suit had the sale made by him confirmed by the circuit court for Lee county, and a commissioner appointed to convey the interest of the said children in the land to Barron and his mother; that the conveyance was made September 30, 1892, and recorded June 3, 1895; that on September 14, 1888, Slemp and wife and James P. Barron executed a deed of trust upon the land to secure to J. M. Flannery the payment of the sum of $1,000, which was admitted to record October 2, 1888; that on June 14, 1890, J. P. Barron resold his interest in the land to Slemp by agreement which was not properly recorded; that by deed dated December 1, 1891, Slemp and wife conveyed the land to the appellant Gilly; that James P. Barron's mother either purchased the land for her son, or he took the purchase off her hands and paid all the purchase money; that the appellant Gilly, from the facts and circumstances proved, must have known of Barron's former interest in the land when he purchased it from Slemp. The court approved the commissioner's finding upon this question, confirmed his report, and held that the land was subject to certain judgments against James P. Barron. In this there was no error, as the commissioner's conclusion is fully sustained by the evidence.

Judgments numbered 4, 6, 7, and 8, held to be liens upon the 34½-acre tract of land, had been assigned to W. N. G. Slemp, the grantor of Gilly, who had conveyed the land with covenants of general warranty. The court held that so much of the proceeds of sale of that tract of land as was applicable to the payment of said judgments 4, 6, 7, and 8 should be paid to Gilly. Gilly insists that the court should have gone further, and decreed that so much of the proceeds of the Hall land, which was liable before the 34½-acre tract, as was applicable to the payment of the judgments 4, 6, 7, and 8, should be paid to him (Gilly) instead of to C. E. Flanary, the purchaser of the Hall tract from W. N. G. Slemp, who had also warranted generally the title to the Hall land. This contention cannot be sustained. Gilly has no right to any part of the judgments assigned Slemp, except to the extent that the proceeds of the sale of his land are applicable to their payment. There was no error in the court's decree holding that Flanary and Gilly should each receive the proceeds arising from the sales of their respective lands so far as applicable to the payment of the judgments assigned Slemp, except that the sums so received should not exceed the contract price when they respectively purchased from Slemp.

The appellees assign as cross-error, under rule 9, the action of the court in not thus limiting the amount to be paid to C. E. Flanary out of the proceeds of the Hall land to John Gilly out of the proceeds of the 34½-acre tract, and out of the proceeds of the 8-acre tract known as "Lot No. 10," and also to Malissa E. Slemp out of the proceeds of the 4-acre tract known as "Lot No. 14." This cross-assignment of error must be sustained, and the decree corrected in that respect.

John Gilly also assigns as error the action of the court in directing the sale of the Big Stone Gap lot, purchased by him, and in refusing to allow him the benefit of the improvements thereon.

The judgments for whose payment the court directed this lot to be sold were properly docketed before Gilly purchased it and made his improvements. His contention is without the least merit, as he bought the lot and made his improvements with notice of the liens thereon.

Sallie R. Flanary and Robert W. Flanary assign as error the refusal of the court to allow them the sum of $133.33 and interest, the amount paid by them for James P. Barron on the purchase price of the Big Stone Gap lot. This assignment of error is based upon a mistake of fact. The court did allow that debt as a prior lien upon Barron's interest in the lot, and the sum of $150, which the court decreed to be paid Mrs. Flanary, is the sum named in the assignment of error, with its interest. This is clearly shown by the deposition of R. W. Flanary and the exhibits filed therewith.

They also assign as error the refusal of the court to allow compensation for the improvements made upon the lot by them.

W. T. Goodloe conveyed the lot to R. W. Flanary and James P. Barron February 15, 1890, by deed which was recorded May 17, 1890. Barron conveyed his undivided one-half interest in the lot to E. F. Taylor by deed dated September 5, 1890, and recorded June 12, 1893. Taylor and wife conveyed their interest to R. W. Flanary by deed dated July 1, 1891. Flanary put the improvements on the lot in the years 1893-1894, and he and his wife conveyed the lot to Taylor by deed dated November 12, 1895, who, with his wife, conveyed the lot to Mrs. Sallie R. Flanary, wife of R. W. Flanary, on the day following. Two of the judgments for whose payment the Barron interest in said lot was directed to be sold were obtained at the September term, 1891, and the other at the September term, 1892, of the circuit court for Wise county, and all docketed before the deed from Barron to Taylor was recorded. In the former part of this opinion it has been held that such a purchaser is not entitled to compensation for improvements as against such judgment creditors. But the appellants Flanary and wife insist that, even if this be so, they, or rather the wife, as tenant in common with Barron, had the right to put improvements upon the lot, and in a partition thereof is entitled to have assigned her that portion of the lot upon which the improvements are, or in case of sale to be allowed the value of the improvements out of the proceeds.

This contention is also based upon a mistake of fact. At the time the improvements were placed upon the land by R. W. Flanary, he, as between himself and Barron, was the sole owner of the lot. The half interest acquired from Barron through Taylor was subject, of course, to the lien of said judgments. No tenancy in common has existed in the land since July 1, 1891, when Taylor conveyed the Barron interest to R. W. Flanary.

R. E. Bratton assigns as error the disallowance of his judgment as a lien because the docketing of his judgment was not indexed as required by law.

As the amount involved is less than $500, this court had no jurisdiction at the time the case was submitted for decision. Section 88 of the Constitution, which provides that this court shall not have jurisdiction in civil cases where the matter in controversy, exclusive of costs and interest accrued since the judgment in the court below, is of less value than $300, except in certain classes of cases named, does not proprio vigore confer jurisdiction upon this court. Under the Constitution (section 88) this court had the capacity to receive jurisdiction in cases involving not less than $300, but, until the Legislature saw fit to confer it, this court could not exercise such jurisdiction. Prison Association, etc., v. Ashby, 93 Va. 667, 671, 25 S. E. 893, and cases cited.

The decree appealed from must be affirmed after amending it so as to provide that no greater amount shall be paid to C. E. Flanary, John Gilly, and Malissa E. Slemp, respectively, on account of the judgments assigned to W. N. G. Slemp, than the purchase price which they respectively paid Slemp for the land purchased by each.

TURNER et al. v. BARRAUD et al.

INFANTS—GUARDIAN AD LITEM—APPOINTMENT—DECREE—RECOGNITION BY COURT—JURISDICTION—RECORD—RECITALS—PRESUMPTION—PARTITION—LIFE TENANTS AND REMAINDERMEN.

1. When the record states the evidence or makes an averment with reference to a jurisdictional fact, it will not be presumed that there was other or different evidence respecting the fact, or that the fact was otherwise than as averred.

2. An appointment of a guardian ad litem "to infant defendants" by the clerk of the court has reference to the infant defendants named in the memorandum of suit, and not to those named in the bill.

3. Where one has never been appointed a guardian ad litem for an infant defendant, so far as the record shows, his assuming to act as such in his answer in the suit cannot make him guardian ad litem unless the court afterwards treats him as such.

4. Where the only mention of B., an infant defendant, as shown by the record, is in the bill and in the caption of the answer of a guardian ad litem appointed for other infant defendants, whose interests are adverse to B.'s, the use by the court of the phrase "infant defendants" in its decrees is not a recognition or treatment of B. by the court as a party to the suit.

5. There can be no partition between life tenants and remaindermen.

6. Where the scope of the pleadings in an action did not involve the interests of remaindermen, a decree of sale of the remainder is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore a nullity.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Action by Henry L. Turner and others against P. St. Geo. Barraud and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Heath & Heath and W. W. Old, for appellants. W. L. Williams, A. C. Braxton, and F. H. Busbee, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. D. C. Barraud, Sr., of the city of Norfolk, died in 1867, leaving a will, by which he gave to his grandson, D. C. Barraud, Jr., a life estate in the Barrons farm in Norfolk county, with remainder to his lawful issue, if he should die leaving any, and, if he should die without lawful issue, then such remainder to pass, under the residuary clause of the will, to the persons there named. In addition to this specific bequest, the testator gave to this grandson an undivided interest in the estate passing under the residuary clause of his will.

Upon the death of the testator, the life tenant took possession of the Barrons farm. He rapidly exhausted his interests under the will of his grandfather, and soon had those interests, which were chiefly in lands, including his life estate in the Barrons farm, heavily incumbered by deeds of trust and judgments taken against him.

In 1874, D. C. Barraud, Jr., and others united as plaintiffs in a chancery suit against R. C. Marshall and others to subject his interests in his grandfather's estate to the satisfaction of his debts. The object of this suit is stated in the bill filed as follows: "The object and intent of this bill is to construe the said will, to fix and determine the rights and interests of the various parties interested therein, to protect and provide for the annuities, and to make partition in kind of the said real estate so devised by the said D. C. Barraud, deceased, to and among the parties entitled thereto, according to their respective shares and interests, so that the part or share of your orator, the said D. C. Barraud, therein, may be set apart in kind, if practicable, or so far as practicable, and sold for the benefit of the creditors under the said deeds of trust and the judgment creditors aforesaid." In May, 1875, a decree was entered in this cause directing a sale of the entire fee in the Barrons farm (remainder as well as life estate). November 26, 1878, a consent decree was entered, confirming a private sale of this farm to William H. Turner at the price of $5,300. This decree ascertained the remainder interest in the proceeds of sale to be $1,150.10, and directed the same to be deposited in bank to await the death of the life tenant. Three days later, on November 29, 1878, a final decree was entered, confirming an account of disbursements, and striking the case of Barraud, etc., against Marshall, etc., from the docket.

William H. Turner, the purchaser at the sale mentioned, died in 1885, and the present suit was instituted in February, 1901, by his son, Henry L. Turner, in his own right and as next friend of two infant grandchildren of William H. Turner, against P. St. Geo. Barraud and his four brothers and sisters, the children of D. C. Barraud, Jr., seeking a decree quieting their title to a portion of the Barrons farm claimed by them under the will of their ancestor.

This bill reviews the proceedings in the suit of Barraud, etc., against Marshall, etc., and alleges that under those proceedings William H. Turner, the ancestor of complainants, acquired a perfect fee-simple title to the Barrons farm, and that they have, therefore, a fee-simple title to that portion of the same involved in this suit; that the defendants deny their title, and claim that they own the Barrons farm under the will of their grandfather, D. C. Barraud, Sr., subject to the life estate therein of their father, D. C. Barraud, Jr., and insist that William H. Turner only acquired title in the suit of Barraud against Marshall to the life estate of their father. Complainants further allege that they desire to sell the land in question, and that the claim of defendants is a cloud upon their title, seriously impairing its value, which a court of equity will remove.

To this bill the five Barraud defendants—three adults, and two infants by their guardian ad litem—file answers. These answers deny the material allegations of the bill, and fully set out the case of the defendants, and exhibit as a part thereof the entire record of the suit of Barraud against Marshall. The defendants deny that the complainants own title to the land in fee, but aver that they only own the life estate therein of their father, D. C. Barraud; that under the pleadings in the suit of Barraud against Marshall the court had no power to sell the remainder in fee, to which they were entitled under the will of their ancestor, the elder Barraud; that the defendant P. St. Geo. Barraud, who alone of the appellees was in esse at the time of the institution of the suit of Barraud against Marshall, was never in any way known to the law made a party to the suit of Barraud against Marshall, and that no one of the five children of D. C. Barraud were ever before the court in that case, and could not, therefore, be bound by the decrees therein. The defendants ask that their answers be treated as cross-bills, and pray that all of the proceedings in Barraud against Marshall, in so far as such proceedings affect their rights as owners of a contingent remainder in fee in and to the tract of land known as "Barrons Farm," be declared to be void ab initio; that the title held or claimed by the complainants be declared to be a title during the life of D. C. Barraud, and no longer, with remainder in fee to the defendants, or such of them as shall survive their father, D. C. Barraud, who is now living.

This cause was regularly matured upon the original bill and the cross-bills, and, in September, 1902, the circuit court for Norfolk county rendered the decree appealed from, holding, among other things, that P. St. Geo. Barraud was never made a party defendant to the suit of Barraud against Marshall; that no guardian ad litem was appointed for him; that no jurisdiction was ever acquired over him in that suit; and that all the decrees therein, so far as they purport to affect P. St. Geo. Barraud and those claimed to be represented by him, were null and void.

It is apparent that the case now before us involves a collateral attack by the appellees upon the decrees in the suit of Barraud against Marshall in so far as those decrees undertake to bind or affect them. The record in the case of Barraud against Marshall is replete with errors and irregularities, but for such errors and irregularities the proceedings therein cannot be successfully attacked collaterally. It is an established rule, founded in wisdom, and necessary to the repose and well-being of society, that "a superior court of general jurisdiction, proceeding within the general scope of its powers, is presumed to act rightly. All intendments of law in such cases are in favor of its acts. It is presumed to have jurisdiction to give the judgments it renders until the contrary appears. And this presumption embraces jurisdiction not only of the cause or subject-matter of the action in which the judgment is given, but of the parties also. The former will generally appear from the character of the judgment, and will be determined by the law creating the court or prescribing its general powers. The latter should regularly appear by evidence in the record of service of process upon the defendant or his appearance in the action. But when the former exists the latter will be presumed. This is familiar law, and is asserted by all of the adjudged cases." Parker v. McCoy, 10 Grat. 594; Pennybacker v. Switzer, 75 Va. 671; Smith v. Henkel, 81 Va. 524; Lemmon v. Herbert, 92 Va. 653, 24 S. E. 249; Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350, 21 L. Ed. 959. In the last-mentioned case, from which the foregoing statement of the law is taken, Mr. Justice Field further says: "But the presumptions which the law implies in support of the judgments of superior courts of general jurisdiction only arise with respect to jurisdictional facts concerning which the record is silent. Presumptions are only indulged to supply the absence of evidence or averments respecting the facts presumed. They have no place for consideration when the evidence is disclosed or the averment is made. When, therefore, the record states the evidence or makes an averment with reference to a jurisdictional fact, it will be understood to speak the truth on that point, and it will not be presumed that there was other or different evidence respecting the fact, or that the fact was otherwise than as averred. If, for example, it appears from the return of the officer or the proof of service contained in the record that the summons was served at a particular place, and there is no averment of any other service, it will not be presumed that service was also made at another and different place; or if it appears in like manner that the service was made upon a person other than the defendant, it will not be presumed, in the silence of the record, that it was made upon the defendant also. Were not this so, it would never be possible to attack collaterally the judgment of a superior court, although a want of jurisdiction might be apparent upon its face. The answer to the attack would always be that, notwithstanding the evidence or the averment, the necessary facts to support the judgment are presumed."

While these salutary principles should not be lost sight of, it must also be remembered that no judicial proceeding can deprive a man of any part of his property without giving him an opportunity to be heard, and, if judgment is rendered against him without such opportunity to be heard, it is absolutely void.

In the case of Underwood v. McVeigh, 23 Grat. 409, Judge Christian says: "The authorities on this point are overwhelming, and the decisions of all the tribunals of every country where an enlightened jurisprudence prevails are all one way. It lies at the very foundation of justice that every person who is to be affected by an adjudication should have the opportunity of being heard in defense, both in repelling the allegations of fact and upon the matter of law; and no sentence of any court is entitled to the least respect in any other court or elsewhere when it has been pronounced ex parte, and without opportunity of defense."

The only method known to our law for bringing an infant before a court is by guardian ad litem, who is appointed to conduct the defense of the infant, who has no discretion to select an attorney to represent him. "So necessary is the appointment of a guardian ad litem esteemed, that, although the process against an infant is issued and executed against him just as against an adult, and the declaration or bill setting forth the complaint is framed and filed in like manner, yet, after the declaration or bill is filed, no rule or any proceeding whatever can be had lawfully until a guardian is designated; and any step that is taken will be void as to the infant." Minor's Inst. (2d Ed.) vol. 1, p. 432.

In the interest of the infant it is provided by statute that no "judgment or decree shall be stayed or reversed for the appearance of either party, being under the age of twenty-one years, by attorney, if the verdict (when there is one), or the judgment or decree, be for him and not to his prejudice." Code 1878, c. 177, § 3.

The question now to be determined is: Did the court in the case of Barraud against Marshall obtain jurisdiction over the appellees, or any of them, by the appointment of a guardian ad litem?

At the time of the institution of that suit the appellee P. St. Geo. Barraud was four years old, and was the only child of D. C. Barraud then living. In 1878, when the sale of their interest in the Barrons farm was made to William H. Turner, the appellees St. Julian Barraud and Myra Rosa Barraud were also in esse, the former being then three years old and the latter six months old. The two remaining appellees were born subsequently to the proceedings we are now considering. It is conceded that the appellees were not before the court by the "virtual representation" of their father, the life tenant. In the nature of things, they could not be, as his interest was hostile to theirs, as shown by the bill. Nor is it contended that a guardian ad litem was ever appointed for any of these infants except P. St. Geo. Barraud. It is, however, insisted that he "virtually represented" his brothers and sisters. Without stopping to consider whether or not, under the doctrine of "virtual representation," P. St. Geo. Barraud could be said to represent his brother and sister, who were in being when the sale was made, we will proceed at once to the inquiry whether or not a guardian ad litem for P. St. Geo. Barraud was ever appointed or recognized by the court.

The bill in the cause of Barraud against Marshall in its recital states that P. St. Geo. Barraud is the only child of the complainant, D. C. Barraud, and in its prayer asks that he be made a party defendant. The prayer of the bill also asks that Myra W. Barraud, an infant cousin of the appellees, and four infant Hanson children, be made parties defendant (these five last-named infants will, for brevity, be hereinafter referred to as the "Hanson children"), and asks that a guardian ad litem may be appointed to defend the infants named.

The first step taken in the cause of Barraud against Marshall was the written memorandum of suit made by the plaintiffs' counsel, in which all the names of the plaintiffs and defendants are set forth, including the five infant Hanson children; but in this memorandum of suit the name of P. St. Geo. Barraud does not appear. To this memorandum of suit is appended this further memorandum by plaintiffs' counsel: "Appoint W. A. Todd guardian ad litem for the infant defendants." The five Hanson children being the only infant defendants mentioned in connection with the suit up to that time, they were the only "infant defendants" who could possibly have been referred to in the memorandum directing the appointment of a guardian ad litem. The memorandum of suit is the chart by which the clerk is to be guided in maturing the cause for hearing, so far as parties are concerned. Accordingly, the subpoena, following the memorandum of suit, was issued against all the defendants by name, including the five infant Hanson children, and the name of P. St. Geo. Barraud does not appear therein. In the entry by the clerk of the case on the rule docket he set forth the names of all the plaintiffs and each of the defendants, which was necessary in order that he might take the rules against and mature the case as to each defendant. The defendants so set forth on the rule docket included the five infant Hanson children, but did not mention the name of P. St. Geo. Barraud. The next step taken was the filing of the bill at the August rules, in which the name of P. St. Geo. Barraud appears in the cause for the first time, he being named therein, as already seen, as a party defendant. The filing of the bill was noted on the rule docket, and at the same rules the docket shows the following entry: "W. A. Todd appointed guardian ad litem to infant defendants." Appellants contend that the words "infant defendants" here used refer to the infant defendants named in the bill, and not those named in the memorandum for suit, in the subpoena, and on the rule docket; that, inasmuch as it is necessary for one to be made a defendant by the bill in order to be a party to the suit, it is to be presumed that the clerk looked at the bill to ascertain who the infant defendants were, and that in appointing "W. A. Todd guardian ad litem to infant defendants" he had in mind those named in the bill. This contention is not tenable. It is not the duty of the clerk to read the bill. That pleading is addressed to the judge, and not to the clerk. As already seen, the clerk's chart is the memorandum of suit made by counsel for the plaintiff, and it is his duty in issuing processes, appointing guardians ad litem, and maturing cases, to follow the written instructions of the plaintiff's counsel in the memorandum for suit, and not to be attempting to reconcile differences between the bill and those instructions. Any such differences would be the fault of the plaintiff, and not that of the clerk. It cannot be presumed that the clerk read the bill when it was not his duty to do so, but it must be presumed that he performed his duty, and that in appointing "W. A. Todd guardian ad litem to infant defendants" he had reference alone to those infant defendants named in the memorandum for suit, in the subpoena issued by him, and entered by him as defendants on the rule docket in his office. These are official records, and are presumed to show accurately what the clerk has done in the matter of maturing the case as to parties. Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 366, 21 L. Ed. 959.

The answer filed, a formal paper of a few lines, purports to be the answer of the five infant Hanson children and of the infant P. St. Geo. Barraud, by Westwood A. Todd, their guardian ad litem. It has been shown that W. A. Todd had never been appointed, so far as appears from the record, guardian ad litem for P. St. Geo. Barraud, and his assuming in this answer to act as such cannot make him so unless the court afterwards recognized and treated him as such.

The first decree in the cause of Barraud against Marshall is dated October 7, 1894. It brings the cause on to be heard upon the bill taken for confessed as to some of the defendants, upon the answers of others, and upon the answer of the infant defendants by their guardian ad litem, with general replication to the answers, and upon the exhibits filed. As already seen, no guardian ad litem had been appointed for P. St. Geo. Barraud, and the case at the time of this decree, so far as infants were concerned, had only been matured as to the five infant Hanson children who were named in the memorandum for suit, in the subpoena, and upon the clerk's rule docket. P. St. Geo. Barraud not having been at this time made a party, it cannot be affirmed or presumed that the court, by the use of the words "infant defendants," meant any other infant defendants than those named in the subpoena and upon the rule docket, as to whom the cause was then matured, or intended its action in that regard as a recognition by it of the answer in question as the answer of any other person than parties to the suit. Galpin v. Page, supra.

The view that the court did not intend to include in the expression "infant defendants" P. St. Geo. Barraud, who was not then a party to the suit, is greatly strengthened, if not concluded, by the pregnant fact that in the caption to this first decree, which is as much a part of the decree as any other part of it, the name of each plaintiff and defendant is set forth in extenso by the court, and the names of the defendants so set forth correspond with those named in the memorandum for suit, in the subpoena, and in the rule docket. The infant defendants thus named and set forth in the caption of its decree are the five infant Hanson children, the name of P. St. Geo. Barraud not being mentioned either in the caption or in the body of the decree. It further appears that the names of each plaintiff and each defendant, as disclosed by the memorandum for suit, the subpoena, and the rule docket, are set forth at length in every subsequent decree in the cause, except four unimportant ones; and that in each instance the five infant Hanson children are named as the infant defendants, and the name of P. St. Geo. Barraud does not once appear in the caption or the body of a single decree.

Under these circumstances it cannot be doubted that when the court referred in its decrees to "infant defendants" it had reference to and intended only to include the five infant Hanson children immediately before set forth by name in the caption of its decree, who had been named in the memorandum for suit, the subpoena, and in the rule docket, as to whom the cause had then been properly matured, and did not intend to enlarge or extend the operation of those records by including another infant who was not then a party to the suit. Nowhere in the record do we find that W. A. Todd was ever recognized or treated by the court as the guardian ad litem of P. St. Geo. Barraud. On the contrary, any such recognition is excluded by the facts appearing of record. Myers v. Myers, 6 W. Va. 369. The only mention of the name of P. St. Geo. Barraud in the entire record is, as we have seen, in the bill and in the caption of the answer of a guardian ad litem appointed, as shown, for the five infant Hanson children, whose interests were, as appears from the record, antagonistic to those of P. St. Geo. Barraud.

It is contended by the appellants that one cannot be a party to a suit unless named in the bill. Moseley v. Cocke, 7 Leigh, 224. This is true, but, for much stronger reasons, merely naming him as defendant in the bill is not sufficient. As already pointed out, he must be brought within the jurisdiction of the court by citation, voluntary appearance, legal representation, or by some means recognized by the law as sufficient. He must have the opportunity of being heard. Underwood v. McVeigh, supra; De Wolf v. Mallett's Adm'r, 3 Dana, 214; Estill's Heirs v. Clay, 2 A. K. Marsh, 497. If, however, it were conceded that P. St. Geo. Barraud had been made a party, by guardian ad litem, to the cause of Barraud against Marshall, the result would still be the same, because under the pleadings therein a sale of the remainder interest in the Barrons farm was foreign to the object of that suit. The suit was not, as suggested, for the partition of the Barrons farm. Under the will of the elder Barraud the Barrons farm was made the subject of a specific devise, the life estate therein being given to D. C. Barraud, Jr., and the remainder to the issue of the life tenant. There could be no partition between the life tenant and the remaindermen. Each owned a separate estate, wholly independent of the other, and neither had any interest in the estate of the other. D. C. Barraud, Jr., owned a joint estate with others in the large residuum of his grandfather's estate, and it was this interest that he sought to subject to the payment of his debts by a partition thereof between himself and the joint owners with him. There was nothing to prevent the creditors of D. C. Barraud, Jr., from subjecting his life estate in the Barrons farm to the satisfaction of their liens. The object of the suit was to reach his undivided interest in the residuum of his grandfather's estate. One difficulty in the way of this consummation was the life estate therein of the widow of the elder Barraud. She, however, united in the suit in order to signify thereby her consent to a partition of the residuum forthwith among those entitled thereto, regardless of her life estate therein. The bill in the suit of Barraud against Marshall sets forth that the plaintiff D. C. Barraud, Jr., claimed the entire fee in the Barrons farm, to the exclusion of the remaindermen, and prays for a construction of the will in that respect; but there is no other prayer therein which remotely affects the interests of the remaindermen. The bill does not contain the slightest suggestion that the interest of the remaindermen in the Barrons farm was subject to any charge, nor does it contain the slightest hint that a sale of such interest was contemplated. So far as the pleadings show, the interest of appellees, as remaindermen, in the Barrons farm, was in no way involved. There was nothing in the bill to which they could have responded, except the charge that they did not have a remainder in the Barrons farm. This charge was so groundless, in view of the plain language of the will, that its decision could have been safely left to the court without answer. The court, however, expressly declined to pass upon that question, went beyond any matter submitted to it by the pleadings, and decreed a sale of the remainder in the Barrons farm, together with the life estate. By this action it exceeded its jurisdiction. It is elementary that no court can travel outside the controversy presented to it to touch other rights or relations not involved. 1 Black on Judgments, § 1, p. 2. At section 242 et seq., the same author says: "Besides jurisdiction of the person of the defendant and of the general subject-matter of the action, it is necessary to the validity of a judgment that the court should have had jurisdiction of the precise question which its judgment assumes to decide, or of the particular remedy or relief which it assumes to grant. In other words, a judgment which passes upon matters entirely outside of the issue raised in the record is, so far, invalid. Jurisdiction may be defined to be the right to adjudicate concerning the subject-matter in a given case. To constitute this, there are three essentials: First, the court must have cognizance of the class of cases to which the one to be adjudged belongs; second, the proper parties must be present; and, third, the point decided must be, in substance and effect, within the issue."

In view of these well-settled principles, the action of the court in selling, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, the remainder estate of the appellees in the Barrons farm, was in excess of its jurisdiction, and contrary to the established law. Moseley v. Cocke, 7 Leigh, 224-226; Wade v. Hancock, 76 Va. 625; Seamster v. Blackstock, 83 Va. 232-234, 2 S. E. 36, 5 Am. St. Rep. 262; Anthony v. Kasey, 83 Va. 338, 5 S. E. 176, 5 Am. St. Rep. 277; Bigelow v. Forrest, 9 Wall. 351, 19 L. Ed. 696; Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 282-283, 23 L. Ed. 914.

In conclusion, we are of opinion that no guardian ad litem was appointed, or recognized by the court as such, for P. St. Geo. Barraud in the case of Barraud against Marshall; that not one of the appellees has ever had the opportunity to be heard in that case; that the action of the court in selling the remainder interest of appellees in the Barrons farm was beyond the scope of the pleadings, and hence in excess of its jurisdiction; and therefore that the decrees and other proceedings in the cause of Barraud against Marshall, so far as they affect the rights of the appellees in and to the land in controversy, are null and void.

For these reasons the decree appealed from must be affirmed.

MILLER v. ARTHUR et al.

DOWER—JUDICIAL SALE—DECREE—DETERMINATION OF DOWER—CONSTRUCTION OF DECREE—LIENS—PAYMENT BY ONE LIABLE—TAKING OF ASSIGNMENT—EXTINGUISHMENT OF LIEN.

1. A wife purchased at judicial sale lands of her husband subject to certain liens. The decree confirming the sale recited, in setting forth the terms: "For the sum of $12,000 subject to dower, and $15,000 without dower. This last price to apply to those creditors who are entitled to the sale without dower;" and the deed to the wife recited that the sale was so made to fix dower. The wife failed to pay her purchase money. Held, in a controversy as to the balance due from her, that her dower in the equity of redemption should be determined by deducting from $15,000 the paramount liens and taking one-fifth of the residue.

2. Subsequent to an assignment for the benefit of creditors, the assignor borrowed money from a bank, and thereafter his wife made payments to the bank on the interest due the bank on notes given by a third person as surety for the loan to the husband. The bank at that time held certain bonds of the wife which were a part of the trust estate under the assignment. In a suit by the assignee against the wife she claimed that it was agreed between her and the surety that her payments should be credited on her bonds. Held, that the credit could not be allowed, as the matter was one in which the creditors of the trust fund had no interest.

3. The owner of land subject to liens could not, by taking receipts in his wife's name, on payment of the liens by him from his own estate, keep them alive in her favor.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Shenandoah County.

Suit by one Arthur and others against Sallie M. Miller. From decrees in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John E. Roller and Winfield Liggett, for appellant. Walton & Walton and Conrad & Conrad, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. J. W. Miller and D. F. Kagey were partners conducting a banking business at Luray, Va., under the firm name and style of D. F. Kagey & Co., and also conducting a mercantile business at Mt. Jackson, Va., under the firm name and style of J. W. Miller & Co. Having failed for a very large amount, these two firms, on December 22, 1890, united in a deed of assignment, conveying all their social and individual assets to trustees to secure numerous creditors, whose aggregate claims amounted to over $200,000. A protracted and complicated litigation followed upon this assignment, involving a number of suits, which have been heard together, volumes of evidence, oral and documentary, and numerous reports of commissioners settling accounts and undertaking to bring order out of the general confusion.

Prior to the date of the assignment mentioned, J. W. Miller, one of the grantors, had purchased under the decree in the cause of the Cecil National Bank against J. W. R.

Moore a tract of land in Shenandoah county, known as the "Moore Farm." Among the assets dedicated to creditors, this Moore farm was conveyed, subject to the unpaid purchase money due thereon. Shortly after the date of the assignment an account was taken in the cause of Cecil National Bank against Moore, showing that J. W. Miller still owed on this Moore farm $8,212.89 as of January 1, 1890.

On the 31st day of August, 1894, the trustees in the general deed of trust sold to Sallie M. Miller, the appellant, the Moore farm. This sale was confirmed by decree of September 10, 1894, and a deed was made to the purchaser. Appellant having failed to pay her purchase money, the farm was resold, and bought by G. W. Lantz at the price of $18,000. The balance due from the appellant on account of her purchase is the subject of the present controversy.

The commissioner to whom the cause was referred ascertained that, after allowing all proper credits, including the proceeds of the sale to Lantz, there was a balance due from the appellant on account of her purchase of $1,352.44 as of February 1, 1899. This report was confirmed by one of the decrees appealed from.

The first assignment of error involves a construction of the terms of appellant's purchase. The contention is that, instead of being charged with $15,000 as the price agreed to be paid by her for the farm, she should only be charged with $12,000 as the purchase price, and with the further sum of $897.43 as the value of her contingent dower in the equity of redemption.

The decree confirming the sale of the Moore farm to the appellant uses the following language in setting forth the terms of her purchase: "For the sum of $12,000 subject to dower, and for the price of $15,000 without dower. This last sale or price is to apply to those creditors who are entitled to the sale of the farm without dower." The deed to the appellant, which was also confirmed, is to this effect: "At the price of $15,000 without dower, and the price of $12,000 with dower; the sale being made in this way to fix the dower in said lands." In an elaborate opinion, which is made a part of the record, the learned judge of the circuit court, after setting forth the terms of the purchase, as shown by the decree and the deed mentioned, proceeds as follows: "Her dower right is not, therefore, to be ascertained according to the usual method, but it is made part of the terms of her contract of purchase. The only question to be considered is the proper interpretation of her contract. I adopt the construction that $3,000 is fixed as the value of the dower in the whole farm, which is valued at $15,000, and that her dower in the equity of redemption is proportionately less. As her dower right is fixed at one-fifth of the whole, her dower in the equity, after the payment of the paramount liens, would be one-fifth of its value. To ascertain the value, deduct from the $15,000 the paramount liens, and take one-fifth of the residue." This construction is not only reasonable, but it is the only construction that can be fairly given to the language employed to express the terms of the purchase by appellant. The commissioner, following, it is presumed, this construction, ascertained the value of the dower to be $2,093.29. The account stated, by which this sum was arrived at, is not in the record, and this court cannot, in its absence, hold that the conclusion is erroneous, in opposition to the finding of the commissioner and the approval of that finding by the court. The commissioner properly found, as shown by the extract from his report, which is in the record, that the $2,093.29 belonged to the National Bank of Baltimore, under a deed of assignment of this dower right by Mrs. Miller to the bank for the indemnity of T. W. Allen. The bank is not here complaining of the amount ascertained to be due on account of dower, and it is not perceived that appellant has any interest in that subject, as the proceeds of the dower belong to the bank, and can in no event reduce the amount due from her on account of purchase money.

The second ground of error assigned is that the court refused to allow appellant credit for three payments of $450 each claimed to have been made by her to the National Bank of Baltimore.

It appears that in the spring of 1893 Kagey and Miller borrowed a large sum of money from the National Bank of Baltimore, with a view to buying up their indebtedness at a heavy discount. T. W. Allen became surety for this debt, and on the 7th of April, 1893, Mrs. Sallie M. Miller, the appellant, conveyed to the National Bank of Baltimore, among other claims, her dower interest in all of her husband's real estate, and particularly her dower rights in the Moore farm, to indemnify and save harmless T. W. Allen, who had become security for the large sum borrowed by her husband and D. F. Kagey. In May, 1894, when this indebtedness was reduced to $15,000, Allen was compelled to give his three notes of $5,000 each therefor, and to secure the same on a valuable farm owned by him, which was subsequently sold to satisfy the same. It satisfactorily appears from the evidence that the three payments of $450 each which appellant now insists should be credited upon her purchase money, which belongs to the creditors in this case, were the proceeds of notes discounted for the purpose of paying the National Bank of Baltimore the semiannual interest due to it on the Allen notes, amounting to $15,000; that the remittances were directly to the bank, and applied at the time in the manner indicated. This transaction by Kagey and Miller with the National Bank of Baltimore was an outside matter with which the creditors of the trust fund had no connection, and in which they had no interest. These payments contributed nothing to the trust fund to which appellant's purchase money belonged, and they should not be permitted to diminish it. The learned judge of the circuit court, in disposing of this question, says: "It is insisted by Mrs. Miller that it was agreed between Allen and herself that she was to have credit on her bonds, which were held by the bank as collateral for this loan. I have refused to sanction this transfer of these bonds in the nature of a collateral, and I cannot see how the court can in any way recognize the loan on which Allen was security. It is not pretended that the bank was any party to the agreement alleged between Mrs. Miller and Allen. On the contrary, it clearly appears that under the direction and with the knowledge of all concerned the bank applied the payments to the discount due on the Allen notes. The money was paid to the bank for that purpose, and I must hold that the alleged understanding between Mrs. Miller and Allen is not a proper subject of inquiry in this litigation." The bonds of Mrs. Miller constituted part of a trust estate to which the creditors of Kagey and Miller were entitled. The debt to which the payments in question were applied was an outside transaction, contracted in the name of Allen subsequent to the date of the deed of trust, and not one of the debts entitled to participate in the trust assets. These payments thus made and applied to the accruing interest on the Allen notes were properly rejected as credits upon the purchase money due the trust creditors from the appellant.

The third and last ground of error suggested is that appellant was not allowed credit upon her purchase money for certain liens against the Moore farm, alleged to have been acquired by her.

These claims constituted part of the paramount liens which existed upon the Moore farm at the time of its purchase by J. W. Miller, and were paid by him during the time that he was in the possession, use, and enjoyment of the farm. J. W. Miller was authorized by decree to pay these liens directly to the parties entitled thereto, and the evidence is conclusive that he paid the claims in question from the proceeds of the farm while he owned it, and from the proceeds of his business, as agent for the sale of fertilizer. The record shows that at the time these claims were paid the appellant owned no separate estate which could have been applied to their payment. There is no contention that she owned any estate until her purchase of this farm, which was after the claims had been paid. The evidence of the appellant shows that J. W. Miller made the money and paid the liens; and further shows that at the time of her purchase of the farm she was not aware that her husband pretended to have bought for her any claims against it. When J. W. Miller paid the claims in question, he took receipts in his wife's name, and it is contended that he could thus keep them alive as liens upon the farm for her benefit. This position is not tenable. "It is a well-settled principle that payment by one who is primarily liable to one entitled to collect the debt is an extinguishment of the debt and all liability thereunder. However held, or however transferred or assigned, it is ever afterwards a mere nullity." Smith v. Waugh, 84 Va. 808, 6 S. E. 132; Citizens' Bank v. Lay, 80 Va. 436; Daniel on Neg. Instruments, §§ 1221, 1222.

In the case at bar the one who owed these claims paid them with his own means directly to the several parties entitled to collect, and it is clear from all the evidence bearing upon the subject that the appellant is not entitled to credit upon her purchase money due the creditors in this case for the claims under consideration.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that there is no error in the decrees appealed from, and they must be affirmed.

PERSINGER'S ADM'X v. ALLEGHANY ORE & IRON CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 21, 1904.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES—NEGLIGENCE—ANTICIPATED DANGERS.

1. A contrivance for washing ore consisted of a large box containing machinery, and there unnecessarily projected into the box the end of an engine shaft on the end of which was a small "jagger," or point of iron about an eighth of an inch by three-sixteenths of an inch in size. A servant, who had been in the box repairing some of the machinery, was leaving the box, when his clothing caught on the "jagger," and, the shaft being in motion, he was killed. The point where the repairs were being made was 32 inches from the end of the shaft, and the space between the side of the box and end of the shaft, which space he had to pass through on leaving the box, was 3½ feet. Held, that the master was not liable, as the accident was not a probable consequence of the conditions.

Error to Circuit Court, Botetourt County.

Action by the administratrix of W. D. Persinger against the Alleghany Ore & Iron Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Benjamin Haden, for plaintiff in error. A. A. Phlegar and P. H. C. Cabell, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an action to recover damages for the killing of William D. Persinger, caused, as his administratrix claims, by the defendant company's negligence.

Upon the trial of the cause in the circuit court the defendant, without introducing any testimony, demurred to the plaintiff's evidence. The court sustained the demurrer, and rendered judgment for the defendant. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The material facts are the following: The defendant owns and operates, among other things, machinery for washing ore, and Mr. Persinger was employed by the defendant to oil the machinery and to do such other work as he might be directed to perform. The part of the washer in which Mr. Persinger was killed was at least 6 feet wide and about 30 feet long, as counsel seem to agree. The depth of the box does not appear from the record. Extending through this box lengthwise were two logs, parallel to each other, 1 foot each in diameter, and about 30 inches apart. To these logs were attached spiral flanges or paddles about 8 inches long. The logs ran east and west, and to the west end of each log was attached an iron gudgeon, which rested on the end of the box. Upon these gudgeons were fixed gear wheels, which were driven by means of a main shaft by a steam engine located on the south side of the box. The ore as it came from the mines was dumped into the box, through which flowed a stream of water. The logs revolved in opposite directions. The paddles on them stirred up the ore, and by reason of their spiral arrangement forced the ore to one end of the box, the water carrying off the dirt to the other end. On the south side of the box, and 32 inches from the west end of it, was a pulley on the engine shaft, over which was a band which operated the washer. This shaft from the engine projected into the box, unnecessarily, 28 inches, the end of it reaching an inch or two beyond the north side of the nearest log. In the end of the shaft was a key set or groove for fastening the pulley or wheel which might be placed thereon. On one of the corners of the key set, and on the inner side thereof, was a little "jagger," or point of iron, about one-eighth of an inch by three-sixteenths of an inch in size, and made apparently by a blow from a hammer on the end of the shaft. From the end of the shaft to the north side of the box was about 3½ feet.

On the day of the accident one of these logs broke, and Mr. Persinger was ordered to aid other employes in removing the logs from the bed when not engaged in oiling the machinery of the washer, which continued its work except in that bed. In order to remove these logs, it was necessary to take the gear wheel off the west end of the log, over which the engine shaft projected. There was some difficulty in getting the key out which held the wheel in its place. Three other men, at least, had attempted to get it out. Two of them had gone out of the bed to get a more suitable implement to work with. The other employe, Rock, and Mr. Persinger attempted to get the key out, and were unable to do so with the key drift which they had. They determined to go out of the box also, and get a more suitable key drift, Rock leaving first. As Mr. Persinger was going out, his overall jacket caught upon the "jagger" on the end of the main shaft, which was making from 75 to 100 revolutions per minute, and was wrapped around it, and he was dragged or whirled around the shaft and killed.

The plaintiff charges that the defendant was negligent in unnecessarily and improperly allowing the main shaft to extend into the bed where the accident occurred, and in permitting the "jagger" to remain on the end thereof, and in operating the shaft while its employes were removing the logs and repairing the bed in which they were.

The rule is well settled that it is the duty of the master to exercise ordinary care in providing a reasonably safe place in which his servants are to work. Robinson's Adm'r v. Dininny, 96 Va. 41, 42, 30 S. E. 442; McDonald's Adm'r v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 95 Va. 98, 105, 27 S. E. 821; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin's Adm'r, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. 869; N. & P. R. R. Co. v. Ormsby, 27 Grat. 455.

Ordinary care depends upon the circumstances of the particular case, and is such care as persons of ordinary prudence would, under the circumstances, have exercised. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Cromer's Adm'r, 99 Va. 763, 764, 40 S. E. 54; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin's Adm'r, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. 869; N. & P. R. R. Co. v. Ormsby, 27 Grat. 455.

If the accident which occurred was one at all likely to happen—if it was a probable consequence that an employe working in the bed would be injured or killed by having his clothing caught upon the little "jagger" on the end of the revolving shaft, as was the plaintiff's intestate—the trial court erred in sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the evidence. But can the accident be said to be one which ordinarily prudent men would have been likely to anticipate?

The revolving shaft, which extended into the bed further than was necessary, was fully exposed to sight. The "jagger" on which the clothing of the deceased caught was in size not over one-eighth of an inch by three-sixteenths of an inch, was on the inner side of the key set, and so small that you had to look closely to see it. The gear wheel which Mr. Persinger and other employes were trying to remove from the log was 32 inches from the end of the shaft, and the space through which he had to pass in going out of the box north of the end of the shaft was 3½ feet. It is insisted by counsel for the plaintiff that the box was only some 40 inches deep, and that the cover or floor on top of it made it necessary for the employes working in it to move about in a stooping position, and prevented them from going out of the box except through the space between the ends of the paddles upon the logs, which was only about 14 inches wide and very near the end of the shaft.

The evidence does not sustain this contention. It is apparent from the questions asked the witnesses, as well as from their answers, that the top or floor over the box did not, in its then condition, interfere with the employes in doing their work, or in going in or out of the box.

One of the witnesses—and the only one who testifies upon the point—states that he had been foreman of the washer for about 15 months, and that he would not have thought that jagger would catch clothing, or that it was likely to do so, but for the fact that it had done so, and but for the accident he would not have thought that it was necessary to have boxed the end of the shaft to have avoided any probability of harm. After the accident happened, it could be readily seen how the accident could have been avoided by boxing the end of the shaft; and that was done. But, as was said by Judge Cooley in Sjogren v. Hall, 53 Mich. 274, 278, 18 N. W. 812, 814: "The fact that it [the accident he was considering] was avoidable does not prove that there was fault in not anticipating and providing against it. If a farm laborer falls from the haymow, the fall does not demonstrate that the farmer was culpable for not ralling the mow in. A man stumbling in a blacksmith shop might have his hand, or even his head, thrown under the triphammer; but it would not follow that there had been any neglect of duty on the part of the blacksmith in leaving the hammer exposed. So far as there is a duty resting upon the proprietor in any of these cases, it is a duty to guard against probable dangers; and it does not go to the extent of requiring him to render accidental injury impossible. * * * If the fact that prevention was possible is to render the employer liable, then he may as well be made an insurer of the safety of those in his service in express terms, for to all intents and purposes he would in law be insurer, whether nominally so or not."

It is right that the master should be required to anticipate and guard against consequences that may reasonably be expected to occur, but it would violate every principle of justice or law if he should be compelled to foresee and provide against that which reasonable and prudent men would not expect to happen.

We are of opinion that the evidence does not show that the death of the plaintiff's intestate was the result of the defendant's negligence. The judgment of the circuit court must therefore be affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. MOORE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 14, 1904.)

APPEAL AND ERROR — AMOUNT — DECREE AGAINST DISTRIBUTEES—WILLS—CHARGE ON LAND—LIMITATIONS.

1. A decree against distributees for a debt of their decedent is substantially a decree against the decedent's estate, and, where the aggregate amount exceeds the minimum jurisdictional sum, an appeal lies on behalf of the distributees.

2. A charge by a testator of his debts on his lands creates an equitable lien for their payment, to which there is no statutory bar.

3. The statute of limitations does not begin to run in favor of a personal representative against the distributees until an order of a court having jurisdiction directing a delivery of the estate to the distributees.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clarke County.

Suit by Annie M. Smith and others against A. Moore, Jr. Decree for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

F. B. Whiting, Blackburn Smith, and M. McCormick, for appellants. A. Moore, Jr., in pro. per.

CARDWELL, J. William A. Castleman qualified on January 23, 1854, in the county court of Clarke county, as executor of the will of Jacob Isler, deceased; giving bond for $50,000, with six sureties, including Treadwell Smith. In 1873 Champ Shepherd and others, legatees and devisees, or otherwise interested, under the will of Jacob Isler, filed their bill in the county court of Clarke county against Castleman, executor of Jacob Isler, such of his sureties on his executorial bond as were then living, the personal representatives of such as were dead, including R. R. Smith and Charles H. Smith, executors of Treadwell Smith, who had died leaving a will charging his real estate with the payment of his debts, the object of which suit was to have a settlement and distribution of Jacob Isler's estate. At the August term, 1873, of the county court of Clarke county, the cause was by decree removed to the circuit court of that county; and at the February term, 1874, of the circuit court, it was referred to Commissioner Louthan to state, among other things, the executorial accounts of Castleman, executor, etc., so as to show what amount was in his hands, due to his testator's estate; and Commissioner Louthan having filed his report, to which there were no exceptions, ascertaining that Castleman, as executor, was largely indebted to his testator's estate, a decree was entered on November 27, 1874, against him and his sureties, or their personal representatives, for sundry sums of money in favor of Jacob Isler's legatees or their assigns, including A. Moore, Jr., who, as substituted trustee in the place of R. E. Byrd, recovered $1,050.16, with interest on $596.98 from June 1, 1874, by virtue of a deed of trust executed on April 2, 1860, by G. H. Isler, a son of Jacob Isler, deceased, conveying to R. E. Byrd, trustee, his interest in his father's estate, for the purpose of securing the payment of certain debts named in the deed. At the February term, 1877, of the said court, this decree, as to A. Moore, Jr., substituted trustee, was revived against Castleman, executor, and his sureties; and on March 5, 1877, an execution of f. fa. was issued against them, which was returned, "No property found."

In 1878 Annie M. Smith, one of the devisees of Treadwell Smith, deceased, filed her bill in the cause out of which this appeal arises, asking, among other things, that the debts of Treadwell Smith be ascertained; that they be held a charge under his will on his lands in the hands of each devisee, according to such devisee's interest therein, these devisees having in 1874 made partition of the lands among themselves, and each one having taken possession of the part assigned him. This cause was by decree of February 6, 1883, referred to one of the commissioners of the court, who was directed to ascertain and report, among other things, the indebtedness of the estate of Treadwell Smith, deceased; and, while the cause was pending before the commissioner, David Craufurd's administrator presented a large claim against the estate, which was earnestly contested by the executors and devisees of Treadwell Smith, the litigation over it continuing until October 1, 1896, when it was finally ended by the decision of this court in Craufurd's Adm'r v. Smith's Ex'r, 93 Va. 623, 23 S. E. 235, 25 S. E. 657.

By a decree entered October 30, 1875, in this cause (Annie M. Smith v. Treadwell Smith's Ex'r, etc.), reciting that there had been no convention of the creditors of Treadwell Smith, deceased, and no settlement, except ex parte, of the accounts of his executors, the cause was again referred to a commissioner to state and report (1) the accounts of Treadwell Smith's executors; (2) an account of the debts against his estate remaining unpaid, to whom due, etc., and the priority of any liens on the estate; and (3) what real estate of which Treadwell Smith died seised is subject to the payment of his debts, and, if the land of which he died seised had been partitioned among his devisees, how much of the unpaid debts was chargeable to each share.

Responding to this decree, Commissioner Kownslar filed his report on May 22, 1897, setting forth that one of the executors of Treadwell Smith had informed him that the executors had received no funds since their previous settlement, and reporting certain debts outstanding against Treadwell Smith's estate, including the debt asserted by A. Moore, Jr., substituted trustee, stating that this debt as reported was in any event due from Smith's estate, but, as he was a co-surety, in case the amount due by any one or more of the other sureties was not paid the liability of Smith's estate would be increased, as it was ultimately liable for the whole debt. He further reported that, by his will, Treadwell Smith charged his real estate with the payment of his debts, and that the whole of the estate had been divided among his devisees; setting forth the quantity and description of the real estate received by each devisee in this division. The report of Commissioner Kownslar was several times re-committed to him because of exceptions there-to filed by Treadwell Smith's executors and devisees or others—among other things, to take such evidence as might be adduced before him in support of and against the claim of Jacob Isler's legatees, and make report upon the evidence taken; the claim referred to being the claim here under investigation, and asserted by A. Moore, Jr., substituted trustee, against Treadwell Smith's devisees. In obedience to this direction of the court, Commissioner Kownslar filed his report of May 7, 1899, in which he restated the debt in question, and returned with his report all the evidence adduced for and against the claim, consisting of exhibits, depositions, and agreements of counsel; and by decree of November 17, 1898, the cause was again re-committed to Commissioner Kownslar, with the direction, among others, to take such further evidence as the parties interested might lay before him in support of or against this claim. Responding to this decree, the commissioner filed his report, again restating the debt, and returning therewith the further evidence adduced before him by the parties interested; and upon a final hearing of the cause the decree appealed from to this court was entered, by which it was adjudged that A. Moore, Jr., substituted trustee, do recover of the devisees of Treadwell Smith ("there being no personal estate out of which the amounts hereby decreed can be paid") the sum of $952.58, with interest on $596.98 from December 1, 1898, to be paid one-fifth by Chas. H. Smith, one-fifth by Annie M. Smith, one-fifth by Chas. H. Smith, administrator of Emily Smith, one-fifth out of the proceeds of the sale of the land of R. R. Smith, one-tenth by Sarah J. Crown, and one-tenth by J. Rice Smith.

It is contended by appellee that the appeal should be dismissed as improvidently awarded, because the amount decreed to be paid by each of the devisees is below the minimum jurisdictional limit of appeals to this court. Were not the executors of Treadwell Smith, as well as his devisees, appealing, this contention could not be sustained. "Where for a debt of a decedent there is no decree in solido against his personal representative, but severally against each distributee for his proportion of the debt which exceeds $500, substantially it is a decree against the decedent's estate; and, as it exceeds in the aggregate the minimum jurisdictional sum, an appeal lies from the decree on behalf of the distributees." Udike's Adm'r v. Lane, 78 Va. 132.

The opinion in that case with reference to the motion to dismiss the appeal because the amount decreed against each of the distributees was less than $500 disposes of the question as follows. "As to the point raised, it is sufficient to say, though there is not a decree against the administrator in form, yet in substance it is as much a decree against the decedent's estate, and for the full amount of $768.87 then due on his bond, as if the decree had been for that sum in solido; the apportionment being specified in the decree for mere convenience." See, also, Ryan's Adm'r v. McLeod, 32 Grat. 367, where the opinion by Stables, J., says that, "upon a principle universally conceded and repeatedly acted upon by this court, lands of all the devisees should bear their ratable proportion of the debts in the first instance, instead of decreeing against one, and turning him around upon the others for contribution."

It is clear from these authorities that it is well settled that where there are no assets in the hands of the personal representatives of the debtor, out of which a debt asserted against a decedent's estate may be satisfied, as is the case at bar, it is proper to decree against each of the distributees or devisees for his proportion of the debt, which is substantially a decree against the decedent's estate, and, the debt in the aggregate exceeding the minimum jurisdictional sum, an appeal lies from the decree to this court in behalf of the distributees or devisees.

Appellants' 1st, 2d, and 9th assignments of error raise the question whether or not their pleas of payment, laches, and the statute of limitations filed before Commissioner Kownslar, and overruled by the court below, should have been sustained.

As to the plea of payment, the only evidence in support of it is the deposition of R. R. Smith, one of the executors of Treadwell Smith; and he does not pretend to claim that the debt has been paid, or state any circumstances from which the presumption of payment could be drawn. When asked if he had in his possession receipts for all money paid out by him as one of Treadwell Smith's executors, and, if not, what became of them, his answer was: "I don't know of any receipts that I have. I lost some of my papers, and may have lost some receipts among them." And upon cross-examination he was asked if he had ever made a settlement of his accounts as executor of Treadwell Smith, to which he replied: "I put all my accounts in the hands of Capt. Nelson for settlement, and suppose it was done." This settlement by Capt. Nelson, commissioner of accounts for Clarke county, appears in the record, and shows that no credit was given on account of any payment to appellee or on his claim. There appears in the record a list of the debts, and the order of their priority, to be paid out of the funds to which appellee was making claim; and, because it further appears that he has paid one or more of the debts out of their order of priority, it is contended that all other debts having priority over those paid by appellee must be presumed to have been paid.

In answer to this contention, it is sufficient to say that, if appellee has misapplied the funds that may have come to his hands, it is a matter between him and those whose funds have been so misapplied, and does not concern appellants, or affect their liability for the debt in question.

With reference to the question of laches, the most that can be said is that there is apparent tardiness in the prosecution of the claim; but, in view of the circumstances surrounding the settlement of Treadwell Smith's estate, the number and character of the debts asserted against it, and the long drawn out litigation over one of them, at least—that of David Crawford's administrator—it cannot be said that this apparent tardiness on the part of appellee amounts to inexcusable delay, or has placed appellants in such a position that a court of equity should relieve them from the payment of his claim.

As has been observed, the will of Treadwell Smith charged his real estate with the payment of his debts, and this charge constitutes an equitable lien on the lands now in the possession of appellants, his devisees, to which lien there is no statutory bar, unless the debt is barred as against the estate of Treadwell Smith. It is true that the liability of Treadwell Smith for the debt here in question originated as far back as 1854, when he became one of the sureties of Castleman as executor of Jacob Isler; but as there appears no order by a court having jurisdiction of the accounts of the executor, acting upon a settlement of his accounts, and directing a delivery of the estate to the distributees of Jacob Isler, deceased (section 2921 of the Code of 1887), no cause of action against Treadwell Smith's estate or his devisees arose until the decree of November 27, 1874, in Champ Shepherd, etc., v. Jacob Isler's, Ex'r, etc., supra, whereby it was ascertained that Castleman, as executor, was largely indebted to his testator's estate, and a liability fixed upon the sureties on his official bond, including Treadwell Smith, for the debt now asserted by appellee. This decree was conclusive of the question whether or not the debt was barred by the statute as against Treadwell Smith's estate, and determine that it was not.

In Crawford's Adm'r v. Smith's Ex'r, supra, it was held that the suit, if not when brought a creditors' suit, became such by the entry of the decree therein of February 6, 1883, supra, and the statute of limitations then ceased to run against the creditors of Treadwell Smith's estate. From some cause, undisclosed by the record, unless it was by reason of the litigation over the large claim of David Crawford's administrator, asserted against Treadwell Smith's estate, above referred to, the decree of reference of February 6, 1883, was not executed; and another decree was made in October, 1895, to convene the creditors of Treadwell Smith's estate, during the pendency of which before Commissioner Kownslar appellee appeared and asserted his claim. It was then, for the reasons stated, not barred by the statute of limitations, and therefore appellants' plea of the statute was rightly overruled.

Of the remaining assignments of error, a number of them relate to the action of the circuit court in recommitting the report of Commissioner Kownslar for further proof of appellee's claim, but, beside the fact that appellants excepted to the reports of the commissioner, demanding further proof of the claim, they were in no way prejudiced by the cautious action of the court in allowing the fullest opportunity for proof in support of and against the claim.

Appellants further contend that the circuit court erred in considering the decree of November, 1874, in Champ Shepherd and others v. Castleman, Ex'r, etc., supra, as evidence against them; but, as has been observed, under the will of Treadwell Smith the lands in the possession of his devisees stand charged with the payment of his debts, which constitutes an equitable lien on the lands, to which there is no statutory bar; the debt not being barred as against the estate of the testator, and the suit in which the decree was entered being for a settlement of the accounts of Castleman as executor of Jacob Isler, in which it was proper to decree against him in favor of those entitled to his estate; and the claim asserted by appellee being founded upon a decree therein in favor of G. H. Isler, one of the distributees of Jacob Isler, under whom appellee claims, so long as the decree remained unreversed it had full force and effect, as well against Treadwell Smith, the surety, as against Castleman, the executor. Franklin's Adm'r v. Depriest, 13 Grat. 257; Crawford v. Turk, 24 Grat. 176; Supervisors, etc., v. Dunn, 27 Grat. 608; Carr et al. v. Meade's Ex'r, 77 Va. 142.

The remaining assignment of error requiring consideration is on the ground that appellee has failed to show that all parties interested under the deed of trust from G. H. Isler to R. E. Byrd, trustee, were before the court when he was substituted in the place of Byrd as trustee. As has been pointed out, the substitution of appellee as trustee in the place of Byrd was in the suit of Champ Shepherd and others v. Jacob Isler's Ex'r and others, supra, to which Treadwell Smith's executors were parties; and the decree is to be given full force and effect, it not having been reversed. It cannot be attacked by the appellants collaterally. Franklin's Adm'r v. Depriest, supra.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the decree appealed from must be affirmed.

WEST v. RICHMOND RY. & ELECTRIC CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 21, 1904.)

APPEAL AND ERROR—CERTIORARI—DIMINUTION OF RECORD—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—NECESSITY.

1. A writ of certiorari can issue only when diminution of the record is suggested.

2. The evidence is not a part of the record unless made so by bill of exceptions.

3. Unless a proper bill of exceptions is taken, setting forth specifically and definitely the allegation of error relied on and so much of the evidence as is necessary to enable the appellate court to pass intelligently upon the question raised, the judgment of the trial court must be sustained.

Error to Circuit Court, Henrico County.

H. R. Pollard and E. M. Long, for plaintiff in error. Christian & Christian and M. M. Martin, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This is the second appeal in this case. Upon the first trial there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff in error, who was the plaintiff in the court below, which judgment was reversed by this court on the ground of a material departure in the testimony from the case made by the declaration. The case was remanded to the circuit court for a new trial, with leave to the plaintiff, if so advised, to file an amended declaration. Richmond Railway & Elec. Co. v. West, 100 Va. 184, 40 S. E. 643.

At the new trial, upon an amended declaration, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, upon which the judgment now under review was rendered. Upon that trial the circuit court excluded all the testimony adduced by the plaintiff, or rather instructed the jury to disregard the testimony of the plaintiff, because the amended declaration charged one act of negligence, while the evidence tended to prove another. In other words, in the opinion of the circuit court there was on the second trial, as on the first, a fatal variance between the allegations of the declaration and the evidence relied on to support them. The plaintiff excepted to the ruling of the court, and doubtless intended to embody the testimony in the bill of exceptions; but the record, as copied and certified by the clerk, contains no part of the evidence. It is true there is printed in the same pamphlet with and immediately following the transcript of the record certified by the clerk what purports to be a stenographic report of the evidence at the trial, and it is insisted here that there was an agreement between counsel in the lower court that the report so produced might be treated as part of the record, as if the same had been regularly made a part thereof. That statement, however, is controverted, and an issue is thus raised the merits of which this court cannot undertake to determine. In this connection it appears that the stenographic report of the evidence in question was not lodged with the clerk of the circuit court until months after he had made out and certified a copy of the record and the case was on the argument docket of this court. It is also insisted that upon the foregoing facts this court ought to award a writ of certiorari to compel the clerk of the circuit court to certify the report of the evidence produced as part of the record. But the facts relied on to warrant the issuance of a writ of certiorari not only do not suggest a diminution of the record, but, to the contrary, show affirmatively that the report of the evidence constitutes no part of the record. It is apparent, therefore, that this court has no power to relieve existing conditions, either by certiorari or otherwise. It is settled practice that the evidence is not a part of the record, unless made so by bill of exceptions, and, if copied into the record by the clerk, it cannot be considered by this court.

In Cunningham v. Mitchell, 4 Rand. 189, Judge Green says: "The certificate of the clerk that these papers were the evidence upon which the judgment was founded cannot be received as part of the record. His certificate to that effect can have no more effect than that of any other individual. He can certify that such records exist in his office, but not what use was made of them. That ought to have been shown by the record, and it was the duty of the party wishing to avail himself of the fact to have made it a part of the record." Preston v. The Auditor, 1 Call, 471; Bowyer v. Chesnut, 4 Leigh, 1; Roanoke Land & Improvement Co. v. Karn & Hickson, 80 Va. 589; Johnston v. Norton Land & Improvement Co., 90 Va. 267, 18 S. E. 86.

All presumptions are in favor of the correctness of the judgment of the court below and against the exceptor, and, unless a proper bill of exceptions is taken, setting forth specifically and definitely the allegation of error relied on and so much of the evidence as is necessary to enable the appellate court to pass intelligently upon the question raised, the judgment of the trial court must be sustained. The plaintiff in error having failed to observe that requirement by having the evidence at the trial incorporated in the record, this court has nothing before it upon which to base an opinion with respect to the ruling of the court in the particular complained of. Fitzhugh v. Fitzhugh, 11 Grat. 300; Washington & New Orleans Tel. Co. v. Hobson, 15 Grat. 122; Powell v. Tarry, 77 Va. 250; Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 269, 274, 276, 12 S. E. 671; Ferguson v. Willis, 88 Va. 136, 140, 13 S. E. 392; Trumbo's Adm'r v. Street Car Co., 89 Va. 780, 17 S. E. 124; Holleran v. Miesel, 91 Va. 143, 21 S. E. 658; Ampey's Case, 93 Va. 108, 25 S. E. 226; Longley v. Commonwealth, 99 Va. 807, 813, 37 S. E. 339.

¶ 1. See Appeal and Error, vol. 3, Cent. Dig. § 2367.

With respect to the suggested hardship of disposing of the case in the absence of the evidence, it may be remarked that the court is not responsible for the omission and is powerless to supply the deficiency. In the practical administration of justice, courts must be satisfied to enforce the law as they find it. They cannot undertake to prevent hardship in particular cases by a departure from established principles.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

RHULE v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO.

EJECTMENT—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF—INTRUDER—DESCRIPTION OF PREMISES—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE—APPEAL.

1. The general rule is that the right of a plaintiff to recover in ejectment rests on the strength of his own title. However, as against an intrusion by a stranger without title on a peaceable possession, such possession alone is sufficient to maintain the action.

2. Under section 2729 of the Code of 1887, the description of the premises in a declaration in ejectment is sufficient if the premises are described with such convenient certainty as that, from such description, possession thereof may be delivered.

3. All objections to the verdict on demurrer to the evidence upon the ground of excessive damages must be presented to the trial court by a motion for a new trial, or to require the party in whose favor the verdict was rendered to remit part of the damages awarded by the jury. The objection cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court.

Error to Circuit Court, Henrico County.

Saml. A. Anderson and P. A. L. Smith, for plaintiff in error. Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. This is an action of ejectment, brought in the circuit court of Henrico county by Mrs. Rhule against the Seaboard Air Line Railway, to recover a piece of land. There was a demurrer to the declaration upon the grounds: First, that it fails to show the legal title to the property to be in the plaintiff; and, secondly, that it does not sufficiently describe the property in question.

The plaintiff introduced her evidence, and, the defendant having demurred, the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, subject to the demurrer to the evidence, for the premises demanded, and assessed the damages at $900. Upon this verdict the circuit court entered the judgment which is now before us for review.

We deem it unnecessary to discuss the plaintiff's title. The general rule is that the right of a plaintiff to recover in ejectment rests on the strength of his own title, and is not established by the exhibition of defects in that of the defendant, who may maintain his defense by simply showing that the title is not in the plaintiff, but in some one else. "The rule is thus broadly stated by the authorities without qualification, but there are exceptions to the rule thus announced as well established as the rule itself. Whether the case of an intrusion by a stranger without title, on a peaceable possession, is not one to meet the exigencies of which the courts will recognize a still further qualification or explanation of the rule allowing the plaintiff to recover only on the strength of his own title is a question which, I believe, has not as yet been decided by this court." This statement of the law with reference to the rule and its exceptions is taken from the opinion of Judge Daniel in Tapscott v. Cobbs, 11 Grat. 172—a case which was decided in 1854, has been frequently relied upon since that time, and the correctness of which, so far as we have been able to discover, has never been called in question. Olinger v. Shepherd, 12 Grat. 462; Atkins v. Lewis, 14 Grat. 30; Miller v. Williams, 15 Grat. 213.

The Supreme Court of the United States enunciates the same doctrine in Christy v. Scott, 14 How. 282, 14 L. Ed. 422, where it is said that "a mere intruder cannot enter on a person actually seized and eject him, and then question his title. The maxim that the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of the defendant's, is applicable to all actions for the recovery of property. But if the plaintiff had actual possession of the land, this is strong enough to enable him to recover it from a mere trespasser who entered without any title."

These authorities seem quite sufficient to maintain a doctrine so consonant to reason and so necessary to the peace and order of society.

It appears from the evidence that the plaintiff in error was at the time of the institution of this suit, and for a number of years prior thereto had been, in the peaceful and undisturbed possession of the premises in question. The record fails to show a shadow of right in the defendant in error to disturb that possession. The jury, upon a demurrer to the evidence, had a right to deem the defendant in error not only a naked trespasser, but one who had acted in a harsh and arbitrary manner. This being so, the case of the plaintiff in error is plainly within the influence of the exception, which the authorities above quoted show is as well established as the rule, and that, as against an intrusion by a stranger without title on a peaceable possession, such possession alone is sufficient to maintain the action of ejectment.

Coming now to the description of the property, it must be conceded that in this respect the declaration is not all that could be desired; but we do not feel warranted in holding that the premises claimed are not described with such convenient certainty as that, from such description, possession thereof may not be delivered. Code 1887, § 2729. The statute obviously does not mean to require any great nicety or exactness, and the authorities are to the same effect. To discuss in detail the cases which illustrate the degree of certainty required in describing the premises demanded in ejectment would be profitless, as they leave each case to be adjudicated upon its individual merits.

It is earnestly insisted by counsel for defendant in error that the damages are excessive, and that, although the court may be of opinion that the plaintiff in error was entitled to a judgment for the premises in controversy, it ought not to enter a final judgment in favor of the plaintiff in error, but should remand the case for a new trial.

There was no motion made in the circuit court for a new trial. There was no objection in that court to the damages awarded, and it cannot be made for the first time in this court.

In Humphrey's Adm'r's v. West's Adm'r's, 3 Rand., at page 518, this court said that "the only question for the consideration of the court on a demurrer to evidence is whether the evidence supports the issue, or not, and the judgment is that it does or does not support it. After the demurrer is joined, the jury may either be discharged, and, if the judgment be that the evidence does support the issue, a writ of inquiry of damages is awarded, or the jury then impaneled may go on to assess conditional damages.

"But in either case the question is with the jury, not with the court, as to the question of damages, subject, as in all other cases, to the superintending control of the court to grant a new trial in case the damages are excessive. That, however, rests with the court before whom the trial was had, and that, too, upon a motion to that court for a new trial; there being no case in which that court is bound, ex mero motu, and without motion, to grant a new trial, and subject the defendant, without his consent, to greater damages. The appellate court cannot grant such new trial, for that would be to reverse the judgment of an inferior court on a motion for a new trial here, which was not made to that court, and of course on a matter in which that court committed no error." See, also, Newberry v. Williams, 89 Va. 298, 15 S. E. 865, and N. & W. R. R. v. Dunaway, 93 Va., at page 33, 24 S. E. 698.

In the last case cited many authorities were reviewed, and the conclusion was reached that it is not necessary for a motion for a new trial to be made in the trial court in order to have the judgment on demurrer to the evidence reviewed in the appellate court, but that it would not be proper to consider the quantum of damages as being too great or too small, unless objection to the verdict upon that ground was presented in the trial court. Had that question been presented, the circuit court might have required the plaintiff to remit a part of the damages, or if, in a proper case, the defendant had asked the court to require the plaintiff to remit a part of the damages awarded by the jury, and the court had declined to do so, the question would then have been properly before this court for consideration; but, as presented to us, it is controlled by Humphrey's Adm'r's v. West's Adm'r's, supra, which has long been the unquestioned law of this forum.

The judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and this court will enter a judgment in accordance with the verdict of the jury.

SMITH v. LAFAR, Chief Constable.

DISPENSARY CONSTABLE—ILLEGAL SEIZURE OF WHISKY—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

1. In a suit against a dispensary constable for the malicious and unlawful seizure from an express company of whisky in transit to plaintiff, where defendant pleads a general denial he may prove that plaintiff was engaged in the illegal sale of whisky, and had such a reputation in the community in which he lived, and allegation of such facts in the answer will not be stricken out.

2. Where a dispensary constable seizes liquors shipped from one state to another by express while in the possession of the express company, an action lies against him if the liquor was shipped for personal use; and Cr. Code 1902, § 600, providing that chapter 1, tit. 7, Code Civ. Proc., relating to provisional remedies, shall not apply to an officer having duties to perform, and that in no case shall an action lie against such an officer for damage to person or property, does not prohibit such action, chapter 1, tit. 7, of such Code, relating to arrest and bail.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Watts, Judge.

Action by Calvin Smith against S. G. Lafar, chief state constable. From order dismissing the complaint, the plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Oscar K. Mauldin and Oscar Hodges, for appellant. Heyward, Deane & Earle, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff in his complaint alleges the shipment by express to him from Statesville, N. C., to Greenville, S. C., of one gallon of corn whisky, purchased in Statesville exclusively for his own personal use, and the malicious, willful, and unlawful seizure from the express company of the whisky by the defendant, a dispensary constable; that he gave the defendant full notice before the seizure that the whisky had been purchased in Statesville, N. C., and was intended for his own personal use; that he was damaged by said seizure to the amount of $500. The answer denies the whisky was purchased in Statesville, or shipped therefrom, or that it was intended for personal use, or that plaintiff notified him that it was so intended, and that it had been purchased in Statesville or shipped therefrom, or that the plaintiff had been damaged. The denial of the eighth paragraph of the complaint, alleging the notice above referred to, is somewhat irregular in form, but its sufficiency is not now before the court. No direct reference is made in the answer to the seventh paragraph of the complaint, in which defendant is charged with willful, malicious, and unlawful seizure; but the third paragraph of the answer contains the following: "Further answering, defendant alleges that, if liquor was seized in transit to plaintiff, such seizure was legal and proper, the said plaintiff having the reputation of a liquor dealer, and having been convicted of selling liquor in violation of law, and at the times alleged in his complaint herein, as defendant is informed and believes, the said plaintiff was maintaining in the city of Greenville a place where persons were allowed to resort for the purpose of drinking liquor, and where it was bargained or sold or given away in violation of law." The plaintiff moved to strike out this second defense on the ground that it is irrelevant, immaterial, redundant, argumentative, and does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. The motion was denied, and the first exception draws in question the correctness of the decision.

It is the duty of dispensary constables to seize contraband liquor as directed by the statute law of the state. If, however, they seize liquor not contraband, they go beyond the law, and violate individual right. If this is done willfully and maliciously, they are liable for punitive damages. Liquor purchased in another state and shipped to the purchaser in this state is not contraband, being protected as an article of interstate commerce until it is delivered to the purchaser. Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 412, 18 Sup. Ct. 664, 42 L. Ed. 1088; State v. Holleman, 55 S. C. 244, 31 S. E. 622, 33 S. E. 366, 45 L. R. A. 567. The fact that the purchaser to whom it is consigned is engaged in the illicit sale of liquor, and purchases it for the purpose of resale, can make no difference. The liquor is none the less an article of interstate commerce, and cannot be legally seized until it is delivered to the consignee. For these reasons, taking this language of the answer alone without connecting it with what had been already said in the answer, it would not be a defense, for it would amount to nothing more than saying, although the liquor might have been in transit from the seller in North Carolina to the purchaser in South Carolina, and therefore exempt from seizure, yet, as it was in transit to one who had the reputation of dealing in contraband liquor, and who was actually engaged in that unlawful pursuit, its seizure was lawful. Under the authorities above cited it is manifest this would be no defense, if the defendant seized the liquor knowing it was exempt by reason of being in transit from the seller in North Carolina. We find, however, the defendant had before in the answer denied the liquor was in transit, or that he had received any notice from the plaintiff to that effect. This is not an action to recover the value of the whisky, but for punitive damages for seizing liquor not contraband, willfully and maliciously. The issue therefore is whether there was a willful and malicious violation of the plaintiff's rights—an intentional abuse of official power, and malicious purpose to oppress.

Even if the liquor was exempt, the material inquiry in a case of this kind is whether the constable knew, or ought to have known, it was exempt, or was he endeavoring with due caution to honestly exercise the duties of his office in making the seizure? In meeting this issue the fact that the plaintiff had the reputation of being a liquor dealer, and had been convicted of selling liquor contrary to law, and that he habitually kept liquor for sale in violation of the law the constable was required to enforce, would be a very cogent defense. Those who habitually engage in the illicit sale of liquor are professional criminals, and it would be, indeed, singular that a constable charged with unlawfully, willfully, and maliciously seizing the kind of property with which they ply their trade should not be allowed, after denying the notice of the exemption imputed to him by the plaintiff, to allege and prove the reputation of the defendant as an illicit liquor dealer, and the fact that he was actually engaged in selling contraband liquor, in rebuttal of the charge of willful and malicious seizure of exempt liquor. It is possible for a burglar to have shipped to him a kit of tools, intending to use them for the exclusive purpose of opening his own safe, but it would be a very effective defense for a police officer, charged with willful and malicious tort in seizing the tools, to allege and prove their owner was known as a professional cracksmen, and was actually engaged in plying his trade with other tools when the tools intended for a lawful purpose were seized. It is true, as a general rule, reputation, good or bad, may not be pleaded or proved as a defense in a civil action. Exceptions to this rule embrace actions for breach of promise, seduction, malicious prosecution, libel and slander, assault and battery. As another exception, "in actions of tort, wherever the defendant is charged with fraud from mere circumstances, evidence of his general good character is admissible to repel it." Greenleaf on Evidence, 54; Dawkins v. Gault, 5 Rich. Law, 153; Werts v. Spearman, 22 S. C. 219. We have no hesitation in making a case of this kind an exception. The dispensary law requires of dispensary constables delicate and responsible duties, the vigilant discharge of which is of great importance to the public. When a person whose liquor is seized seeks to punish such an officer by recovering from him damages for intentional violation of his duty, it would be beyond all reason to deny to the officer the right to plead and prove on the issue of willfulness and malice that such person was known as a professional dealer in illicit liquors. For these reasons it seems clear the allegations are not immaterial nor irrelevant. An allegation is irrelevant when the issue framed by its denial can have no connection with nor effect upon the cause of action. Pomeroy on Remedies, § 551; Smith v. Smith, 50 S. C. 54, 27 S. E. 545.

Proof of the facts alleged here might be made under the general denial of willfulness and malice, and a general denial would have been more in accordance with the best rules of pleading. But it does not follow the allegation should be stricken out as redundant and argumentative. "If a complaint or petition should, in violation of the principles established by the reformed procedure, allege the evidence of some issuable or material fact instead of the fact itself, or should state a conclusion of law in place of the proper fact or facts which support it, these averments would be irregular, imperfect, insufficient, and liable to correction by a motion; but they might not be necessarily redundant. If the pleading was not reformed, and if the defect was not so serious as to render it demurrable, it would be treated on the trial as sufficient; and the statement of probative matter or of legal conclusions would take the place of the issuable or material facts which ought to have been averred, and would thus become material." Pomeroy on Remedies, § 551. The first exception is overruled.

The circuit judge sustained the demurrer interposed by defendant to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that suit could not be brought against the defendant individually, but must be brought upon his official bond. Since the decision of Scott v. Donald, 165 U. S. 59, 17 Sup. Ct. 265, 41 L. Ed. 632, it is not to be doubted that individuals have the right under the Constitution of the United States to import liquor into this state for their own personal use. It is equally well settled by the cases of Rhodes v. Iowa and State v. Holleyman, supra, that liquor purchased out of this state and shipped into the state does not become subject to the dispensary law until delivered to the consignee. Scott v. Donald was an action for $6,000 damages for the willful and malicious seizure of liquor from the railroad company by a state constable. It was therefore precisely like the case now under consideration. At the time that case arose the dispensary law provided: "No suit shall lie for damages alleged to arise by seizure and detention of liquors under this act." Act 1895, § 22 (21 St. at Large, p. 737). The constitutional right to import implies that the appropriate remedy for the violation of the right cannot be denied by the state. Upon this principle the Supreme Court of the United States disregarded the statutory prohibition above quoted. The same prohibition is to be found in the present dispensary law (Cr. Code, § 578). Under the authority of Scott v. Donald we are obliged to hold it is without effect in cases of this kind, and that a suit for damages may be maintained against a dispensary constable for illegal seizure of liquor imported for personal use or in transit from another state, unless the General Assembly has provided another remedy, which was intended to be exclusive, and which substantially supplies its place.

In 1900 the General Assembly passed an act amending the dispensary law, and the portion of the amendment which is now under consideration appears in the Civil Code, in section 661: "Such constables shall, before entering upon the duties of their office, each give bond to the state in the sum of five hundred dollars, with surety or sureties to be approved by the attorney general, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of his office; and in case of the breach of said bond, suit may be brought thereon by any person aggrieved thereby, either in the county where any of the obligors reside or in any county where said breach may have occurred." The question is whether suit on the bond of the constable was intended to be the exclusive remedy of the owner where liquors in transit from another state or imported for personal use are willfully, maliciously, and unlawfully seized. In considering whether the remedy was intended to be exclusive, it must be remembered the General Assembly had before it the principles laid down by the cases above referred to. There are no words in the statute indicating the exclusion of other remedies; but, as was held in Moore v. Ewbanks, 66 S. C. 376, 44 S. E. 971: "Where a statute authorizes the taking or damaging of property for public purposes, and provides a remedy by which compensation may be obtained, such remedy is not cumulative, but conclusive." If, however, the statute, as in this instance, merely gives permission to use the new remedy, and the new remedy is inadequate to take the place of the old, it will not be regarded as exclusive, because the courts will not, in the absence of express words in the enactment to that effect, impute to the Legislature an intention to destroy an old remedy without supplying a new one sufficient to protect and enforce the right. The bond is limited to $500. It is manifest this would be quite inadequate where the damages sought are over $500 in one suit, or an aggregate of more than $500 in several suits. Suits are allowed at the instance of private persons on all official bonds, but the bond required by the state of an officer to secure the faithful discharge of his duty is not the measure of his liability. If the sheriff should, while acting officially, do willful and malicious injury to the amount of $20,000, it cannot be doubted the party injured could maintain a suit against him for the entire amount, although his bond might be for only $10,000. We think it clear the remedy of suit on the bond was not intended to be exclusive.

Section 600, Cr. Code, provides: "Chapter I, title VII, of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state, entitled 'Of Provisional Remedies in Civil Actions,' shall not apply to any officer or person having duties to perform under this chapter, and in no case shall an action lie against any such officer or person for damages to person or property, as provided in said chapter." Title 7 of chapter 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure relates to arrest and bail, and hence the position of defendant that it prohibits an action of this kind cannot be sustained.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court dismissing the complaint be reversed.

MATTHEWS v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 27, 1903.)

RAILROADS—INJURY TO LICENSEE—USE OF RIGHT OF WAY—EVIDENCE.

1. Where a railroad company has acquiesced for a long time in the use of a path by pedestrians over a right of way, one using it becomes a licensee, and, if he knows the dangers of the path, he uses it at his own risk; but the company is liable to one injured thereon in ignorance of the dangers, where there are no guards and no notice thereof.

2. Defendant railroad company dug an excavation under the tracks of two parallel roads between which was a path customarily used by pedestrians. A bridge had been built over such excavation, but it had become decayed, and the public were accustomed at such place to cross a bridge used on one of the parallel roads. Held, that all the railroad companies were liable as joint tortfeasors where a person was injured by falling into the excavation at night, he being ignorant of the fact that the bridge had been taken away, and that pedestrians were accustomed to cross over one of the railroad bridges.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; McCullough, Special Judge.

Action by O. P. Matthews, administrator of John E. Partlow, against the Seaboard & Roanoke Railroad Company and the Railroad & Gaston Railroad Company, operating the system known as the Seaboard Air Line Railroad, as lessees of the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway, the Southern Railway, the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company, and town of Greenwood. All defendants appeal except the latter. Affirmed.

S. J. Simpson and F. Barron Grier, for appellant Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co. T. P. Cothran, for appellant Southern Railroad, J. L. Glenn, for appellant Seaboard & R. R. Co. Graydon & Giles and Wm. N. Graydon, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff, as administrator of John E. Partlow, instituted this suit for damages, alleging his intestate was killed by falling into a railroad cut in the town of Greenwood, and that the accident was due to the joint negligence of the defendants. The defendants demurred on the ground that the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer of the town of Greenwood was sustained, and the plaintiff did not appeal. The separate demurrers of the three railroad companies were overruled, and they have all appealed.

The appeal involves no question concerning the incorporation, sales, and leases of the several railroads, which are set out in the complaint, and no reference need be made to them. The following statement contains all the allegations of the complaint necessary to the discussion of the questions involved:

The Columbia & Greenville Railroad was built in 1852 from Columbia to Greenville, and is owned and operated by defendant Southern Railway Company. The Charleston & Western Carolina Railroad was built in 1882 from Augusta, Ga., to Spartanburg. The Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railroad, known as part of the Seaboard system, was built in 1890, and at Greenwood passes under the Southern Railway and the Charleston & Western Carolina, at right angles, through a cut about 30 feet deep and 18 feet wide. The Southern Railway and the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway, for about 200 yards above the crossing toward Greenville and about 500 yards below the crossing toward Columbia, run parallel to each other and about 10 or 12 feet apart. The sides of the cut for a distance of about 60 feet are held secure by granite walls, and the crossing is made by iron girders resting on the sides of these walls. The walls are entirely within the limits of the rights of way of the two roads by which they are crossed. The Southern Railway has a side track running across the cut parallel with its main line, on the side opposite to the track of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway, and has always maintained a bridge across the cut between its main line and
